This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

+ Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
+ Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
+ Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
+ Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at `http://books.google.com/`

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

THE

LAW TIMES REPORTS,

CONTAINING

All the Cases Argued and Determined

IN PARLIAMENT,

THE HOUSE OF LORDS,
THE PRIVY COUNCIL,
THE COURT OF APPEAL IN CHANCERY,
THE ROLLS COURT,
V.C. STUART'S COURT,
V.C. MALINS' COURT,
V.C. JAMES'S COURT,
THE COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH,
THE COURT OF COMMON PLEAS,
THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER,
THE BAIL COURT,
THE EXCHEQUER CHAMBER,
THE COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEAL,
THE PROBATE COURT,
THE COURT FOR DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES,
THE ADMIRALTY COURT,
THE BANKRUPTCY COURTS,
AT NISI PRIUS, MARITIME LAW CASES,

AND

ELECTION PETITIONS.

TOGETHER WITH A SELECTION OF CASES OF UNIVERSAL APPLICATION DECIDED IN THE SUPERIOR COURTS IN IRELAND AND IN SCOTLAND.

VOLUME XXI.

FROM SEPTEMBER 1869 TO FEBRUARY 1870

LONDON:

HORACE COX, 10, WELLINGTON-STREET, STRAND, W.C.

Digitized by Google

LIBRARY OF THE LELAND STANFORD JR., UNIVERSITY
LAW DEPARTMENT.
59,893

LONDON:
PRINTED BY HORACE COX, WELLINGTON-STREET, STRAND, W.C.

Digitized by Google

THE REPORTERS

OF THE CASES IN THIS VOLUME.

HOUSE OF LORDS, by DOUGLAS KINGSFORD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

PRIVY COUNCIL, by DOUGLAS KINGSFORD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

EQUITY COURTS.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S COURT, by T. BROOKSBANK and E. STEWART ROCHE, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

COURT OF APPEAL IN CHANCERY, by T. BROOKSBANK and E. STEWART ROCHE, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

ROLLS COURT, by H. PEAT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

VICE-CHANCELLOR STUART'S COURT, by EDWARD WINSLOW, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

VICE-CHANCELLOR MALINS' COURT, by G. T. EDWARDS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

VICE-CHANCELLOR JAMES'S COURT, by W. H. BENNET, R. T. BOULT, and Hon. ROBERT BUTLER, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

COMMON LAW COURTS.

The QUEEN'S BENCH, by T. W. SAUNDERS and J. SHORTT, Esqrs, Barristers-at-Law.

The COURT OF COMMON PLEAS, by W. GRAHAM, M. W. MCKELLAR, and H. H. HOCKING, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

The COURT OF EXCHEQUER, by H. LEIGH and E. LUMLEY, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

The RAIL COURT, by F. TURNER, Esq., of the Middle Temple, Barrister-at-Law.

The EXCHEQUER CHAMBER, by the Reporters of the Courts from which the cases come.

BANKRUPTCY.

The COURT OF BANKRUPTCY, by A. A. DORIA, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

IRISH BANKRUPTCY COURT, by J. LEVY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT, by T. E. BESLEY, Esq., of the Middle Temple, Barrister-at-Law.

CRIMINAL APPEAL COURT, by JOHN THOMPSON, Esq., of the Middle Temple, Barrister-at-Law.

COURT OF PROBATE, by W. LEYCESTER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

COURT OF DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES, by W. LEYCESTER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

ECCLESIASTICAL COURTS, by Dr. SWABEY, of Doctors'-commons.

ADMIRALTY COURT, by HENRY F. PURCELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

REGISTRATION APPEALS in the COMMON PLEAS, by M. W. MCKELLAR and H. H. HOCKING, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

PRACTICE OF PARLIAMENTARY COMMITTEES, by FREDERICK CLIFFORD and PEMBROKE S. STEPHENS, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

ELECTION PETITIONS, by F. O. CRUMP, Esq.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

INDEX

TO

THE NAMES OF THE CASES

REPORTED IN THIS VOLUME.

I.—INDEX TO PLAINTIFFS.

A.

page

Abrey v. Crux (L. Rep. 5 C. P. 37; 39 L. J. 9, C. P.) 327
Addison's case, re The Patent Paper Manufacturing Company 654
Agriculturist Cattle Insurance Company, re, Dixon's case (L. Rep. 5 Ch. 79; 39 L. J. 134, Ch.) ...288, 446
Allen v. Bonnett 578
Allen v. Jarvis (L. Rep. 4 Ch. 616) 280
Allen (app.) v. Worthy (resp.) (L. Rep. 5 Q. B. 168; 39 L. J. 36, Mag. Cas.) 665
Alcock v. Gill 704
Ali v. Forrester 819
Alton v. Harrison (L. Rep. 4 Ch. 622; 38 L. J. 669, Ch) 282
Ames v. Waterlow and others (L. Rep. 5 C. P. 53; 39 L. J. 41, C. P.) 393
Anderson v. The Carlisle Horse Clothing Company (Limited) 760
Anderson v. The London and North Western Railway Company (39 L. J. 55, Ex.) 756
Anderson and another (apps.) v. The Pacific Fire and Marine Insurance Company (resps.) 403
Anglo-Egyptian Navigation Company, re (L. Rep. 8 Eq. 660) 19
Anonymous 802
Antony v. The Etna Insurance Company 473
Asiatic Banking Company, re, ex parte Dr. Collum (L. Rep. 9 Eq. 236; 39 L. J. 59, Ch.) 350
Attorney General v. Corporation of Halifax (L. Rep. 5 Ch. 116; 39 L. J. 129, Ch.) 52
Attorney General v. The Drapers' Company (L. Rep. 9 Eq. 69) 651
Attorney General for New South Wales (app) v. Michael Murphy (resp.) 598
Aztecs, The 797

B.

Badger v. Gregory 137
Bailey v. Miles 784
Baker v. Wait 632
Banbury v. Duckworth 302
Bank of Hindustan, China, and Japan (Limited) v Kintrea's case (L. Rep. 5 Ch. 95) ..... page 688
Bank of Hindustan, China, and Japan, re Mitchell and Aspinall's case 812
Bank of London, ex parte, re Barned's Banking Company (Limited) 126
Barned's Banking Company (Limited), re, ex parte The Bank of London 126
Barned's Banking Company (Limited), re, Coupland's case (L. Rep. 5 Ch. 167 and L. Rep. 8 Eq. 472; 38 L. J. 575, Ch.) 286, 807
Barned's Banking Company (Limited), re, Forwood's case (L. Rep. 5 Ch. 18; 38 L. J. 574 and 133, Ch.) 256, 411
Barnes v. Wood (L. Rep. 8 Eq. 424) 227
Bates and Redgates, re (L. Rep. 4 Ch. 577) 410
Beauchamp v. Cooper 442
Beauchamp, Earl of, v. Winn 253
Beckett v. Howe and another (L. Rep. 2 Prob. & Div. 1; 39 L. J. 1, Prob. & Mat.) 400
Belfast Election Petition 475
Bell's Estate, re, Foster v. Bell (L. Rep. 9 Eq. 172) 781
Bennock, ex parte, re A Petition for Adjudication ... 625
Bengal, The 727
Benson, In the goods of 731
Berrie v. Howitt 414
Beverley Commissioners, re, ex parte Fitzgerald (L. Rep. 5 Q. B. 1, and Ex. 21; 39 L. J. 1, Q. B. and 17, Ex.) 418, 464
Black v. Jobling (L. Rep. 1 Prob. & Mat. 685; 38 L. J. 74, Prob. & Mat.) 298
Blakely Ordnance Company (Limited), re, Creyke's case (L. Rep. 5 Ch. 63; 38 L. J. 677, Ch., and 39 L. J. 124, Ch.) 165, 572
Blakely Ordnance Company, re, ex parte Metropolitan and Provincial Bank (L. Rep. 8 Eq. 244) ... 12
Blount v. Wheble 259
Bolton v. Bolton (L. Rep. 5 Ex. 82.) 793
Bolton's Will, re 413
Bowers v. Bowers (L. Rep. 8 Eq. 283; 38 L. J. 596, Ch.) 134
Bradbury v. Beeton (39 L. J. 57, Ch.) 328
Bramwell v. Spiller 672
Brewer (app.) v. The Town Clerk of Bradford (resp.) (39 L. J. 30, C. P.) 462

Digitized by Google

PLAINTIFFS.

Bridges v. Garrett (L. Rep. 4 C. P. 680) .....page 141
Bristowe v. Booth (L. Rep. 5 C. P. 80; 39 L. J. 47, C. P.) 427
Broadbridge, re, ex parte Cyrus (L. Rep. 5 Ch. 176) 664
Brothers, The, v. The Fingal 621
Brown v. Adams (39 L. J. 67, Ch.) 71
Brown v. Brown (38 L. J. 78, Prob. & Mat.) 339
Brown v. Brown and Robey 181
Boulton v. The Commissioners of Inland Revenue (39 L. J. 51, Ex.) 720
Boun v. Stroud 695
Bourton v. Williams..... 781
Bousfield v. Bousfield 136
Buckmaster v. Buckmaster (L. Rep. 1 Prob. & Mat. 713; 38 L. J. 73, Prob. & Mat.) 23
Burns, The 232
Burton v. Darnley, Earl of..... 292

C.

Calcutta, The 768
Callaghan (app.) v. Dolwin (resp.) 827
Campbell v. Mayor, &c. of Liverpool 814
Capdevielle v. Capdevielle 660
Carrickfergus Election Petition 352
Carter v. Carter (L. Rep. 8 Eq. 551)..... 194
Cary v. Dawson (L. Rep. 4 Q. B. 568; 38 L. J. 300, Q. B.) 23
Catling v. Great Northern Railway Company ...17, 769
Catt v. Tourle (38 L. J. 665, Ch.) 188
Chartered Bank of India, Australia and China (apps.) v. Evans and another (resp.) 407
Cherry and McDougall (apps.) v. The Colonial Bank of Australasia (resps.) (38 L. J. 49, P. C.)... 356
Chester v. Chester 527
Chichester v. Lord Donegal and others 581
China Steamship and Labuan Coal Company (Limited), re, Drummond's case (L. Rep. 4 Ch. 772) 317
City Bank v. Luckie 693
Clayton, ex parte, re Clayton (L. Rep. 5 Ch. 13) 342
Cocker (app.) v. Cardwell (resp.) (L. Rep. 5 Q. B. 15; 39 L. J. 28, Mag. Cas. and 52 Q. B.) 457
Cole, Isabella, ex parte 750
Collum, Dr., ex parte, re Asiatic Banking Company (39 L. J. 59, Ch.) 350
Cook v. Hathway (L. Rep. 8 Eq. 612; 39 L. J. 99, Ch.) 484
Cooper v. Cooper (L. Rep. 8 Eq. 312; 38 L. J. 622, Ch.) 197
Cooper, In the goods of (L. Rep. 2 Prob. & Div. 21; 39 L. J. 8, Prob. & Mat.) 596
Commercial Bank Corporation of India and the East, Fernandez's case 575
Commercial Bank Corporation of India and the East, re, Wilson's case (L. Rep. 8 Eq. 240)..... 164
Commissioners for administering the Laws for the Relief of the Poor for Ireland (apps.) v. The Select Vestry of the Parish of Liverpool (resps.) (L. Rep. 5 Q. B. 79; 39 L. J. 25, Mag. Cas. and 52, Q. B.)..... 636
Constable v. Constable (L. Rep. 2 Prob. & Div. 17; 39 L. J. 17, Prob. & Mat.) 401
Constantinople and Alexandria Hotels Company, re, Ebbett's case (39 L. J. 158, Ch.) 574
Conybeare v. Farries (L. Rep. 5 Ex. 16; 39 L. J. 26, Ex.) 497
Cork and Youghal Railway Company, re (L. Rep. 4 Ch. 748) 47
Cork and Youghal Railway Company, re, ex parte Overend, Gurney, and Co. (Limited), ex parte The London, Hamburg, and Continental Exchange Bank (Limited) and others 735
Coupland's case, re Barned's Banking Company (Limited) (L. Rep. 5 Ch. 167 and L. Rep. 8 Eq. 472; 38 L. J. 575, Ch.) 286, 807
Coutts v. Ackworth (L. Rep. 8 Eq. 558; 38 L. J. 694, Ch.) 224
Cox v. Land and Water Company (Limited) (39 L. J. 152, Ch.) 548
Cox v. Lee (38 L. J. 219, Ex.; L. Rep. 4 Ex. 284)... 178
Creyke's case, re Blakely Ordnance Company (Limited) (38 L. J. 677, Ch., and 39 L. J. 124, Ch.)..... 165, 572
Crockford's Estate, re .....page 85
Crofts, In the goods of (L. Rep. 2 Prob. & Div. 18) 596
Cuming, H., re (L. Rep. 5 Ch. 72) 739
Cuthbertson (app.) v. Butterworth (resp.) 140
Cyrus, ex parte, re Broadbridge (L. Rep. 5 Ch. 176) 664

D.

Darling v. Cooper 442
Dart, The 765
Davies (a bankrupt), re 685
Davis's Trusts, re 137
Dawes, Matthew, Estate of, re 322
Dawkins v. Paulet (L. Rep. 5 Q. B. 94; 39 L. J. 53, Q. B.) 584
Dear v. Verity 185
Deare v. Soutten (L. Rep. 9 Eq. 15) 523
Debtor's Petition, A, re..... 685
Debtor's Summons, A, re 625, 802
Deeks v. Bailey 581
De Lancey's Succession, re (L. Rep. 4 Ex. 345; L. Rep. 5 Ex. 102) 58
Denston (Assignee, &c.) v. Ashton and others (L. Rep. 4 Q. B. 594; 38 L. J. 254, Q. B.) 20
Derby Commercial Bank (Limited) v. Lumsden and another (L. Rep. 5 C. P. 107; 39 L. J. 72, C.P.)... 672
De Rosaz's case, re C. Laffitte and Co. (Limited) ... 10
Dignam v. Baily (L. Rep. 5 Q. B. 53; 39 L. J. 13 Q. B.) 456
Dixon's case, re The Agriculturist Cattle Insurance Company (L. Rep. 5 Ch. 79; 39 L. J. 134, Ch.) 288, 446
Downie (James), re 154
Drogheda Election Petition..... 402
Drummond's case, re The China Steamship and Labuan Company (Limited) (L. Rep. 4 Ch. 772) 317
Dryden v. Dawes 322
Dugdale v. Dugdale 526
Durant (app.) v. Kennett (resp.) (39 L. J. 17, C. P.) 603

E.

Eade v. Morgan 816
East and West Junction Railway Company, re..... 86
Eaton v. Eaton and Campbell..... 733
Ebbett's case, Constantinople and Alexandria Hotels Company, re (39 L. J. 158, Ch.) 574
Edney and Lunn v. Smallbones..... 586
Elgood v. Cole 80
Elizabeth, The (L. Rep. 3 Adm. 33) 729
Empire of Peace, The (39 L. J. 12, Adm.)..... 763
European Central Railway Company, re Gustard's case (L. Rep. 8 Eq. 488; 38 L. J. 610, Ch.) 196
European Central Railway Company, Holden's case (L. Rep. 8 Eq. 444) 197
Evans and Evans, re..... 112
Evanturel, Emilie Malvina, and E. Rémillard v. François Evanturel (L. Rep. 2 P. C. 462) 4
Eyton v. Jones and others 789

F.

Fair v. The London and North Western Railway Company..... 326
Family Endowment Society, re (L. Rep. 5 Ch. 118) 485, 775
Fenwick v. Bulman (L. Rep. 9 Eq. 165)..... 628
Fernandez's case, Commercial Bank Corporation of India and the East 575
Ferrar v. The Commissioners of Sewers for the City of London 295
Finney v. Finney 597
Finney v. Godfrey (38 L. J. 162, Ch.) 631, 747
Fitzgerald, ex parte, re The Beverley Commissioners (L. Rep. 5 Q. B. 1 and Ex. 21; 39 L. J. 1, Q. B. and 17, Ex.) 418, 464
Flood v. North Eastern Railway Company..... 258
Forbes's and Judd's cases, re, The Heyford Company (Limited) 632
Ford (app.) v. Harrington (resp.) 609

Digitized by Google

PLAINTIFFS.

Foreman (Richard J.) (app.) v. The Free Fishers and Dredgers of Whitstable (resps.) (L. Rep. 4 Eng. & Ir. 266; 38 L. J. 345, C. P.).....page 804
Forwood's case, re Barned's Banking Company (Limited) (38 L. J. 574, Ch.; 39 L. J. 138, Ch.) 256, 411
Foster v. Bell, re Bell's Estate (L. Rep. 9 Eq. 172)... 781
Fraser, In the goods of (L. Rep. 2 Prob. & Div. 40; 39 L. J. 20, Prob. & Mat.) 680
Frazer v. Daniel..... 723
Freeman v. Pope (L. Rep. 9 Eq. 206; 39 L. J. 148, Ch.) 816
Frost v. The London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway Company (39 L. J. 54, Ex.)..... 757
Fyfe's (De) case, re London Joint Stock Discount Company (Limited) (L. Rep. 4 Ch. 768; 38 L. J. 725, Ch.)..... 131

G.

Garbett (S.) In the goods of 366
Gaynor, In the Goods of (L. Rep. 1 Prob. & Div. 723; 38 L. J. 79, Prob. & Mat.)..... 367
George and Wife v. Skivington (L. Rep. 5 Eq. 1; 39 L. J. 8, C. P.) 495
Gepp v. Majendie 168
Germania, The 44
Gerrard v. Dawes, re The Estate of Matthew Dawes 322
Gibbs v. Harding (L. Rep. 8 Eq. 490; 38 L. J. 604, Ch.) 322
Giblin and others v. McMullen (L. Rep. 2 P. C. 317) 214
Gibson and another v. Hillstrom and others 302
Giffard v. Williams (L. Rep. 8 Eq. 494; 38 L. J. 597, Ch.) 575
Gill (J. S.) In the goods of (L. Rep. 2 Prob. & Div. 6; 39 L. J. 5, Prob. & Mat.) 399
Gilliatt v. Gilliatt (L. Rep. 9 Eq. 60; 39 L. J. 142, Ch.) 522
Girardot v. Fitzpatrick 470
Girand, Jean Baptiste (app.) v. John Borthwick Paterson (resp.) (38 L. J. 65, P. C.) 201
Gladwell v. Turner (L. Rep. 5 Ex. 59; 39 L. J. 31, Ex.) 674
Glebe Lands of Great Yeldham, re (L. Rep. 9 Eq. 68) 481
Glover v. Moore (39 L. J. 98, Ch.)..... 815
Godwin v. Francis 361
Gossip (app.) v. Wright and others (resps.) 271
Graham, ex parte, re Job 802
Graham v. Johnson 77
Grant v. Grant (L. Rep. 2 Prob. & Div. 8; 39 L. J. 17, Prob. & Mat.) 645
Green v. Green 401
Greenwood (John) (Estate and Effects of), deceased, re (L. Rep. 4 Ex. 327; 39 L. J. 30, Ex.) 25
Great Pacific, The (L. Rep. 2 P. C. 516; L. Rep. 2 Adm. 381; 38 L. J. 64, Adm.; 38 L. J. 64, P. C.) 39
Griffith v. The Cambrian Railway Company 290
Grinstead, In the goods of 731
Gustard's case, re European Central Railway Company (L. Rep. 8 Eq. 438; 38 L. J. 610, Ch.) 196

H.

Haldane v. Eckford (L. Rep. 8 Eq. 631) 87
Hall v. The Commissioners of Inland Revenue..... 151
Hall (app.) v. Potter (resp.) (39 L. J. 3, Mag. Cas.; 39 L. J. 1, Q. B.) 454
Hammersmith and City Railway Company v. Brand and Wife (L. Rep. 4 Eng. & Ir. 171; 38 L. J. 265, Q. B.) 238
Hammond v. Barrett..... 321
Hankey, ex parte, re New Zealand Banking Corporation (39 L. J. 128, Ch.)..... 481
Hanover, King of, v. Bank of England (L. Rep. 8 Eq. 350) 106
Harrow, In the goods of 834
Hart v. The Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company..... 261
Harvey and others v. The Mayor, &c. of Lyme Regis..... 227
Hastings Election Petition 234
Hattatt's Will, re 781
Heald v. Walls 705
Healey v. The Chichester and Midhurst Railway Company (L. Rep. 9 Eq. 148).....page 811
Heard v. Pilley (38 L. J. 718, Ch.) 68
Heart of Oak, The (39 L. J. 15, Adm.)..... 727
Heaton Steel and Iron Company (Limited), re Simpson's case (L. Rep. 9 Eq. 91; 39 L. J. 41, Ch.) ... 629
Hebblethwaite v. Hebblethwaite (Queen's Proctor intervening (L. Rep. 2 Prob. & Div. 29; 39 L. J. 15, Prob. & Mat.) 782
Hennequin v. O'Dowd 803
Henshaw v. Angell 784
Hereford Election Petition 117
Heritage's case, re Merchants' Company (L. Rep. 9 Eq. 5) 479
Heugh and another v. The London and North-Western Railway Company (L. Rep. 5 Ex. 51) ... 676
Heyford Company (Limited), re Forbes's and Judd's cases 632
Heyford Company (Limited), re Pell's case (L. Rep. 5 Ch. 11; L. Rep. 8 Eq. 322; 39 L. J. 120, Ch.) 320, 412
Hickman, The (L. Rep. 3 Adm. 15; 39 L. J. 7, Adm.) 472
Hicks (A.), In the goods of 300
Higgs v. The Northern Assam Tea Company (Limited) (L. Rep. 4 Ex. 387; 38 L. J. 233, Ex.)..... 336
Holden's case, re European Central Railway Company (L. Rep. 8 Eq. 444) 197
Holland v. Holland 129
Hollyford Copper Mining Company (Limited), re (L. Rep. 5 Ch. 93) 734
Holt v. Holt and Davis (Queen's Procter intervening) 401
Hooper v. Marshall (L. Rep. 5 C. P. 4; 39 L. J. 14, C. P.) 639
Horner, re 340
Horsey v. Graham (L. Rep. 5 C. P. 9; 39 L. J. 58, C. P.)..... 530
Horsley and Knighton's Patent, re (L. Rep. 4 Ch. 784 and 8 Eq. 475; 39 L. J. 157, Ch.) 345
Huddart v. Rigby (L. Rep. 5 Q. B. 139; 39 L. J. (Ex. Ch.) 18, Q. B.) 641
Hudson v. Osborne (39 L. J. 79, Ch.)..... 386
Humber Ironworks Company (Limited), re, ex parte The Warrant Finance Company (Limited) (38 L. J. 712, Ch.; 39 L. J. 185, Ch.) 626
Humphreys, re, ex parte Kennard and others..... 684

I.

Ibbitson's Trust, re 163
Ingall v. Drayton 367

J.

Jackson, ex parte, re Wheal, Ludcott, and Wrey Consols Mines Company..... 67
James (J.), In the goods of 130
James v. Lichfield (L. Rep. 9 Eq. 51) 526
James's case, re South Blackpool Hotel Company (38 L. J. 616, Ch.)..... 258
Jarvis v. Allen 280
Jayne v. Jayne and Prothero 401
Jenkins (D.), In the goods of 300
Job, re, ex parte Graham..... 802
Joint Stock Discount Company, re, ex parte The Warrant Finance Company (Limited) (L. Rep. 5 Ch. 86; 38 L. J. 725, Ch.; 39 L. J. 122, Ch.) 345, 626
Jones (a solicitor), re (L. Rep. 1 Prob. & Mat. 690; L. Rep. 9 Eq. 63; 39 L. J. 88, Ch.; 39 L. J. 190, Ch.) 482
Jones v. Hill (39 L. J. 72, Q. B.)..... 784
Jones (pet.) v. Malcolm and Collins (resps.)..... 645
Judd and Forbes's cases, re The Heyford Company (Limited)..... 632

K.

Karnak, The (L. Rep. 2 P. C. 505; 38 L. J. 57, Adm.; 38 L. J. 71, P. C.) 159
Kearsley's Trusts, re..... 294
Kelly v. Kelly (L. Rep. 2 Prob. & Div. 31; 34 L. J. 9, Prob. & Mat.)..... 564

Digitized by Google

PLAINTIFFS.

Kemp, re, ex parte Prance (L. Rep. 5 Ch. 16) ...page 341
Kemptner's Mortgage, re (L. Rep. 8 Eq. 286)..... 223
Kennard and others, ex parte, re Humphreys..... 684
Kent (app.) v. Astley (resp.) (L. Rep. 5 Q. B. 19; 39 L. J. 3, Mag. Cas.; 30 L. J. 24, Q. B.) 425
Kershaw v. Kershaw (L. Rep. 9 Eq. 56) 651
Kew and other Bridges Bill. Objection to locus standi of the Hammersmith Bridge Company..... 124
Kingstown Town Bill. Objections to locus standi of Dublin, Wicklow, and Wexford Railway Company 199
Kintrea's case, re The Bank of Hindustan, China, and Japan (Limited) (L. Rep. 5 Ch. 95) 688
Kirkman v. Lewis (38 L. J. 570, Ch.) 191
Kirton v. Dear (39 L. J. 36, C. P.)..... 532
Knox v. Turner (L. Rep. 9 Eq. 155)..... 701

L.

Lady of the Lake (L. Rep. 3 Adm. 29) 683
Laffitte (C.), and Company (Limited), re De Rosaz's case 10
Laing v. Reed (L. Rep. 5 Ch. 4; 39 L. J. 1, Ch.) 83, 773
Lamb v. North London Railway Company 98
Land Credit Company of Ireland v. Lord Fermoy, ex parte Munster (39 L. J. 27, Ch.) 573
Landed Estates Company (Limited) v. Weeding ... 384
Law (W. J.), deceased, In the goods of 399
Lee v. Haley (L. Rep. 5 Ch. 155) 546
Leather Cloth Company (Limited) v. Lorsont (39 L. J. 86, Ch.) 661
Leney and another v. Taplin 204
Levy v. Rice 717
Limb v. Holden and White..... 731
Limerick (City) Election Petition 567
Lion, The (L. Rep. 2 P. C. 52; 38 L. J. 51, Adm.; 38 L. J. 57, P. C.) 41
Logan's case, re The London and Scottish Bank (L. Rep. 9 Eq. 149)..... 742
London and County General Agency Association, re, ex parte Pulbrook..... 283
London, Hamburg, and Continental Exchange Bank (Limited) and others, ex parte, re The Cork and Youghal Railway Company 735
London Joint Stock Discount Company (Limited), re, De Fyfe's case (L. Rep. 4 Ch. 768)..... 131
London Marine Insurance Association, re, J. W. Smith's case (L. Rep. 4 Ch. 611; 38 L. J. 681, Ch.) 97
London and Mediterranean Bank (Limited) v. Strutton..... 415
London and Northern Assurance Corporation (Limited) v. Stace and Worth's case 182
London and North Western Railway Company v. Garnett (L. Rep. 9 Eq. 26; 39 L. J. 25, Ch.) 352
London and North Western Railway Bill. Objections to locus standi of Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company 157
London and Scottish Bank, re Logan's case (L. Rep. 9 Eq. 149) 742
London and South Western Railway (apps.) v. Myers (resp.) (39 L. J. 57, C. P.) 460
London Permanent Benefit Building Society, re ... 8
Londonderry, City of, Election Petition 709
Lublin, ex parte, re Lublin 573
Luckin v. Hamlyn 366
Lush Trusts, re (L. Rep. 4 Ch. 591; 38 L. J. 650, Ch.) 376

M.

Mackie v. European Assurance Society 102
MacManus v. Bark..... 676
McGregor v. High and another 803
Madrid Bank v. Pelley 13
Maitland, Schooner, The 798
Mann v. Harbord (L. Rep. 5. Ex. 17) 436
Mann v. Harbord and another (39 L. J. 27, Ex.)..... 641
Markham, ex parte..... 748
Marshall v. Martin..... 788
Marshall v. Ross (L. Rep. 8 Eq. 651)..... 260
Masons' Hall Tavern Company (Limited) re, Orgill's case .....page 221
Martin (John) (app.) v. The Rev. A. H. Mackonochie (resp.) (L. Rep. 2 P. C. 365; 39 L. J. 11, Eccl.)... 512
Maxsted v. Morris 535
Mayor, Aldermen, and Citizens of Carlisle v. Graham and another (L. Rep. 4 Ex. 361; 38 L. J. 226, Ex.) 333
Mayor, &c. of Dorchester v. Ensor and Mansfield (L. Rep. 4 Ex. 335; 39 L. J. 11, Ex.)..... 145
Memphis, The (L. Rep. 3 Adm. 23) 727
Menhennitt (Jane), re (L. Rep. 5 C. P. 16.; 39 L. J. C. P.) 322
Mercer v. Woodgate (L. Rep. 5 Q. B. 26; 39 L. J. 21, Mag. Cas.) 458
Merchants' Company, re Heritage's case (L. Rep. 9 Eq. 5.) 479
Metropolitan and Provincial Bank, ex parte, re Blakely Ordnance (L. Rep. 8 Eq. 244) 12
Midland and London and North-Western Railway Companies' Bill. Objections to locus standi of (1) The Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company —(2) The North British Railway Company...276, 279
Mid-Wales Railway Company v. Cambrian Railways Company 16
Milford v. Milford (L. Rep. 1 Prob. & Div. 715)..... 155
Milford Improvement Bill. Objection to locus standi of The Great Western Railway Company 1
Miller v. Miller (L. Rep. 2 Prob. & Div. 13; 39 L. J. 4, Prob. & Mat.)..... 471
Milwaukee Belle, The..... 800
Mitchell's case, re The Norwegian Charcoal Iron Co. 811
Mitchell and Aspinall's case, re The Bank of Hindustan, China, and Japan 812
Montgomery v. Cameron..... 85
Morley, re, Morley v. Saunders (L. Rep. 8 Eq. 594)... 132
Morris v. Bethell (L. Rep. 4 C. P. 765; L. Rep. 5 C. P. 47; 38 L. J. 377, C. P.) 230
Morris, ex parte, re The Duke of Newcastle (L. Rep. 5 Ch. 172) 381
Mumby v. Mumby (L. Rep. 1 Prob. & Div. 701)..... 155
Mumford and Brett v. Shufflebotham 835
Munster, ex parte The Land Credit Company of Ireland v. Lord Fermoy 573
Murphy (G.) and others v. Palgreave..... 209
Murray v. Earl of Clarendon (L. Rep. 9 Eq. 11)..... 448

N.

Nash v. Howell 743
Natal Investment Company (Limited), ex parte Snell..... 445
Newcastle, Duke of, re (L. Rep. 8 Eq. 700)..... 368
Newcastle, Duke of, re, ex parte Morris (L. Rep. 5 Ch. 172) 381
Newcastle, Duke of, re, ex parte Padwick (39 L. J. 68, Ch.)..... 343
New Zealand Banking Corporation, re, ex parte Hankey (39 L. J. 128, Ch.)..... 481
Nicholl's Settlement, re 818
Nickling v. Heaps and others..... 754
Norfolk, County of (Northern Division), Election Petition 264
Northallerton Election Petition 113
North of England Iron Steamship Insurance Association v. Armstrong and others (39 L. J. 81, Q.B.) 822
North Wales Slate Supply Company, re 818
Northern Assam Tea Company, re 483
Northumbria, The (L. Rep. 3 Adm. 6, 24; 39 L. J. 3, 24, Adm.)..... 681
Norwegian Charcoal Iron Company, re, Mitchell's case 811

O.

Olver v. Johns (39 L. J. 7, Prob. & Mat.) 597
Orgill's case, re Masons' Hall Tavern Company (Limited)..... 221
Orient, The (39 L. J. 8, 10, Adm.) 761, 762
Overend, Gurney, and Co. (Limited), ex parte, re The Cork and Youghal Railway Company (39 L. J. 27, Ch.)..... 735

Digitized by Google

PLAINTIFFS.

Overend, Gurney, and Co. (Limited) v. Gurney and others (L. Rep. 4 Ch. 701; 39 L. J. 45, Ch.)...page 73

P.

Padwick, ex parte, re The Duke of Newcastle (39 L. J. 68, Ch.) ... 343
Parkinson v. Parkinson (L. Rep. 2 Prob. & Div. 25; 39 L. J. 14, 21, Prob. & Mat.) ... 732
Partington v. The Attorney-General (L. Rep. 4 Eng. & Ir. 100; 38 L. J. 205, Ex.) ... 370
Patent Floor Cloth Company, re (L. Rep. 8 Eq. 664) ... 199
Patent Paper Manufacturing Company, re Addison's case ... 654
Peabody (G.) In the goods of ... 730
Peacock v. Young and another ... 527
Pearce v. Morris (L. Rep. 8 Eq. 217) ... 287
Peck v. Peck ... 670
Pell's case, re Heyford Company (Limited) (L. Rep. 5 Ch. 11; L. Rep. 8 Eq. 222; 39 L. J. 120, Ch.)... 320
Petition for Adjudication, re, ex parte Bennock ... 625
Phelps v. Amcott and others ... 167
Phelps v. The Great Eastern Railway Company ... 443
Phene's Trust, re (L. Rep. 5 Ch. 139) ... 107
Plant v. The Midland Railway Company ... 836
Plant v. Stott ... 106
Playford v. United Kingdom Electric Telegraph Company (Limited) (L. Rep. 4 Q. B. 706; 38 L. J. 249, Q. B.) ... 21
Pooley Hall Colliery Company, re ... 690
Porter, In the goods of (L. Rep. 2 Prob. & Div. 22; 39 L. J. 12, Prob. & Mat.) ... 680
Potteries Railway Company, re (L. Rep. 5 Ch. 67; 39 L. J. 77, Ch) ... 545
Potts v. Smith and others (L. Rep. 8 Eq. 683; 39 L. J. 181, Ch.) ... 54
Poupard v. Fardell ... 696
Powell v. Roberts (L. Rep. 9 Eq. 169; 39 L. J. 44, Ch.) ... 451
Poyser v. Harrison (L. Rep. 4 Ch. 622; 38 L. J. 669, Ch.) ... 282
Prance, ex parte, re Kemp (L. Rep. 5 Ch. 16) ... 341
Prehn and others v. The Royal Bank of Liverpool (L. Rep. 5 Ex. 92; 39 L. J. 41, Ex.) ... 880
Preston v. Preston ... 346
Price v. Rickards (L. Rep. 9 Eq. 35; 39 L. J. 118, Ch.) ... 581
Provident Clerks' Mutual Life Assurance Association, re, re Moseley's Policy ... 384
Pulbrook, ex parte, re The London and County General Agency Association ... 288

R.

Railway Companies Act 1867, re, and re The Somerset and Dorset Railway Company ... 656
Ramsbotham v. Senior (L. Rep. 8 Eq. 575) ... 293
Ramshire v. Bolton (L. Rep. 8 Eq. 294; 38 L. J. 594, Ch.) ... 50
Rayson v. Parton and Page (Johnson intervening) (L. Rep. 2 Prob. & Div. 38; 39 L. J. 20, Prob. & Mat.) ... 647
Reg. v. Casbolt ... 263
Reg. v. Diplock (L. Rep. 4 Q. B. 549; 38 L. J. 297, Q.B.) ... 24
Reg. v. Eaves (L. Rep. 5 Ex. 75) ... 829
Reg. v. Martha Falkingham and Mary Falkingham (L. Rep. 1 C. C. R. 222; 39 L. J. 47, Mag. Cas.) 679
Reg. v. French (L. Rep. 1 C. C. R. 217; 39 L. J. 58, Mag. Cas.) ... 726
Reg. v. The Guardians of the Biggleswade Union 494
Reg. v. The Guardians of the Kingston Union ... 488
Reg. v. Hapgood and Wyatt ... 678
Reg. v. Harrington and others ... 57
Reg. v. Hodgkiss (L. Rep. 1 C. C. R. 212; 39 L. J. 14, Mag. Cas.) ... 564
Reg. v. The Inhabitants of Odell ... 556
Reg. v. David Jones ... 396
Reg. v. The Justices of the West Riding of Yorkshire (L. Rep. 5 Q. B. 83; 39 L. J. 17, Mag. Cas.) 490
Reg. v. MacGrath (L. Rep. 1 C. C. R. 205; 39 L. J. 7, Mag. Cas.) ... page 543
Reg. v. Marshall (John) ... 796
Reg. v. William Martin (L. Rep. 1 C. C. R. 214; 39 L. J. (C. C. R.) 31, Mag. Cas.) ... 469
Reg. v. The Mayor and Assessors of Bolton (39 L. J. 77, Q. B.) ... 748
Reg. v. The Mayor and Assessors of Monmouth (39 L. J. 77, Q. B.) ... 748
Reg. v. The Mayor, &c. of Wigan ... 715
Reg. v. William Parker (L. Rep. 1 C. C. R. 225; 39 L. J. 60, Mag. Cas.) ... 724
Reg. v. Raudnitz ... 621
Reg. v. Redford ... 508
Reg. v. Ritson and another (L. Rep. 4 C. C. R. 200; 39 L. J. 10, Mag. Cas.) ... 437
Reg. v. Stainer (L. Rep. 1 C. C. R. 230; 39 L. J. 554, Mag. Cas.) ... 758
Reg. v. George Thompson ... 397
Reg. v. Wallasey Local Board of Health ... 90
Reg. v. Williamson ... 444
Richards v. Richards and Cook ... 598
Richardson v. Du Bois (L. Rep. 5 Q. B. 51; 39 L. J. 69, Q. B.) ... 635
Roberts v. The Bury Improvement Commissioners L. Rep. 4 C. P. 755; L. Rep. 5 Ch. 3; 38 L. J. 377, C. P.) ... 173
Roberts v. Cowmeadow ... 367
Rodger and others v. Comptoir D'Escompte De Paris and others (L. Rep. 2 P. C. 393) ... 33
Rose v. Rowe ... 349
Ross v. Tatham (38 L. J. 577, Ch.) ... 351
Rowland v. Rowland and Miles ... 733
Royal Liver Friendly Society, The Trustees of the, v. The Commissioners of Inland Revenue (L. Rep. 5 Ex. 78; 39 L. J. 37, Ex.) ... 721
Rush (a solicitor), re (L. Rep. 9 Eq. 147) ... 692
Rushbrook v. Lawrence (39 L. J. 93, Ch.) ... 192, 447
Russia, The, Steamship ... 440
Ryland (app.) v. Delisle (resp.) 38 L. J. 67, P. C.)... 325

S.

Sadler (app.) v. Smith (resp.) (L. Rep. 5 Q. B. 40; 39 L. J. 17, Ex. Ch. and Q. B.) ... 502
Salter v. Walker ... 360
Scoles v. The North London Railway Company ... 835
Shepheard's Settled Estate, re (L. Rep. 8 Eq. 571; 39 L. J. 173, Ch.) ... 525
Sheppard (Thomas B.) (app.) v. The Rev. William J. E. Bennett (resp.) (L. Rep. 2 P. C. 450; 38 L. J. 49, Eccl. and 71, P. C. and 39, Rules) ... 650
Ship Stratton Audley, The, and her Cargo ... 81
Silver v. Silver ... 784
Silver v. Udall (L. Rep. 9 Eq. 227; 39 L. J. 118, Ch.) 660
Simpson v. Yeend (L. Rep. 14 Q. B. 626; 38 L. J. 313, Q. B.) ... 56
Simpson's case, re Heaton Steel and Iron Company (Limited) (L. Rep. 9 Eq. 91; 39 L. J. 41, Ch.) ... 629
Sinclair v. The Great Eastern Railway Company... 752
Skidmore v. Bradford ... 291
Smith, In the goods of ... 340
Smith (William), ex parte ... 294
Smith v. Earl Brownlow ... 739, 741
Smith v. Buckingham ... 819
Smith v. Fletcher ... 646
Smith (Gideon) (app.) v. Edward Mackie (resp.) ... 392
Smith (app.) v. Lancaster (resp.) (39 L. J. 33, C. P.) 492
Smith's case, re London Marine Insurance Association (L. Rep. 4 Ch. 768; 38 L. J. 681, Ch.) ... 97
Smith v. London and South Western Railway Company (L. Rep. 5 C. P. 98; 39 L. J. 68, Q. B.) ... 668
Snell, ex parte, re The Natal Investment Company (Limited) ... 445
Sollory v. Leaver (L. Rep. 9 Eq. 22) ... 453
Somerset and Dorset Railway Company, re, and re The Railway Companies Act, 1867 ... 656
South Blackpool Hotel, re; James's case (L. Rep. 8 Eq. 225) ... 258
South Eastern of Portugal Railway Company (Limited), re ... 220
Southwell v. Martin ... 135
Spain, Queen of, The, v. Parr and others (39 L. J. 78, Ch.) ... 555

Digitized by Google

PLAINTIFFS.

Spencer, re ..... page 808
Spence's Patent Non-Conducting Composition and Cement Company, re (39 L. J. 79, Ch.; L. Rep. 9 Eq. 9) 413
Stace and Worth's case, re London and Northern Assurance Corporation (Limited) 182
Stafford Election Petition 210
Steele (A. R.) (app.) v. The Midland Railway Company (resps.) 387
St. Helen's Borough Improvement Bill 55, 91, 95
St. Leonards, Lord, v. Ashburner 595
St. Paul v. St. Paul and Farquhar (L. Rep. 1 Prob. & Div. 739) 108
Street v. Morgan 432
Stucley v. The Commissioners of Inland Revenue (L. Rep. 5 Ex. 85) 718
Sumner (Bishop) v. Wix 766
Sykes v. Dyson 696

T.

Taunton Election Petition 169
Taylor v. Chester 359
Taylor v. Dowlen (38 L. J. 680, Ch.) 70
Taylor v. The Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company 442
Tebb v. Hodge and another (L. Rep. 5 C. P. 73; 39 L. J. 56, C. P.) 499
Thomas (app.) v. Alsop (resp.) (L. Rep. 5 Q. B. 151; 39 L. J. 43, Mag. Cas.) 715
Thrupp v. Goodrich 652
Tidey, re 685
Tonge v. Ward 480
Trappes v. Meredith (L. Rep. 9 Eq. 229) 782
Trenchard (H. M.), ex parte 638
Trick's Trusts, re, ex parte Willoby (L. Rep. 5 Ch. 170) 739
Trust Deed, A, re 624
Turner v. Ringwood Highway Board 745
Twynam v. Porter 35

U.

Union Cement and Brick Company (Limited), re (L. Rep. 4 Ch. 627) 46
United States (The) v. The Steamer Missouri 648

V.

Velocity, The (39 L. J. 20, Adm.) 686
Vivian v. The Mersey Dock and Harbour Board (L. Rep. 5 C. P. 19; 39 L. J. 3, C. P.) 362

W.

Wall v. Ogle (L. Rep. 9 Eq. 58) ..... page 654
Wall v. Rogers (L. Rep. 9 Eq. 58) 654
Wallis v. South-Western Railway (L. Rep. 5 Ex. 62) 675
Walker v. The South-Eastern Railway Company... 301
Walters v. Webb 657
Warrant Finance Company (Limited), re, ex parte The Humber Iron Works Company (Limited), (38 L. J. 712, Ch.; 39 L. J., 185 Ch.) 626
Warrant Finance Company, ex parte, re The Joint Stock Discount Company (Limited) (39 L. J. 122, Ch.) 345, 626
Warburton v. The Midland Railway Company 885
Ward v. Ward 699
Watford and Rickmansworth Railway Company v. London and North-Western Railway Company (L. Rep. 8 Eq. 281) 81
Waygood and another (pets.) v. James (resp.) Taunton Election Petition 202
Weekes v. Gallard 655
Westwood v. McKie 165
Wheal, Ludcott, and Wray Consols Mines Company, re, ex parte Jackson 67
Whitehouse and another v. The Wolverhampton and Walsall Railway Company (L. Rep. 5 Ex. 6; 39 L. J. 1, Ex.) 558
Whiteley's Settled Estates, re (L. Rep. 8 Eq. 574) ... 454
Wigan Election Petition 122
Wilkinson's Settled Estates, re (L. Rep. 8 Eq. 487 and L. Rep. 9 Eq. 71.) 482
Williams v. The East London Railway Company ... 524
Williams v. Smith 745
Williams v. Taylor and others 642
Willoby ex parte, re Trick's Trusts (L. Rep. 5 Ch. 170) 739
Wilson v. Furness Railway Company (L. Rep. 9 Eq. 28; 39 L. J. 19, Ch.) 416
Wilson and another (apps.) v. Traill (resp.) 510
Wilson's case, re, The Commercial Bank Corporation of India and the East (L. Rep. 8 Eq. 240) 164
Winchester (Bishop of) v. Wix (L. Rep. 3 Eccl. 19; 39 L. J. 22, Eccl.) 439, 553
Wintle, re 781
Woburn Abbey, The 707
Wollaston v. Tribe (L. Rep. 9 Eq. 44.) 449
Wortley (app.) v. Nottingham Local Board (resps)... 582
Wright v. Rogers and Goodman (Winterbotham intervening) (L. Rep. 1 Prob. & Mat. 678) 156

Y.

Yates's Patent, re (L. Rep. 5 Ch. 1.) 663
Yeatman v. Yeatman and Rummell 401, 647, 733
Youghall Election Petition 306, 316
Young James, The (L. Rep. 3 Adm. 1; 39 L. J. 1, Adm.) 397
Young's Trusts, re 556

Digitized by Google

II.—INDEX TO DEFENDANTS.

A.

Ackworth, Coutts v. ..... page 224
Adams, Brown v. 71
Allen, Jarvis v. 280
Alsop (resp.), Thomas (app.) v. 715
Amcott and others, Phelps v. 167
Angell, Henshaw v. 784
Armstrong and others, The North of England Iron Steamship Insurance Association v. 822
Ashburner, Lord St. Leonards v. 595
Ashley (resp.), Kent (app.) v. 425
Ashton and others, Denston (Assignee, &c.) v. 20
Attorney-General, Partington v. 370

B.

Bailey, Deeks v. 581
Bailey, Dignam v. 456
Bank of England, King of Hanover v. 106
Bark, MacManus v. 676
Barrett, Hammond v. 321
Beeton, Bradbury v. 323
Bell, Foster v. 781
Bennett (Rev. W. J. E.) (resp.), Thos. B. Sheppard (app.) v. 650
Bethell, Morris v. 330
Bolton, Bolton v. 793
Bolton, Ramshire v. 50
Bonnett, Allen v. 578
Booth, Bristowe v. 427
Bousfield, Bousfield v. 136
Bowers, Bowers v. 134
Bradford, Skidmore v. 291
Bradford, The Town Clerk of (resp.), Brewer (app.) v. 462
Brand and Wife, The Hammersmith and City Railway Company v. 238
Brown and Robey, Brown v. 81
Brown, Brown v. 339
Brownlow Earl, Smith v. 739, 741
Buckingham, Smith v. 819
Buckmaster, Buckmaster v. 231
Bulman, Fenwicke v. 628
Bury Improvement Commissioners, Roberts v. 173
Butterworth (resp.), Cuthbertson (app.) v. 140

C.

Cambrian Railway Company, Griffith v. 290
Cambrian Railway Company, The Mid-Wales Railway Company v. 16
Cameron, Montgomery v. ..... page 85
Capdeveille, Capdeveille v. 660
Cardwell (resp.), Cocker (app.) v. 457
Carlisle Horse Clothing Company (Limited), Anderson v. 760
Carter, Carter v. 194
Casbolt, Reg. v. 263
Chester, Chester v. 527
Chester, Taylor v. 359
Chichester and Midhurst Railway Company, Healey v. 811
Clarendon, Earl of, Murray v. 448
Cole, Elgood v. 80
Colonial Bank of Australasia (resps.), Cherry and McDougall (apps.) v. 356
Commissioners for Administering the Laws for the Relief of the Poor for Ireland (apps.), The Select Vestry of the Parish of Liverpool (resps.) v. 636
Commissioners of Inland Revenue, Boulton v. 720
Commissioners of Inland Revenue, Hall v. 151
Commissioners of Inland Revenue, Stucley v. 718
Commissioners of Inland Revenue, The Trustees of the Royal Liverpool Friendly Society v. 721
Commissioners of Sewers for the City of London, Ferrar v. 295
Constable, Constable v. 401
Cooper, Beauchamp v. 442
Cooper, Cooper v. 197
Cooper, Darling v. 442
Cowmeadow, Roberts v. 367
Crux, Abrey v. 327

D.

Daniel, Frazer v. 723
Darnley, Earl of, Burton v. 292
Dawes (Matthew), The Estate of 322
Dawes, Dryden v. 322
Dawes, Gerrard v. 322
Dawson, Cary v. 23
Dear, Kerton v. 532
Delisle (resp.), Ryland (app.) v. 325
De Paris Comptoir, D'Escompte and others, Rodger and others v. 33
Diplock, Reg. v. 24
Dolwin (resp.), Callaghan (app.) v. 827
Donegal (Lord), and others, Chichester v. 581
Dowlen, Taylor v. 70
Drapers' Company, The, Attorney General v. 651
Drayton, Ingall v. 367
Du Bois, Richardson v. 635
Duckworth, Banbury v. 302
Dugdale, Dugdale v. 526
Dyson, Sykes v. 696

Digitized by Google

DEFENDANTS.

E.

East London Railway Company, Williams v. ...page 524
Eaton and Campbell, Eaton v. ... 733
Eaves, Reg. v. ... 829
Eckford, Haldane v. ... 87
Ensor and Mansfield, Mayor and Company of Dorchester v. ... 145
Etna Insurance Company, Antony v. ... 473
European Assurance Society, Mackie v. ... 102
Evans and another (resps.), The Chartered Bank of India, Australia, and China (apps.) v. ... 407
Evanturel François, Emilie Evanturel and Edward Rémillard v. ... 4

F.

Falkingham, Martha and Mary, Reg. v. ... 679
Fardell, Poupard v. ... 696
Farries, Conybeare v. ... 497
Fermoy (Lord), The Land Credit Company of Ireland v. ... 573
Finney, Finney v. ... 597
Fingal, The, Brothers, The, v. ... 621
Fitzpatrick, Girardot v. ... 470
Fletcher, Smith v. ... 646
Forrester, Ali v. ... 819
Free Fishers and Dredgers of Whitstable (resps.), Foreman (Richard J.) (app.) v. ... 804
French, Reg. v. ... 726
Furness Railway Company, Wilson v. ... 416

G.

Gallard, Weekes v. ... 655
Garnett, The London and North Western Railway Company v. ... 352
Garrett, Bridges v. ... 141
Gill, Alcock v. ... 704
Gilliatt, Gilliatt v. ... 522
Godfrey, Finny v. ... 631, 747
Godwin, Francis v. ... 361
Goodrich, Thrupp v. ... 652
Graham, Horsey v. ... 530
Graham and another, Mayor and Company of Carlisle v. ... 333
Grant, Grant v. ... 645
Green, Green v. ... 401
Great Eastern Railway Company, Phelps v. ... 443
Great Eastern Railway Company, Sinclair v. ... 752
Great Northern Railway, Catling v. ... 17, 769
Gregory, Badger v. ... 137
Guardians of the Biggleswade Union, Reg. v. ... 494
Guardians of the Kingston Union, Reg. v. ... 488
Gurney and others, Overend, Gurney and Company (Limited) v. ... 73

H.

Haley, Lee v. ... 546
Hamlyn, Luckin v. ... 366
Hapgood and Wyatt, Reg. v. ... 678
Harbord, Mann v. ... 436, 461
Harding, Gibbs v. ... 322
Harington (resp.), Ford (app.) v. ... 609
Harrington, and others, Reg. v. ... 57
Harrison, Alton v. ... 282
Harrison, Poyser v. ... 282
Hathway, Cook v. ... 484
Heaps and others, Nickling v. ... 754
Hebblethwaite (Queen's Proctor intervening), Hebblethwaite v. ... 732
High and another, McGregor v. ... 803
Hill, Jones v. ... 784
Hillstrom and others, Gibson and another v. ... 302
Hodge and another, Tebb v. ... 499
Hodgkiss, Reg. v. ... 564
Holden and White, Limb v. ... 731
Holland, Holland v. ... 129
Howe and another, Beckett v. ... 400
Howell, Nash v. ... page 743
Howitt, Berrie v. ... 414

I.

Inhabitants of Odell, The, Reg. v. ... 556

J.

James (resp.) Taunton Election Petition, Waygood and others (pets.) v. ... 202
Jarvis, Allen v. ... 280
Jayne and Prothero, Jayne v. ... 401
Joblin, Black v. ... 298
Johns, Oliver v. ... 597
Johnson, Graham v. ... 77
Jones and others, Egton v. ... 789
Jones (D.), Reg. v. ... 396
Justices of the West Riding of Yorkshire, Reg. v. ... 494

K.

Kelly, Kelly v. ... 564
Kennett (resp.), Durant (app.) v. ... 603
Kershaw, Kershaw v. ... 651

L.

Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Companies, Hart v. ... 261
Lancaster (resp.), Smith (app.) v. ... 492
Land and Water Company (Limited), Cox v. ... 548
Lawrence, Rushbrook v. ... 192, 447
Leaver, Sollory v. ... 453
Lee, Cox v. ... 178
Lewis, Kirkman v. ... 191
Litchfield, James v. ... 521
London and North-Western Railway Company, Anderson v. ... 756
London and North-Western Railway Company, Fair v. ... 826
London and North-Western Railway Company, Heugh and another v. ... 676
London and South-Western Railway Company, Smith v. ... 668
London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway Company, Frost v. ... 757
Lorsont, The Leather Cloth Company (Limited) v. 661
Luckie, The City Bank Company v. ... 693
Lumsden and another, The Derby Commercial Bank (Limited) v. ... 672

M.

MacGrath, Reg. v. ... 543
Mackie (E.) (resp.), Smith (G.) (app.) v. ... 392
Mackonochie (The Rev. A. H.) (resp.), Martin John (app.) v. ... 512
McKie, Westwood v. ... 165
McMullen, Giblin and others v. ... 214
Majendie, Gepp v. ... 168
Malcolm and Collins (resps.), Jones (pet.) v. ... 645
Marshall (John) Reg. v. ... 796
Marshall, Hooper v. ... 639
Martin (William), Reg. v. ... 469
Martin, Marshall v. ... 788
Martin, Southwell v. ... 185
Mayor and Assessors of Bolton, Reg. v. ... 748
Mayor and Assessors of Liverpool, Campbell v. ... 814
Mayor and Assessors of Lyme Regis, Harvey and others v. ... 227
Mayor and Assessors of Monmouth, Reg. v. ... 748
Mayor and Assessors of Wigan, Reg. v. ... 715
Meredith, Trappes v. ... 782
Mersey Docks and Harbour Board, Vivian v. ... 362
Midland Railway Company, Plant v. ... 836
Midland Railway Company (resps.), A. R. Steele (app.) v. ... 387

Digitized by Google

DEFENDANTS.

Midland Railway Company, Warburton v. ..... page 835
Milford, Milford v. 155
Miller, Miller v. 471
Miles, Bailey v. 784
Missouri, Steamer, The, The United States v. 648
Moore, Glover v. 815
Morgan, Eade v. 816
Morgan, Street v. 432
Morris, Maxsted v. 535
Morris, Pearce v. 287
Mumby, Mumby v. 155
Murphy, Michael (resp.), Attorney-General for New South Wales (app.) v. 598
Myers (resp.), The London and South-Western Railway (apps.) v. 460

N.

North-Eastern Railway Company, Flood v. 258
Northern Assam Tea Company (Limited), Higgs v. 336
North London Railway Company, Lamb v. 98
North London Railway Company, Scholer v. 835
Nottingham Local Board (resps.), Wortley (app.) v. 582

O.

O'Dowd, Hennequin v. 803
Ogle, Wall v. 654
Osborne, Hudson v. 886
Overend, Gurney and Co. (Limited) ex parte, re The Cork and Youghal Railway Company 735

P.

Pacific Fire and Marine Insurance (resps.), Anderson and another (apps.) v. 408
Palgreave, Murphy and others v. 209
Parker (William), Reg. v. 724
Parkinson, Parkinson v. 597, 732
Parr and others, The Queen of Spain v. 555
Parton and Page (Johnson intervening), Rayson v. 647
Paterson (J. B.) (resp.), J. B. Giraud (app.) v. 201
Paulet, Dawkins v. 584
Peck, Peck v. 670
Pelley, The Madrid Bank v. 13
Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company, Taylor v. 442
Pilley, Heard v. 68
Pope, Freeman v. 816
Porter, Twynam v. 851
Potter (resp.), Hall (app.) v. 454
Preston, Preston v. 846

R.

Raudnitz, Reg. v. 621
Reed, Laing v. 83, 773
Redford, Reg. v. 508
Redgate, Bates v. 410
Rue, Levy v. 717
Richards and Cook, Richards v. 598
Richards, Price v. 581
Rigby, Huddart v. 641
Ringwood Highway Board, Turner v. 745
Ritson and another, Reg. v. 437
Roberts, Powell v. 451
Rogers, Wall v. 654
Rogers and Goodman (Winterbotham intervening), Wright v. 156
Ross, Marshall v. 260
Rowe, Ross v. 349
Rowland and Miles, Rowland v. 733
Royal Bank of Liverpool, Prehn and others v. 830

S.

Saunders, Morley v. ..... page 132
Senior, Ramsbotham v. 293
Shufflebotham, Mumford and Brett v. 835
Silver, Silver v. 734
Skivington (George) and Wife v. 495
Smallbones, Edney and Lunn v. 506
Smith and others, Potts v. 54
Smith (resp.), Sadler (app.) v. 502
Smith, Williams v. 745
South-Eastern Railway Company, Walton v. 801
South-Western Railway, Wallis v. 675
Soutten, Deare v. 523
Spiller, Bramwell v. 672
St. Paul and Farquhar, St. Paul v. 108
Stainer, Reg. v. 758
Stott, Plant v. 106
Stroud, Boun v. 695
Strutton, The London and Mediterranean Bank (Limited) v. 415

T.

Taplin, Leney and another v. 204
Tatham, Ross v. 351
Taylor and others, Williams v. 612
Thompson, Reg. v. 397
Tourle, Catt v. 188
Traill (resp.), Wilson and another (app.) v. 510
Tribe, Wollaston v. 449
Turner, Gladwell v. 674
Turner, Knox v. 701

U.

Udall, Silver v. 660
United Kingdom Electric Telegraph Company (Limited), Playford v. 21

V.

Verity, Dear v. 185

W.

Wait, Baker v. 632
Walker, Salter v. 860
Wallasey Local Board of Health, Reg. v. 90
Walls, Heald v. 705
Ward, Tonge v. 480
Ward, Ward v. 699
Waterlow and others, Ames v. 393
Webb, Walters v. 657
Weeding, The Landed Estates Company (Limited) 384
Wheble, Blount v. 259
Williams, Bourton v. 781
Williams, Giffard v. 575
Williamson, Reg. v. 444
Winn, Beauchamp (Earl) v. 253
Wix, Bishop Sumner v. 766
Wix, Bishop of Winchester 489
Wood, Barnes v. 227
Woodgate, Mercer v. 458
Wolverhampton and Walsall Railway Company, Whitehouse and another v. 558
Worthy (resp.), Allen (app.) v. 665
Wright and others (resps.) Gossip (app.) v. 271

Y.

Yeatman and Rummell, Yeatman v. 401, 647, 733
Yeend, Simpson v. 56
Young and another, Peacock v. 527

Digitized by Google

IN THE FOLLOWING APPEALS THE DECISIONS OF THE COURTS BELOW WERE REVERSED.

Attorney-General for New South Wales (app.) v. Michael Murphy (resp.) ..... page 598

Barned's Banking Company (Limited), re, ex parte the Bank of London 126

Chartered Bank of India, Australia, and China (apps.) v. Evans and another (resps.) 407

Cuthbertson (app.) v. Butterworth (resp.) 140

Durant (app.) v. Kennett (resp.) 603

Ferrar v. The Commissioners of Sewers for the City of London 295

Hammersmith and City Railway Company v. Brand and Wife 238

Heyford Company (Limited), re, Pell's case ... page 412

Holland v. Holland 129

Laing v. Reed 773

Lush's Trusts, re 876

Natal Investment Company (Limited), re, ex parte Snell 445

Overend, Gurney, and Co. (Limited) v. Gurney and others 73

Peacock v. Young and another 527

Velocity, The 686

Warwick Hastings Ryland (app.) v. Alexander M. Delisle (resp.) 235

Digitized by Google

INDEX TO SUBJECTS OF CASES.

ABANDONMENT OF CHILD.
(See Criminal Law.)

ABATEMENT.
(See Administration—Will.)

ACCIDENT, DEATH OR INJURY BY.
Collision, caused by the engine driver being seized with a fit—Pointsman turning engine on to branch line to avoid collision with express train on main line ....page 261
Liability for misconduct of servants upon the premises 301
Measure of damages in—Pecuniary loss and bodily suffering—Future improved income to be taken into account 326
By falling down an unprotected opening in the floor of the saloon of a steamer 442
What is evidence of negligence 443
Negligence—Unfastened door of railway carriage.... 835
By wrongful act of a third person 835
By train overshooting the platform 836
(See Railway.)

ACKNOWLEDGMENT.
By married woman, inability to obtain—Subsequent sale and acknowledgment.... 227
(See Fine and Recovery.)

ADMINISTRATION.
Insufficient assets—Abatement and apportionment of annuities 54
Suit for—Distribution of assets—Executor—Creditor omitting to send in claim in due time loses his remedy.... 351
Letters of—Stamp duty—Accretions of interest—Husband dying without having administered to wife—Property to be distributed abroad—Domicile 370
Marshalling assets — Deficiency of personalty—Abatement by pecuniary legatee and real estate rateably 526
(See Probate Court—Will.)

ADMIRALTY COURT.
Practice—County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act, ss. 3, 9—Cause of damage—Costs.... 397
Salvage—Form of tender—Meaning of "costs (if any) due by law"—Practice 472
Jurisdiction—Lien on ship—Revenue laws—Penalty—Proceedings in rem and in personam 648
Practice—Where liability of owner is limited, court will give interest on the limited amount 681
Practice—Limited liability—Jurisdiction when ship is not under arrest.... 683
Co-owners—Parting with his interest by one—Jurisdiction of court to adjust ....page 683
Collision—"Vessels crossing"—Admiralty Court, rule 14 686
County Court Admiralty Jurisdiction Act—Order to institute proceedings in this court 727
Practice—Inspection of documents—Unnecessary motion—Costs.... 727
Mortgage of ship—Fraudulent preference 727
County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act—Gen. Ord. 87—Cross causes—Appeal—Jurisdiction.... 729
Practice—Damage — Pleading — Special Defence—Costs.... 761
Practice—Decree—Amendment.... 762
Bottomry—Money advanced on personal security—Subsequent bond—Further advances 763
Salvage—Practice—Value—Jurisdiction — Estoppel 765
Salvage—Unperformed agreement.... 797
Material man—Materials and supplies at foreign port—Necessaries—Lien 798
(See Maritime Law.)

AFFIDAVIT.
Of documents—Further affidavit—Costs 704
(See Practice.)

AGENT.
(See Principal and Agent.)

AGREEMENT.
For a lease contained in letters varied by parol.... 185
Suit to rectify an alleged mutual mistake—Grant of "a warren," what passes by 253
An agreement in writing may be made by telegram 361
In fieri between mortgagor and mortgagee—Abandonment—Specific performance 477
For a lease and mortgage—Money advanced on security of premises and fixtures 499
To procure transfer of a lease—Statute of Frauds... 530
For payment of amount of a promissory note by instalments — Absence of consideration — Nudum pactum 676
In writing cannot be qualified by subsequent conversations 695
A receipt for deposit, duly stamped, will support a bill for specific performance.... 695
(See Contract—Frauds, Statute of—Specific Performance.)

AIDING AND ABETTING.
(See Criminal Law.)

ALEHOUSE.
(See Beerhouse—Innkeeper.)

Digitized by Google

SUBJECTS OF CASES.

ANNUITY.

In gross—General charge of debts—Legacy and annuity—Receiver—Right of distress ..... page 453
Survivorship — Construction of order of court—Consent binding on married woman..... 652
Grant of, to secure a loan—Assurance on grantor's life by way of security—Repurchase of annuity—Grantor's right to the policy 701

APPEAL.

For costs only—Practice..... 70
From a Consular Court as to nominal interest 200
Application for leave to, against an order made in chambers for taxation of a bill of costs..... 280
Against poor-rate—What is the next practicable sessions 494
Time for entering under the Bankruptcy Law Consolidation Act 573
From Arches Court to Privy Council—Rule 14—Period between bringing in petition of appeal and hearing..... 650
From magistrates—Case how to be stated—Ground of appeal not distinctly raised..... 748
Right of a friendly society to appeal from decision of a justice 827
Against a conviction under Excise Acts—Notice ... 829

(See Practice.)

APPOINTMENT, POWER OF.

(See Power.)

ARBITRATION AND AWARD.

Under Lands Clauses Act—Possession—Interest—Costs..... 17
Fees allowed to counsel on 752

ARCHES COURT.

Practice—Resignation of bishop, the promoter of a suit—Abatement—Amendment 439
Appeal from, to Privy Council—Rule 14—Period between bringing in petition of appeal and hearing—Contumacious non-appearance 650
Ritualism—Gospel lights—Lighted candles—Incense—Interval between services 766

(See Ecclesiastical Law.)

ARTICLED CLERK.

Former service under expired articles — Fresh articles—Computation of former service 638

(See Attorney and Solicitor.)

ASSIGNMENT.

Of proceeds of future sale of a commission 815

ATTACHMENT.

(See Garnishee.)

ATTORNEY-GENERAL.

When not a necessary party to a suit 553

ATTORNEY AND SOLICITOR.

Solicitor to a winding-up discharged — Lien for unpaid costs 46
Money paid by client to a solicitor to invest on mortgage paid by solicitor to his private banking account—Death of solicitor before investment—Can client claim in specie his balance at the bank..... 71
Taxation of bill of costs—Direction to master to assist the judge—Cons. Ord. XL., rule 25—Order in chambers—No adjournment into court—Application for leave to appeal 280
Privilege of the solicitor of parent of a ward of court as to stating residence 292
Privilege of a solicitor as to knowledge of the place of concealment of wards of court stated to him by their mother whose solicitor he was..... 298
Charge for costs on property recovered—Injunction to restrain payment of money out of court—Attorneys' and Solicitors' Act.....page 322
If an order can be made ex parte on the solicitor to a creditors' assignee, having money of the bankrupt's estate in his hands, to pay it over 341
Solicitor and client—Charge on the property recovered for the amount of costs 414
Costs of uncertificated solicitor—Taxation of costs on order obtained by client..... 482
The Abolition of Imprisonment for Debt Act does not prevent an attachment against a solicitor for non-payment of money ordered by the court to be paid..... 692
Solicitor and client—Bill for an account—Trustee and cestui que trust 743
Liability for negligence—Money standing in court—Petition for payment out to the wrong person Alleged mistake in title of the account—Order to refund 808

(See Articled Clerk—Costs—Practice.)

AUCTION.

Sale of land by—Reserved price—Employment of puffer 30 & 31 Vict. c. 48 522
Mock auction—Obtaining money under influence of a threat 543

AWARD.

(See Arbitration and Award.)

BAILMENT.

Liability of a gratuitous bailee—Deposit of property at a banker's 214

BANKER AND BANKING.

Money paid to a solicitor by his client to invest in mortgage paid by him to his general banking account—Death of solicitor without investing—Breach of trust—Whether balance at banker's can be claimed in specie—Appropriation of drafts by customer 71
Deposit of property with, for safe custody without charge—Liability of gratuitous bailee 214
Money carried to special account at bank—Bankruptcy—Fraudulent preference 407
Agreement by bank to accept and pay plaintiffs' bills—Breach—Whether contract or tort—Measure of damages 830

(See Joint Stock Company.)

BANKRUPTCY.

Assignee of bankrupt suing for the benefit of the estate—Security for costs..... 20
Contingent debt not proveable under—Liability in an action—12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, s. 178—24 & 25 Vict. c. 133, s. 154 23
Sect. 192—Deed of assignment—Inequality—Partnership-deed—Computation of assets 112
Application to dismiss petition for adjudication after registration of a trust deed..... 154
Post-nuptial settlement with provisions against rights of creditors 321
Debts contracted in England—Limited trading in Ireland—Petition to cancel adjudication on the ground that there was no bonâ fide trading in Ireland..... 846
Solicitor to creditor's assignee—Money in his hands belonging to bankrupt's estate—Order to pay it over if it can be made ex parte 341
Conditional order of discharge—Right of bankrupt to, where not guilty of any of the offences in sect. 159 of Bankruptcy Act 1861—Discretion of the court 342
Adjudication—Privilege of Parliament—Can a peer be made a bankrupt 368
Sale of goodwill by assignee 386
Registrar's certificate of composition—An action will not lie against the sheriff for detaining a person who has obtained a certificate..... 803

Digitized by Google

SUBJECTS OF CASES.

Fraudulent preference—Money of bankrupt carried to special account at bank ....page 407
Reviver by assignee of a bankrupt plaintiff—Costs 484
Appeal—Time for entering—Bankruptcy Law Consolidation Act, ss. 12, 14, and 16—Gen. Ord. 32... 573
Mortgage eighteen months prevfous to bankruptcy and subsequent notice—13 Eliz. c. 5..... 578
A deed of assignment divests the bankrupt of all interest, and a pending suit by him will be dismissed 581
Assignees—Election to take the benefit of a lease—Acts evidencing intention to elect—Possession for a limited period—Action for rent under a lease... 612
Trust-deed—Right to registration—Rule 316, Jan. 1, 1870 624
Practice—Petition for adjudication—Form of in schedule of forms, No. 10—Rules 29 and 32 625
Practice—Dismissal of debtor's summons—Notice of hearing—Rule 22, Jan. 1..... 625
Cmpoosition-deed—Sureties—Bankruptcy Act 1861, s. 192—Pleading..... 639
Adjudication—Petitioning creditor's debt—Bills accepted by bankrupt and taken up by drawer after act of bankruptcy—If a good petitioning creditor's debt 664
Assignee—Paying out distress—Right to be recouped 684
Bankruptcy Act 1869, s. 13—Interim injunction to restrain sale by sheriff 685
Bankruptcy Act 1869, ss. 13 and 78—Injunction—Receiver—Power to make general orders..... 685
Bankruptcy Act 1869, s. 125—Liquidation—Court will not interfere to restrain creditors from pursuing their legal remedies without due notice given to them..... 685
Annulment of—Forfeiture 782
Form of plea where order of discharge is not obtained till after action brought 784
Practice—Petition for adjudication—Hearing—Creditor not attending—Dismissal 802
Assignees not entitled to damages in tort recovered by a bankrupt 802
Practice—Affidavit, Form No. 2—Gen. Ord. Jan. 1—Need not be made by creditor himself—Service of particulars of demand 802
Inspectorship-deed—Shares in a company—Order to pay future calls in a winding-up 812

(See Winding-up—Debtors' Act.)

BEGIN, RIGHT TO.

Practice as to revenue cases 25, 58
Rule as to..... 173

BEERHOUSE.

Licensing Act (32 & 33 Vict. c. 20), s. 7—When notice of intention to apply for certificate must be given—Adjourned licensing day..... 490

(See Innkeeper.)

BENEFIT SOCIETY.

Borrowing powers—Certificate of barrister to rules—Bill to restrain borrowing—Demurrer 773

(See Friendly Society.)

BIGAMY.

(See Criminal Law.)

BILL OF EXCHANGE.

Liability of indorser—Verbal evidence of an agreement not to sue till a certain time 327
Forged acceptance—Liability of person whose name was forged, he having paid one other similar bill 330
Notice of dishonour—Ignorance of drawer's address—What is reasonable time 674

(See Promissory Note.)

BILL OF LADING.

(See Maritime Law.)

BILL OF SALE.

What is a sufficient description of occupation in the affidavit .....page 366

BIRTH.

Registrar's certificate when not evidence of 781

(See Evidence.)

BOAT RACE.

Jurisdiction of referee—No start—Paying over the stakes 502

(See Gaming.)

BOND.

Voluntary—Assignee for valuable consideration—Forbearance to sue 77

BOTTOMRY.

(See Maritime Law.)

BRIBERY.

Of a voter at a municipal election 56

(See Election Law.)

BROKER.

Liability of London and country brokers on purchase of shares 432

(See Stock Exchange.)

BUILDING SOCIETY.

(See Benefit Society.)

BURGLARY.

(See Criminal Law.)

BURIALS.

Dedication of ground—Reverter of fee simple—Notice to treat—Admission of title 814

CANADA.

Will in Lower Canada—Coutume de Paris, Art. 289—Dicté et nommé 4

(See Colonial Law.)

CARRIERS.

(See Railway.)

CHARITY.

Gift for the benefit of the Scotch Church—Free Church—Cy près 165
Gift for digging a public well void 191

(See Mortmain.)

CHARTER-PARTY.

(See Maritime Law.)

CHILD, ABANDONMENT OR EXPOSURE OF.

(See Criminal Law.)

CHURCH, LAW OF.

(See Ecclesiastical Law.)

CHURCH RATES.

Loan by Public Works Commissioners for repair of church—Rate to repay—Objections to validity of rate—Omission of churchwardens to make required declaration 506

(See Ecclesiastical Law.)

CLERGY, LAW OF.

(See Ecclesiastical Law.)

Digitized by Google

SUBJECTS OF CASES.

COINING.

(See Criminal Law.)

COLLISION.

(See Maritime Law.)

COLONIAL LAW. page

Lower Canada—Will—Coutume de Paris Art. 289 4
Appeal from Victoria—Deposit of property at a banker's—Liability of a gratuitous bailee 214
Lower Canada—Railways—Action against shareholder—President of a company with a salary—Compensation 325
Victoria—Personal liability of directors—Misrepresentation of authority without fraud—Implied warranty 356
Victoria—Garnishee summons—Property subject to attachment—What is property "belonging to defendant" or in which he is "beneficially interested"—Property entrusted to defendant for sale 510
New South Wales—Conviction for felony—Venire de novo—Access of jury to the newspapers—Jurisdiction of the Supreme Colonial Court—Irregularity not avoiding verdict—Remedy 598
Practice of the Consular Court—Collision—Arrest of ship on voyage with care—Security for costs and damages of detention 621

COMMON.

Right of—Freehold and copyhold tenants—Suit by one tenant of the manor on behalf of all—Appointment—Evidence 739

COMMON LAW PROCEDURE ACTS.

1854, s. 51—Interrogatories 673

COMPOSITION-DEED.

(See Bankruptcy.)

CONSIDERATION.

Forbearance to sue a good consideration for a promise to pay only where a right to sue exists 77
Bail money handed to another for immoral purposes—Action to recover it back—Maxim, In pari delicto 359

(See Deed.)

CONSIGNOR AND CONSIGNEE.

Assignment by insolvent consignees to secure antecedent debt before arrival of bills of lading—Indorsement—Special stipulation as to remittances 33

(See Maritime Law.)

CONSTANTINOPLE.

Appeal from—Lease—Imprisonment of lessee—Collection of crops by lessor—Re-entry on abandonment—Appeal 200

CONTEMPT.

Committal of a receiver for 781

(See Practice.)

CONTRACT.

Specific performance—What is sufficient allegation of the contract—Agreement made with agent not appointed in writing—Statute of Frauds 68
Construction of—Right of employers to determine, in default of contractor making due progress and using due diligence in the judgment of employers' architects 173
For sale and purchase of goods, contained in a series of letters—Proposal and acceptance—Cheque on account—Agreement to be drawn up—Conditions precedent to contract—Introduction of new terms 204
Recovery back of money paid to another for immoral purposes 359
Relation of vendor and purchaser—Time for payment of purchase-money—Arbitration and award long after possession—Costs ..... page 769
For schooling—Evidence of a collateral breach in order to reduce amount of claim 803
Agreement by bank to accept and pay plaintiff's bills—Refusal to pay—Action for breach—Whether contract or tort—Measure of damages 830

(See Agreement—Frauds, Statute of—Limitations, Statute of—Vendor and Purchaser.)

CONTRIBUTORY.

(See Winding-up.)

CONVERSION.

Of real estate—Assignment of personal estate in expectancy 163

COPYHOLD.

Payment of fine to a deputy-steward by a crossed cheque is an insufficient payment to the lord 141
Appointment of trustee to hold for customary heir out of jurisdiction—Two fines not payable 427
Seizure quousque—Statute of Limitations 657
Covenant to surrender—Death of covenantor before surrender—Lunatic heir—Appointment of person to convey—Trustee Act 1860, ss. 3, 20 739
Rights of common—Freehold and copyhold tenants—Suit by one on behalf of all 739

COPYRIGHT.

Piracy of title of a periodical—Punch and Judy 323
Of a newspaper in its articles—Copy of a hunting list 518

CORONER.

Election of—The legality of votes received by sheriff cannot be questioned on quo warranto 210

CORPORATION, MUNICIPAL.

(See Municipal Corporation.)

COST BOOK.

(See Mines and Mining—Winding-up.)

COSTS.

Security for, where assignee of a bankrupt sues for the benefit of the estate 20
Of a solicitor to a winding-up discharged without payment—Lien for 46
Solicitor's charge for property recovered—Injunction to restrain payment of money out of court 322
Charge for, by a solicitor on the property recovered 414
Review of taxation—Costs of entering cause provisionally—Costs of appeal from master to judge at chambers 436
Where plea is bad, but there is a verdict for the defendant on the merits 456
Of an appeal from a revising barrister 462
In an injunction against use of trade-mark 480
Purchase-money paid into court—Insolvent railway—Order as to 481
Of an uncertificated solicitor—Taxation on order obtained by client 482
Of appeal from the County Court 497
On non-production of necessary documents on a motion for a new rule 530
In a partition suit 575
Of witnesses not called in a divorce suit 597
Taxation—Commission to examine witnesses abroad—Legal advice—Letter of instruction to commissioners 641
Taxation of surveyor's charges—Commission on purchase-money—"Ryde's scale" 651
Of an appeal to quarter sessions are within the exceptions in sect. 4 of the Debtors' Act 1869 750
Fees to counsel in an arbitration 752

Digitized by Google

SUBJECTS OF CASES.

Fees to counsel on a writ of inquiry ..... page 757
Slander—Effect of certificate of judge 788
(See Attorney and Solicitor—Practice.)

COUNSEL.

Right to begin in revenue cases 25, 58
Right to begin 173
Production of document to a witness on cross-examination for purpose of identification—Right of counsel on the other side to inspect it 670
Fees allowed to, in an arbitration 752
Fees allowed for in a writ of inquiry 757
(See Evidence—Practice.)

COUNTY COURTS.

Admiralty Jurisdiction Act (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71), ss. 3, 9—Cause of damage—Costs 397
Equitable jurisdiction—Redemption suit—Right to redeem resisted—28 & 29 Vict. c. 99, s. 1 451
Practice—Sufficiency of notice of appeal—Costs of appeal 497
Equitable Jurisdiction Act 1868, ss. 3, 10—Practice—Transfer of plaint to Court of Chancery 632
Order of commitment made before Jan. 1, but not executed till after, is, by Debtors' Act 1869, void 723
Admiralty—Order to institute proceedings before court above 727
Equity—Will—Annuity charged on house—Sale of house without notice 745
Slander—Costs—Effect of certificate of judge 788

COVENANT.

In conveyance in fee of a public-house that vendor shall supply beer—Uncertainty—Want of mutuality—Restraint of trade 188
Not to use a house as a beerhouse does not extend to sale of beer not to be consumed on the premises... 352
Not to assign lease without licence—Breach—Forfeiture 789
(See Contract—Deed.)

CREDITOR.

(See Debtor and Creditor.)

CRIMINAL LAW.

Practice—Order of speech where two prisoners separately defended 57
Night poaching—Limitation of proceedings—9 Geo. 4, c. 69, s. 4 263
Bigamy—Jury must be satisfied that the prisoner knew his first wife was alive at the time of the second marriage—But such knowledge need not be affirmatively proved by the prosecutor 396
Housebreaking implements—Although found on one only of a party, the others are guilty of the misdemeanor of possession, if with him for the purpose of housebreaking 397
Forgery, by antedating a deed 437
False pretences—Misrepresentation as to the value of a business 444
Coining—Having possession of a counterfeit coin after a previous conviction—Course of proof at the trial 469
Embezzlement—Master and servant—Benefit Building Society—Secretary—Trustees 508
Larceny—Obtaining money under influence of a threat—Mock auction 543
Perjury—False oath at common law—Affidavit under Bills of Sale Act 564
Practice—Conviction for felony—Venire de novo—New trial—Access of jury to newspapers—Jurisdiction of Supreme Court of New South Wales—Irregularity not avoiding verdict—Remedy 598
Bankruptcy—Production of London Gazette sufficient proof of adjudication of bankruptcy 621
Rape—Aiding and abetting—A person may be convicted of aiding and abetting another in an attempt to commit a rape 678
Abandonment or exposure of a child, what is—Sending it in a basket by rail 679
Practice—Deposition—The signature of the magistrate at the end of the collected depositions is sufficient ..... page 724
Practice—Indictment—Amendment of by judge—Surplusage 724
Forgery—A "clearance" certificate of payment of dues to a friendly society is not an acquittance or receipt 726
False pretences—Sale of goods obtained by—Seizure in the hands of vendee—In whom the property vests 754
Embezzlement—By an officer of a trades union ... 758
Embezzlement—A commission agent not a clerk or servant 796

DAMAGES, MEASURE OF.

In death or injury by accident—Pecuniary loss and bodily suffering—Future improved income 326
For piracy of a trade-mark 480
In an action for the conversion of fixtures is their value in their severed state 803
Contract by bank to accept and pay plaintiff's bills—Breach 830

DEATH (PRESUMPTION OF).

After disappearance for seven years 107

DEBENTURE.

(See Joint Stock Company.)

DEBTORS' ACT.

1869—Commitment by a County Court judge made previous to 1st Jan., but not executed till afterwards, is void 723
Sect. 4—Costs of an appeal to quarter sessions are within the exception 750

DEBTOR AND CREDITOR.

Bills drawn for a share in a partnership—Subsequent failure—Insolvency at date of the bills—General and separate creditors 223
Fraudulent deed—Security to creditors—Possession by creditor though the whole property is conveyed—Preference—Subsequent sequestration—13 Eliz. c. 5 282
Post-nuptial settlement of a debtor with provision in case of bankruptcy—Rights of creditors 321
Judgment-creditor—Right to take equitable estate for life 343
A creditor of a person deceased omitting to send in his claim in due time loses his remedy against the estate 351
Fraudulent preference—Bankruptcy—Money carried to separate account at the bank 407
Action for goods sold—What is evidence of appropriation? 470
Assignment of future sale of a commission to secure a debt 815
Validity of a voluntary settlement as against creditors 816
(See Bankruptcy—Frauds, Statute of—Winding-up.)

DEED.

Fraudulent—Security to creditors—Possession by debtor notwithstanding conveyance of all his property 282

DEMURRAGE.

(See Maritime Law.)

DERELICT.

(See Maritime Law.)

DIRECTORS.

(See Joint-Stock Company—Winding-up.)

DISTRESS.

Right of a receiver to distrain for an annuity in gross 453

Digitized by Google

SUBJECTS OF CASES

DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES.

Divorce—Practice—Intervention of Queen's Proctor—Neglect and conduct conducing to adultery page 108
Divorce—Alimony pendente lite—No answer to petition—Respondent's capacity proved by affidavit ... 155
Judicial separation—Wife's suit—Permanent alimony—Custody and maintenance of children—20 & 21 Vict. c. 85, s. 35 ... 155
Divorce—Connivance—Wilful neglect—Costs ... 181
Desertion—Covenant by wife not to insist on cohabitation—Subsequent petition for restitution of conjugal rights ... 231
Practice—Alimony pendente lite—Witnesses examined in support of petition—Husband's right to cross-examine ... 401
Restraint of conjugal rights—Pleading ... 401
Divorce—Former suit pleaded in answer ... 401
Divorce—Counter charge of cruelty—Pleading ... 401
Divorce—Decree nisi—Queen's Proctor intervening—Reversal of decree—Costs ... 401
Practice—Restitution of conjugal rights—Husband successful—Wife condemned in costs—20 & 21 Vict. c. 85, s. 51 ... 471
Judicial separation—Suit for—Wife's health—Decree 564
Divorce—Practice—Desertion not proved—Charge of cruelty subsequently added ... 597
Practice—Costs of witnesses not called—Maintenance money ... 597
Practice—Suspected connivance of husband—Decree suspended—Queen's Proctor put in motion ... 598
Practice—Divorce—Costs of former suit not paid—Stet processus refused ... 647
Desertion—Separation deed ... 732
Divorce—Practice—Evidence of adultery—Witness not bound to answer—Evidence Act 1869 ... 732
Divorce—Practice—Co-respondent allowed to come in and traverse after two years ... 733
Divorce—Prior decree of judicial separation pleaded 733
Decree—Alimony pendente lite—Allowance to wife from her father ... 733 Divorce—Wife's suit—Bigamy pleaded by husband—Answer on oath ... 734

DOMICIL.

Animus manendi—Length of residence previous to decease—Implied domicil—Costs of inquiry ... 87
Property in France and England—French domicil of origin—Vault and burial of wife and child ... 660

(See International Law.)

ECCLESIASTICAL LAW.

Practice—Resignation of bishop, the promoter in a suit—Abatement—Amendment ... 439
Church rates—31 & 32 Vict. c. 109, s. 3—Loan by Public Works Commissioners for repair of church—Rate to repay—Objections to validity of—Omission of re-elected churchwardens to make declaration required by 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 62, s. 9—Non-assessment of tithe rent-charge ... 506
Monition—Motion to enforce obedience—Communion service—Lighted candles—Elevation of the paten—Kneeling during consecration—Rubrics 512
Appeal from Arches Court to Privy Council—Rule 14—Period between bringing in petition of appeal and hearing—Contumacious non-appearance in the court below ... 650
Ritualism—Gospel Lights—Lighted candles beside the Communion Table—Incense—Interval between services—Injunctions of Edward VI. ... 766
Burials Act—Dedication of ground—Reverter of fee simple—Notice to treat for admission of title ... 814

ELECTION LAW.

I. Registration.
II. Election Petitions.

I. Registration.

Borough franchise—Tenant of a dwelling-house allowing a lodger to use his sitting room—Joint occupation—Costs of appeal ... 462
Borough franchise—Tenant of chambers in the Temple—Part of chambers in occupation of under tenants ... page 492
County vote—Incumbent of a district church—Fees on baptism and marriage—Stipend paid by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners ... 532
Borough—Occupation by a member of a corporation, if as owner or tenant ... 603
Borough—Occupation by a canon residentiary of property of the Dean and Chapter ... 609

II. Election Petitions.

Scrutiny—Practice—Procedure—Bribery—Intimidation—Influence—Promises—Evidence ... 113
Scrutiny—Agreement by voters to pair off—Fraudulent contrivance ... 113
Scrutiny—Residence of voters ... 114
Scrutiny—Residence by wife ... 115
Scrutiny—Parochial relief ... 115
Scrutiny—Occupation of a cowhouse and land ... 115
Treating—Meaning of term "corruptly"—Agency—Evidence—Muncipal election—Bribery—Practice—Costs ... 117
Illegal acts not vitiating an election—Political association—Effect of subscription to as constituting agency—Bribery—Payment of rates ... 122
Borough franchise—Occupation of chambers ... 140
Agency of a political association—Liability of candidate for its acts—Barristers' court money—Corruption by strangers—Scrutiny ... 169
Effect of the decision of the judge that candidate claiming the seat should have been returned—Subsequent petition against the amended return 202
Bribery—Charitable gift may be—Intimidation by vigilance committee—Treachery by agent—Acts not affecting the election—Costs ... 210
Bribery—Barristers' court money—Agency of a registration association—Lavish expenditure by candidate to obtain influence—Municipal and Parliamentary elections—Evidence to connect—Treating—Agency—Employment of voters ... 234
Agency—Coalition of candidates—Undue influence—Landlords turning out tenants—Employers dismissing servants—Threats to withdraw custom—Treating—Employment of persons guilty of corrupt practices—Evidence ... 264
Bribery—Offers of money—Watchers—Colourable employment—Lavish expenditure—Money given to a mob—Largesse and alms given to poor persons—Excessive payments to agents—Treating—If illegal in Ireland—Treating before dissolution or issue of writ—Definition of "candidate"—Practice—Preliminary objection—Amendment—Particulars—Costs ... 306
Treating before issue of the writ—Corrupt Practices Act, s. 4—Definition of "candidate" ... 316
Treating—Payment of travelling expenses—Practice—Value of decisions of the House of Commons—Procedure—Costs ... 352
Intimidation—Inflammatory addresses—Personal responsibility of candidate—Spiritual influence—Mob riot—Organised system—Majority of good votes—Subsequent intimidation ... 402
Commissioners for inquiry into corrupt practices—Power of to adjourn—Jurisdiction—Commitment 418
The same question in the Court of Exchequer ... 464
Bribery—Subscription to political societies—Paying expenses of candidates—Application of money subscribed—Corrupt intent—Double candidature 475
Canvassing by the clergy—Responsibility of a candidate—Hiring of mobs—Intimidation—Corrupt treating ... 567
Practice—Withdrawal of petition—Costs ... 645
Bribery—Paying money to get voter out of prison—Authority to canvass—Employment of cars—Payment of money at revision courts—Costs ... 709

EMBEZZLEMENT.

(See Criminal Law.)

EQUITY OF REDEMPTION.

(See Mortgage.)

Digitized by Google

SUBJECTS OF CASES.

EVIDENCE.

Presumption of death after disappearance for seven years.....page 107
An agreement for a lease contained in letters—Variation by parol..... 185
Of negligence by the pointsman of a railway company..... 261
Privileged communication by the solicitor to the parent of a ward of court as to the place of concealment 292, 293
Production of envelopes of letters addressed by a mother, who had concealed a ward of court, to her solicitor 293
Verbal, of an agent not to sue on a bill of exchange for a certain time 327
Of pecuniary means in an action for seduction 360
An agreement in writing may be made by telegram 361
In bigamy—Jury must be satisfied that prisoner knew his first wife was living at the time of the second marriage, though the prosecution is not bound to prove it affirmatively 396
In housebreaking—Possession by one of a party of implements of housebreaking is evidence against the rest..... 397
What is a privileged communication in an action for slander..... 302
Of malice in an action for malicious prosecution ... 442
What is reasonable cause of negligence by a railway company? 443
Of appropriation in an action for goods sold 470
Of title arising from long possession—Effect of—Statute of Limitations 595
Production of the London Gazette in a prosecution under the Bankruptcy Law is sufficient proof of adjudication of bankruptcy..... 621
Parol, admitted to explain doubtful description in a will 645
Production of a written document to a witness on cross-examination in order to identify handwriting—Right of opposite counsel to inspect 670
Entries against interest in an account book..... 670
In patent law—Sufficiency of specification—What evidence admissible 696
The depositions taken by a magistrate in a criminal case are sufficiently signed at the end of the whole 726
Evidence Act 1869—Divorce Court—Adultery 732
Of date of birth—Registrar's certificate..... 781
Of a collateral breach of a contract, to reduce amount of claim 803
Of the existence of a port..... 804

EXCHANGE, BILL OF.

(See Bill of Exchange.)

EXCISE.

Conviction—Notice of appeal—Practice—Notice of hearing—Adverse party 829

EXECUTION.

(See Judgment—Sheriff.)

EXECUTOR.

Foreign—Receipt of dividends from a company winding-up—Probate duty..... 575

(See Probate Court—Will.)

EXPOSURE OF A CHILD.

(See Criminal Law.)

FACTORY ACTS.

An open quarry where the stone is worked is not a "factory;" nor is such working a "manufacturing process" 425

FALSE IMPRISONMENT.

Action for—What is reasonable cause—Evidence of malice 442

FALSE PRETENCES.

(See Criminal Law.)

FELONY.

Property in goods obtained by false pretences and sold .....page 754

(See Criminal Law.)

FINE AND RECOVERY.

Practice—Acknowledgment by wife apart from her husband—Commissioners interested or concerned in the transaction—Sects. 79 and 80 332

FISHERY.

By grant from the Crown in a tidal river—Effect of change in the channel 833

FIXTURES.

In an action for conversion of the measure of damages is their value in their severed state 803

FORFEITURE.

Of lease for assignment without licence 789

FORGERY.

(See Criminal Law.)

FRAUD.

Obtaining money on false representations—Demurrer—Jurisdiction of equity 50
Fraudulent deed of security to creditors—Possession of property retained by the debtor though all his property is conveyed—Preference—Stat. 13 Eliz. c. 6..... 282
A married woman may by a fraud preclude herself from any right to a reversionary interest falling due after the death of her husband 376
Fraudulent preference—Money carried to special account at bank..... 407

(See Criminal Law.)

FRAUDS, STATUTE OF.

Agreement made by an agent whose appointment is not alleged to be in writing—What sufficient allegation of contract 68
An agreement for a sale and purchase within sect. 4, may be made by telegraphic message 361
An agreement to procure the transfer of a lease in a contract as to an interest in land under sect. 4 ... 530

(See Agreement—Contract.)

FRIENDLY SOCIETY.

Winding-up — Petition — Resolution ultra vires—Priority of rights—Acquiescence of petitioner ... 8
Certificate of rules—6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 32 88
Stamp on transfer of mortgage to—Exemption 721
Reference to a justice—Right of appeal—Sects. 2 and 5 827

(See Benefit Society.)

GAME.

What passes by a grant of "a warren"—"Warren of conies" 253

GAMING.

Boat race — Referee — Jurisdiction — No start—Paying over the stakes..... 502

GAOL.

(See Prison.)

GARNISHEE.

Summons—What property is subject to attachment—Property "belonging to" or in which defendant is "beneficially interested"—Property intrusted to defendant for sale 510

Digitized by Google

SUBJECTS OF CASES.

GOODS SOLD.

Action for—What is evidence of appropriation page 470
Agreed terms of payment, for 760
(See Vendor and Purchaser.)

HARBOUR.

Dues—Local Harbour Act for Lyme Regis—Goods "landed within harbour," what are—Tolls payable thereon 227
(See Maritime Law.)

HEALTH, PUBLIC.

Compensation for premises injuriously affected—11 & 12 Vict. c. 63, ss. 69, 144 90
Notice to do works—Part valid, part invalid 454

HIGHWAY.

Removal of soil from side of—What is—Scrapings... 392
Right by custom to plough up a footpath 458
Repair of—Justices have no jurisdiction to order if waywarden denies it to be a highway—Bonâ fide reviewal of decision as to 556
Act 1862—Right of board to cut trees on the side of the highway 745

HOUSEBREAKING IMPLEMENTS, POSSESSION OF.

(See Criminal Law.)

HUSBAND AND WIFE.

Agreement to execute a separation-deed—Specific performance 322
Fraud by a married woman with respect to assigning her reversionary interest—Marital influence—Declaration by her to purchaser that she had duly assigned 376
Sale to husband for use by his wife of a noxious article compounded by the vendor—Action by husband and wife for damages—Tort to wife arising out of the contract with the husband—Duty of seller—Warranty—Negligence 495
Desertion—Remedy in equity against the husband for money advanced for necessaries 523
Will of married woman—Separation deed—Scotch divorce—Will not republished after death of husband 596
Authority of wife to pledge the credit of a lunatic husband—Repairs of a house 635
Annuity—Survivorship — Construction of order—Consent binding on a wife 652
Compromise of suit by a married woman—Power of court to sanction 654
Order of justices upon husband to maintain his wife not avoided by offer of the husband to take her back— Justices have a discretion 715
(See Divorce and Matrimonial Causes—Fine and Recovery—Settlement, Marriage.)

IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT.

(See Debtors' Act)

IMPRISONMENT, FALSE.

(See False Imprisonment.)

INFANT.

Acquiescence in acts of trustee 384

INJUNCTION.

To restrain damage done to an adjoining mine 106
To restrain a company who had covenanted to erect a first-class station from allowing express trains to pass without stopping 258
Against piracy of title of a periodical—Punch and Judy 323
To restrain payment out of court of money on which a solicitor had a charge for costs ..... page 322
To restrain a house being used as a beer house in violation of covenant 352
Against imitation of a trade-mark—Costs 80
Against an execution levied on a railway company 545
Against piracy of a trade-mark 546
Against piracy of an article in a newspaper 548
To restrain carrying on of trade contrary to an agreement not to do so within certain limits 661
Against infringement of a patent—Sufficiency of specification—Practice 696

INNKEEPER.

Beerhouse—When notice of intention to apply for certificate must be given 496

INSURANCE, FIRE.

Temporary agreement with the agent of an office for a policy—Deposit paid—Agent charging to another office—Fire before policy issued—Liability 102

INSURANCE, LIFE.

Policy to secure a loan on an annuity—Repurchase of annuity—Guarantee's right to the policy 701

INSURANCE, MARINE.

Construction of words "insured only for 4000*l.*" in a proposal for reassurance 408
Perils of the sea—What are "other misfortunes"—Risks of lighterage—Inherent defect 473
An agent employed to effect an insurance on goods transmitted from abroad must account for any discount allowed by the office 555
Valued policy—Ship valued at less than actual value—Subrogation—Right of underwriters to damages recovered by shipowners—Collison 822
(See Maritime Law.)

INTERNATIONAL LAW.

Bill to defeat a foreign action—Jurisdiction of court 415
Domicil—Property in France and England—French domicil of origin—Vault and burial of wife and child 660
(See Colonial Law.)

JOINT-STOCK COMPANY.

Directors and promoters—Promotion money—Payment by promoters to directors 13
Companies Act 1862, s. 79, cl. 5—Alleged collusion to assist a rival company—Petition—Costs 19
Liability of a telegraph company for error in the transmission of a message 21
Company on cost-book principle — Action by creditor against a defaulting shareholder for calls due—Subsequent payment by company—Appropriation—Proof 67
Breach of trust by directors—Bill by company against them—Companies Act 1862 73
Advances by company—Guarantee to indorse payment of the advances of a company which had given a counter guarantee 126
Attempted amalgamation, void or voidable—Ultra vires—Acceptance of shares as a consequence of amalgamation—Shareholder acting as director—Liability 182
If a director receiving from a promoter part of the money by him received from the company for promotion is liable to refund 221
Assignment of debentures—Right of set-off against calls on shares 336
Personal liability of directors—Misrepresentation of authority without fraud—Implied warranty 356
Sale of shares on the Stock Exchange—Purchase by country broker of London broker for an undisclosed principal—Failure of principal—Authority of London broker to do what he thinks best—His duty—Action against country broker for calls 432

Digitized by Google

SUBJECTS OF CASES.

Sale of shares to a jobber—Name ticket—Transfer not executed by, or brought to knowledge of, nominee — Carrying over without authority—Subsequent ratification—Liability of jobber to indemnify vendor from calls ..... page 535
Summary application not in a winding-up under sect. 35 of the Companies' Act 1862 629
Collusive transfer of shares—Registration—Subsequent winding-up — Rectification of register—Companies' Act 1862, s. 35—Costs..... 688
Debentures issued ultra vires to maintain property of the company—Priority of as against simple contract creditors 690
Bonds for sums in excess of borrowing powers and equities of actual holders of Lloyd's bonds 735
Winding-up of a company amalgamated with another..... 775
Execution against a shareholder whose shares are not fully paid-up 811
Transfer of shares to an infant to avoid liability ... 811

(See Accident, Death or Injury by—Lands Clauses Consolidation Act—Railway—Winding-up.)

JUDGMENT.

Equitable interest for life in leaseholds, if it can be taken in execution; meaning of term "actually delivered in execution" in sect. 4 of 27 & 28 Vict. c. 112 343
Execution against a shareholder whose shares are not fully paid-up 811

(See Debtor and Creditor.)

JURISDICTION.

Of equity court on charge of obtaining money by false representations..... 50

JUSTICE OF THE PEACE.

Jurisdiction to order repair of highway where the waywarden denies that it is a highway—Bona fides 556
On an order upon a husband for maintenance of his wife, justices may exercise their discretion, although he offers to take her back 715
Appeal—Statement of case—Ground of appeal not distinctly raised..... 748

LANDLORD AND TENANT.

(See Lease.)

LANDS CLAUSES CONSOLIDATION ACT.

Arbitration — Possession —Interest—Costs—Withdrawal of opposition to an Act of Parliament..... 17
8 & 9 Vict. c. 18, s. 68—Compensation..... 238
Incorporation of sect. 68 with London Sewers Act 1848—Construction of incorporating clauses and right to compensation under 295
What is a "wilful" entering upon land before compensation made within sect. 85 387
Purchase-money paid into court—Company becoming insolvent—Payment of costs out of fund 481
Sect. 119—Apportionment of rent on purchase of leasehold 524
Sect. 16—Arbitration—Award long after time for payment of purchase-money—Intermediate interests—Possession 769
Notice to treat for land—Admission of title—Burial ground..... 814

(See Railway.)

LARCENY.

(See Criminal Law.)

LEASE.

Agreement for, contained in three letters—Parol variation—Uncertainty—Condition precedent..... 185
Imprisonment of lessee—Collection of crops by lessor—Re-entry on abandonment 200
Building lease—Stamp duty upon—What is a "further or other consideration" ..... page 720
Assignment without licence—Forfeiture 789

LEASEHOLD.

If an equitable estate in can be taken in execution —What is being "actually delivered" in execution under sect. 4 of 27 & 28 Vict. c. 112 343

LEASES AND SETTLED ESTATES ACT.

Death of petitioner—Amendment—Practice 482
Devise in trust to manage an estate—Ultimate gift to children 525

LEGACY DUTY.

Legacy payable after death of an annuitant to different persons in succession chargeable at the same rate of duty—When duty payable—Legacy Duty Act (36 Geo. 3, c. 52), ss. 6, 9, 12..... 25
Bequest of money to be laid out in land—Whether succession duty or legacy duty to be paid on equitable conversion..... 58

LETTER OF CREDIT.

Agreement by bank to accept and pay plaintiff's bills—Breach of contract to pay—Whether tort or contract—Measure of damages—Whether nominal or substantial 830

LIBEL.

Charge of ingratitude; statement of facts on which it is founded—Imputation of pecuniary difficulties —Libel or no libel, a question for the jury—When it may be withdrawn from them 178
Libellous article in a newspaper pending trial of a criminal charge 294
What is a privileged communication 302
Privileged communication to a commanding officer —Military discipline—Malice..... 584

(See Slander.)

LIEN.

For unpaid costs of a solicitor to a winding-up..... 46
Of a solicitor on the property recovered for the amount of his costs 414
Of a railway company for tolls is only where the line is used by others, and not on goods carried by themselves..... 675
For moneys advanced on debentures made ultra vires to maintain property of company..... 690

LIGHTERAGE.

(See Maritime Law.)

LIMITATIONS, STATUTE OF.

Operation of long possession—Evidence of title arising therefrom 595
Copyhold—Seizure quousque 657

LOCAL GOVERNMENT.

Scale of rating by commissioners — Railway — Private Bill..... 1

(See Health, Public.)

LOCAL LAWS.

Lyme Regis Harbour Act 227

LONDON, LAWS OF.

City of London Sewers Act 1848, ss. 2, c. 8—Damage by public works—Lands Clauses Act 1845, ss. 5, 15, 48, 68—Incorporation of sect. 68 with local Act—Construction of incorporating clauses—Right to compensation..... 295

LUNATIC.

Authority of wife of a lunatic husband to pledge his credit 635

Digitized by Google

SUBJECTS OF CASES.

MALICIOUS PROSECUTION.

Action for—What is reasonable cause...Evidence of malice ..... page 442

(See False Imprisonment.)

MARITIME LAW.

Salvage—Corporation for wrecking purposes—Costs 31
Stoppage in transitu—Continuance of transitus—Assignment by insolvent consignees to secure antecedent debt before arrival of bill of lading—Indorsement in performance of agreement in assignment — Special stipulation as to remittances 33
Bottomry—Damaged ship sold—Proceeds of sale—Utter loss—Construction of total loss—Salvage... 38
Collision—Passengers—Compulsory pilot—17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, ss. 379, 388—6 Geo. 4, c. 125, s. 55... 41
Collision—Damage—Lights invisible from vessel coming end on—Proper rate for steamer in channel —Duty of mutual assistance after collision—Inspection as to sufficiency of lights—Look outs—24 Vict. c. 10, s. 18—25 & 26 Vict. c 63, ss. 29, 33 44
Insurance—Liability of a member of a mutual marine assurance association as a contributory ... 97
Insurance — A contract for mutual assurance is within the Stamp Act 97
Bottomry—Necessity for hypothecation of cargo—Possibility of communication with owners—Advances of freight—Commission for obtaining charter..... 159
Collision, reasonable apprehension of—Negligence —Practice—Amending summons and plaint at trial 209
Harbour—Local Act for Lyme Regis—What is a landing of goods within the harbour..... 227
Salvage—Derelict — Written acknowledgment of abandonment by captain—Sufficiency of remuneration for services rendered..... 282
Charter-party—Meaning of terms "as near thereto as she may safely get"—Capacity of harbour—Offer to lighten ship—Obligation to lighten ship—Demurrage—Custom 302
Harbour—Ship sunk in the port of Liverpool—Expenses of removing obstruction—Liabilities of owners of cargo..... 362
Cause of damage—County Court Admiralty Jurisdiction Act, ss. 3, 9 397
Insurance—Construction of words, "insured only for 4000*l.*," in a proposal for re-assurance..... 408
Collision—Jurisdiction—Inevitable accident—Vessel at anchor..... 440
Salvage—Form of tender—Meaning of "costs (if any) due by law"—Practice 472
Insurance—Perils of the sea—What are "other misfortunes"—Risks of lighterage—Inherent defect 473
Order by a subordinate government—Commission on goods sold—Principal and agent—Countermand of agency 555
Ship—Construction of "leaving port"—Tug lashed to vessel—Collision—Arrest of ship on voyage with cargo—Practice of the Consular Courts—Security for costs and damages of detention 621
Lien on—Revenue laws—Penalty—Jurisdiction—Proceedings in rem and in personam in Admiralty 648
Collision—Limited liability—Computation of interest 681
Ship—Limited liability of owner—Jurisdiction when vessel is not under arrest 683
Ship—Co-owners—Parting by one with his interest —Jurisdiction of court to adjust..... 683
Collision—Sailing—Rule 14—Vessels "crossing"... 686
Salvage—Direct and indirect services—Respective merits of salvors—Appeal as to amount of salvage awarded 707
Practice—County courts—Order to proceed in the Admiralty Court 727
Practice—Inspection of documents—Costs..... 727
Ship—Mortgage—Fraudulent preference..... 727
Practice—County Courts—Cross causes—Appeal ... 729
Practice—Damage—Pleading—Special defence 761
Practice—Decree—Amendment 762
Bottomry—Money advanced on personal security—Subsequent bond—Further advances 763
Salvage—Value—Jurisdiction—Estoppel.....page 765
Collision—Inevitable accident—Vessel partly disabled..... 768
Ship—Material men—Materials and supplies at foreign port—Necessaries—Lien 798
Deck cargo—Perils of the sea—Jettison 800
Anchorage dues—Proof of existence of a port—Immemorial payment..... 804
Insurance—Valued policy—Ship valued at less than actual value — Subrogation — Right of underwriters to damages recovered by shipowner—Collision 822

MARKET.

Action for disturbance of an ancient market—What is a disturbance—New market held on different days—Limits of borough 145
By grant may be held anywhere within the limits, and removed from time to time—Effect of bye-laws 582

MASTER AND SERVANT.

Manager of a company wound-up—Termination of engagement—Compensation 742

MATRIMONIAL CAUSES.

(See Divorce.)

METROPOLIS, LAWS OF.

(See London, Laws of.)

MINES AND MINING.

Company on cost-book principle—Action by creditor against defaulting shareholder for calls—Verdict by consent for the amount—Payment by company to creditor—Further debt by company after action—Proof 67
Compensation for damage done by prevents the working of an adjoining mine 106

(See Joint-Stock Company.)

MORTGAGE.

Due exercise of power—Compound interest 168
Sale by mortgagor to mortgagee—Right of re-purchaser within a limited time—Want of professional assistance—Undervalue 271
Acceptance by mortgagee of amount tendered—Right to conveyance and title-deeds 287
Redemption suit—Resistance to right to redeem—Jurisdiction of County Court—28 & 29 Vict. c. 99, s. 1. 451
Equity of redemption—Release—Agreement in fieri —Abandonment of agreement..... 477
Agreement for a lease and mortgage—Money advanced on security of the premises and fixtures—Equitable mortgagee..... 499
Judgment and execution by mortgagee against a railway company—Scheme—Costs 545
Made eighteen months previous to bankruptcy with subsequent notice—13 Eliz. c. 5..... 578
A mortgage to secure a current cash credit between the mortgagor and mortgagee not a security to holders of bills drawn by mortgagor and accepted by mortgagee 693
Payment of mortgage money into court under 7 Geo. 2, c. 20—Order of discharge..... 781

MORTMAIN.

Gift by will for digging a public well—Gift of residue void for uncertainty 191

(See Charity—Will.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATION.

Bribery of voter at election of—22 Vict. c. 35, ss. 11, 12 56
Limit of the borough—Sects. 7 and 8 of Municipal Corporation Act 145

Digitized by Google

SUBJECTS OF CASES.

A borough having a quarter sessions and sending its prisoners to the county gaol, must pay a proportion of the costs of enlarging it, under 5 & 6 Vict. c. 98, s. 18 ....page 715
Burgess list—Sufficiency of notice of objection..... 748

NEGLIGENCE.

By railway company—Pointsman causing collision —Evidence of 261
Sale of noxious compound by a chemist 495
By sparks from engine of a railway firing cut grass on an embankment 668
Of railway company by delivery of goods to the wrong person 676

(See Accident, Death or Injury by—Railway.)

NEWSPAPER.

Copyright of in its contents—Piracy of hunting lists —Injunction 548

NIGHT POACHING.

Limitation of proceedings—3 Geo. 4, c. 69, s. 4..... 268

(See Criminal Law.)

NISI PRIUS.

Practice at—Production of a written document to a witness 670

(See Practice.)

NOTARY, PUBLIC.

The signature of, to an act done by him in a foreign country, must be authenticated by a person in England 187

NOTICE.

How published in an extra-parochial place..... 747

NUDUM PACTUM.

What is—Agreement for payment of amount of promissory note by instalments 676

(See Agreement.)

NUISANCE.

Pollution of a stream—Time given to abate 52

NUISANCES REMOVAL.

Where proceedings taken by an inhabitant he is not required first to serve a notice on the person complained of..... 457

PARISH LAW.

(See Ecclesiastical Law—Poor Law.)

PARLIAMENT, LAW OF

Locus standi—Railway—Scale of rating by improvement commissioners and under Local Government Act—Incomplete transfer of the lien from a former railway company 1
Practice—Several petitions—Order of hearing—Locus standi 55
Locus standi—Improvement Bill—Rating powers—Exemptions—Lands and minerals—Landowners affected by taxation 91
Locus standi—Waterworks—Corporation—Landowner—Interference with soil under road—Underground water 95
Locus standi—Wine and coal duties—Private Bill to accelerate operation of a clause in a public Act —Application of public funds to the injury of a private company..... 124
Practice—Railway—Extension of branch already authorised—Competition—S. O. 127 157
Locus standi—Harbour works—Interference with railway—Temporary occupation of land—Railway Clauses Act 1845 ....page 158
Abandonment of railway—Competition—Through routes—Traffic arrangements—English and Scotch traffic agreement..... 276
Abandonment Bill—Competing line—Traffic regulations—Access to station 279

PARTITION.

Disputed legal title—Jurisdiction—Evidence—Decree —Costs 575
Sale under Partition Act 1868—Sect. 3—Order of court 660
Practice—Joint-owners—Retention of bill for a year 699

PARTNERSHIP.

Bills drawn for share in a—Subsequent failure—Insolvency at date of bills—General and separate creditors 223

PATENT.

Assignment of—Register of proprietors—Entry in —Expunging entry—Patent Law Amendment Act 1852, ss. 35, 38 345
Two provisional specifications—Prior right—Concurrent inventions..... 410
Petition for—Objections by a prior patentee—Certificate of law officer against the grant—Dismissal of the petition with costs 663
Trover—Plaintiff's title 673
Invasion of—Novelty—Sufficiency of specification —Admissibility of evidence—Requisition..... 696
Sale of—Warranty—Plea 819

(See Attorney and Solicitor—Costs.)

PERJURY.

(See Criminal Law.)

PILOT AND PILOTAGE.

(See Maritime Law.)

PLEADING.

I. Equity.
II. Common Law.

I. Equity.

Demurrer—Ouster of jurisdiction—Necessity for answering..... 16
Bill pro confesso 85
Plea alleging a suit—Demurrer 441

II. Common Law.

Departure from declaration—Composition-deed—Sureties 639
Right of way—Trespass 641
Bankruptcy—Form of plea where order of discharge is not obtained till after action brought 784
Warranty on sale of a patent 819

POOR LAW.

Order of removal—Removability of wife and children of a man who is an Irishman serving as a soldier 488
Poor-rate—Appeal against—What is the next practicable quarter sessions..... 494
Removal of a married woman to her place of settlement in Ireland without her husband 686
Order on husband to contribute to the support of his wife who had become chargeable not avoided by offer to take her back..... 715

PORT.

Evidence of the existence of a—Immemorial payment 804

(See Maritime Law.)

Digitized by Google

SUBJECTS OF CASES.

POWER.

Execution of by will—What is sufficient? ..... page 80
Due exercise of—Mortgage—Compound interest ... 168
Alleged fraud on 197
Voluntary appointment—Power of revocation 224
Execution in fraud of—Subsequent deed of confirmation—Suit to set it aside—Lapse of time 346

PRACTICE.

I. Equity.
II. Common Law.

I. Equity.

Demurrer—Ouster of jurisdiction—Necessity for answer 16
Appeals for costs only 70
Bill pro confesso—Requisite forms 85
Signature of a notary to an act done by him in a foreign country must be authenticated by a person in England 137
Taxation of a solicitor's bill—Consolidated Order XL., s. 25—Order made in chambers—Application for leave to appeal against 280
Appointment for passing an order settled—How to be made—Notice of—Consolidated Order I., rr. 24, 25, and 27 283
Order to continue suit without a representative of a deceased defendant—15 & 16 Vict. c. 86, s. 44 351
Petition—Parties—Costs 384
Names and addresses of petitioners—Advertisement—XLI. Consolidated Order, r. 14 454
Death of petitioner—Amendment—Leases and Settled Estates Act 482
Taxation of costs on order obtained by client—Costs of uncertificated solicitor 482
Revivor by assignees of a bankrupt plaintiff—Costs—Stay of proceedings 484
Death of plaintiff—Revivor—15 & 16 Vict. c. 86, s. 52 527
Service on infant parties 556
Service of decree—Motion to discharge writ of fi. fa. on ground of non-service of decree 573
A nominal defendant must answer in his official capacity 581
Motion to dismiss bill for want of prosecution, plaintiff having assigned his property to creditors 581
Demurrer for improper parties—Agreement and sub-agreement—Bill for specific performance by sub-purchaser—Original vendor a party 628
Exceptions to bill—Scandal 631
County Courts Equitable Jurisdiction Act, ss. 3, 10—Transfer of plaint to Court of Chancery 632
Construction of order of court—Consent binding on married woman 652
Power of court to sanction compromise of suit by a married woman 654
Obedience to order of court to be enforced by writ of sequestration 696
In partition—Joint owners—Retention of bill for a year 699
Affidavit of document referred to in an ex parte statement 704
Absconding defendant—Notice to appear—How published in an extra-parochial place 747
Committal of a receiver for contempt 781
Special case—Parties out of the jurisdiction 784
Motion to vary chief clerk's certificate—Cons. Ord. XXXV., r. 52 784
Slander—Effect of certificate of judge—Costs 788
Dismissal of bill—Subpœna to hear judgment 816
Trustee refusing to transfer funds—Co-trustee lunatic—13 & 14 Vict. c. 60, s. 24 818
Costs where trust fund reduced below 500*l.* 819

II. Common Law.

Right to begin in revenue cases 25
Right to begin 173
Amending summons and plaint at the trial 209
Costs of entering cause provisionally—Costs of appeal from master to judge at chambers 436
Costs where the plea is bad, but there is a verdict for the defendant on the merits 456
Nonproduction of necessary documents on motion for a rule—Costs 530
Production of a writing to a witness ..... page 670
Interrogatories—Common Law Procedure Act 1854 673
Change of venue—Preponderance of convenience ... 717 (See Admiralty Court—Appeal—Arches Court—Attorney and Solicitor—Costs—County Courts—Divorce—Evidence—Probate Court.

PRINCIPAL AND AGENT.

Ratification of agent's act 10
Agreement made by an agent, whose appointment is not alleged to be in writing—Statute of Frauds 68
Agent of an insurance company, taking deposit for a policy and changing his agency to another office—Liability 102
Payment of a fine to the deputy steward of a manor by a crossed cheque is insufficient 141
Commission on goods sold; countermand of agency; subordinate Government 555
An agent employed to effect an insurance on goods transmitted from abroad must account for any discount allowed by the office 555
Right of an agent on a del credere commission to sue vendee 672

PRISON.

A borough having a quarter sessions sending its prisoners to a county prison, must pay a proportion of the costs of enlarging and improving it—Prison Act (5 & 6 Vict. c. 98) 715

PRIVATE BILLS.

(See Parliament, Law of.)

PRIVILEGE.

(See Attorney and Solicitor.)

PRIVY COUNCIL.

Practice—Appeal from Arches Court—Rule 14—Period between bringing in petition and hearing Contumacious non-appearance in the court below 650

PROBATE COURT.

Will—Signature in presence of attesting witnesses—Surviving attesting witness adverse—No other evidence forthcoming 156
Will—Not forthcoming, codicil admitted to proof—Revocation—Wills Act, s. 20 298
Will—Revocation by memorandum—Administration—Practice 300
Practice—Testamentary suit—Minor—Guardian ad litem 300
Practice—Testamentary suit—Examination of attesting witness de bene esse 339
Will—Testamentary paper contingent on option of the executrix 340
Will—Bequests identical with the trusts of a marriage settlement 366
Practice—Testamentary suit—Nude executor—Costs 367
Administration granted to wife in case of a supposed intestacy—Will subsequently discovered and admitted to probate, though prior grant not brought in 367
Will—Chain of representation—Will of testator and executor both proved in Ireland—Irish grant resealed in Probate Court in England 367
Will—Incorporation of a memorandum 399
Will—Codicil wrongly described as codicil to a revoked will—Practice 399
Will—Acknowledgment—Signature not seen by attesting witnesses—Presumption—Probate granted 400
Practice—Bankruptcy and emigration of executor—Grant of administration to a legatee 596
Will—Married woman—Separation deed—Scotch divorce—Will not republished after death of husband—Limited grant 596
Will—Attestation—Signature not seen by witnesses—Presumption 597

Digitized by Google

SUBJECTS OF CASES.

Will—Doubtful description of executor—Nephew—Parol evidence to explain ..... page 645
Practice—Testamentary suit—Probate of previous will revoked—Contentious proceedings discontinued—Costs 646
Practice—Issues found partly for, partly against, the will—Executors condemned in all costs 647
Will—Memorandum of revocation indorsed—Incorporation refused 680
Will—Contingent will—Probate refused 681
Administration—Estate not wholly administered—Sureties allowed to justify 730
Will—Domiciled American—Two sets of executors—Trust-deed to be discharged in America 730
Administration—Simultaneous death of husband and wife—Survivorship—Presumption—Form of oath 731
Practice—Testamentary suit—Separate defences—Consolidation 731
Will—Attestation clause defective—Affidavit dispensed with 731
Administration—Lunatic—Penalties—Residue 834
Practice — Testamentary suit—Jury discharged—Motion to try at assizes refused 835

(See Administration—Will.)

PROBATE DUTY.

Foreign executor—Receipt of dividends from a company being wound-up 575

PROMISE.

Forbearance to sue is a good consideration for a promise to pay only when the right to sue exists ... 77

PROMISSORY NOTE.

Subsequent agreement for payment of amount by instalments—Absence of consideration—Nudum pactum 676

(See Bill of Exchange.)

PROSECUTION, MALICIOUS.

(See Malicious Prosecution.)

PUBLIC HEALTH.

1848—Notice to do works part invalid, part good... 454

(See Health, Public.)

PUBLIC HOUSE.

Conveyance of in fee—Covenant that vendor shall supply beer—Want of mutuality—Restraint of trade 188

RACING.

(See Boat-race—Gaming.)

RAILWAY.

Arbitration under Lands Clauses Act—Possession—Interest—Costs—Withdrawal of opposition to an Act of Parliament 17
Exhaustion of capital and borrowing powers—Money advanced on bonds and used for the undertaking 47
Agreement to refer—Railway Companies Abrbitration Act 1859—Practice 81
Payment into court under a will—Precatory trust 85
Scheme under Railway Companies Act 1867—Debenture holders—Outside creditors—Absence of fraud—Majority of three-fourths 86
Compulsory powers to acquire land—Purposes of the special Act—Unauthorised use of powers—Later Act for other purposes 98
Damage by, through vibration caused by use of—Compensation for—Railway Clauses Act, ss. 6, 16—"Construction" and "use" of railway—Headings to groups of sections in statutes 238
Covenant to erect a "first-class" station—What it is—Specific performance—Jurisdiction ..... page 258
Accident by collision—Driver of engine seized with a fit—Pointsman turning engine on branch line to avoid collision with express train on main line—Collision on branch line—Alteration of siding points—Negligence, evidence of—Subsequent alteration of rails 261
Land taken by—Unpaid vendor—Decree for specific performance—Private Act restraining proceedings—Leave to prosecute decree notwithstanding the Act 290
Liability for misconduct of their servants upon the premises 301
Lower Canada—Action against a shareholder—President of company with a salary—Compensation 325
Accident on—Measure of damages—Pecuniary loss and bodily suffering 326
Entering on land before compensation made—What is a "wilful" entering within sect. 85 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 383
Agreement to make and maintain a road and wharf 416
Liabilities of—Evidence of negligence 443
Private Act—Maximum charge for carriage per mile—Mileage is not necessarily chargeable by the most direct route 460
Land taken—Purchase money paid into court—Insolvent railway—Order to pay costs out of the fund 481
Agreement to purchase leasehold from lessee—Apportionment of rents under Lands Clauses Act, s. 119—Notice to treat with lessor—Specific performance 524
Railway Companies Act 1867—Scheme—Judgement by mortgagee—Execution—Costs 545
An agreement to make a road not ultra vires the directors 558
Severance of the lands of a mine owner by the railway—Claim for compensation—Reference to arbitrators—Expenses not yet actually incurred—Future necessary expenses—Award—Meaning of "from time to time," in Railway Clauses Act, s. 81 578
Scheme of arrangement—Confirmation—Dissent of outside creditors—Railways Companies Act 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 127) 656
Liability for negligence—Sparks from an engine firing cut glass on an embankment 668
The lien given for tolls is where the line is used by others, and not on goods carried by the company 675
Liability as carriers—Delivery of goods to the wrong person—Conversion—Negligence—Voluntary bailee 676
Limited borrowing powers—Loans in excess—Lloyds' bonds—Equities of actual holders 735
Liability as carriers—Pictures, the value of which is not declared, the frames are accessory to the pictures 756
Purchase of land—Time for payment of purchase-money—Arbitration—Award long after—Costs—Lands Clauses Act 1845, s. 16 769
Execution against shareholder whose shares are not fully paid-up 811
Negligence by carriage door being unfastened 835
Liability for wrongful act of third person 835
Train overshooting the platform—Negligence 836

(See Accident, Death or Injury by—Joint Stock Company—Lands Clauses Consolidation Act—Negligence—Parliament, Law of—Winding-Up.)

RAPE.

(See Criminal Law.)

RECEIVER.

Of an annuity in gross, with a general charge of debts—Right to distrain 453
Committal of, for contempt 781

REFEREES, COURT OF.

(See Parliament, Law of.)

Digitized by Google

SUBJECTS OF CASES.

REMOVAL, ORDER OF.

(See Poor Law.)

REVENUE.

(See Legacy Duty—Succession Duty—Stamp Act.)

REVERSION.

A married woman may, by a fraud, preclude herself from any right to a reversionary interest falling due after the death of her husband .....page 376

SALVAGE.

(See Maritime Law.)

SANITARY LAW.

Notice to do works under the Public Health Act may be good in part and bad in part 454
A complaint by an inhabitant of a nuisance under sect. 21 of the Sanitary Act 1866, need not be given to the person complained of..... 457

SEDUCTION.

Relationship of master and servant—Plea of not guilty, effect of—Evidence of pecuniary means 360

SEQUESTRATION.

Writ of, is to be used to enforce obedience to an order of court under 32 & 33 Vict. c. 62, ss. 4 and 8 696

SETTLED ESTATES ACT.

(See Leases and Settled Estates Act.)

SETTLEMENT, MARRIAGE.

After-acquired property—Will of husband—Construction 194
Post-nuptial settlement—Provision against husband's bankruptcy—Rights of creditors 321
Voluntary trusts in favour of collateral relations—Power of revocation..... 449
Stamp on..... 718

(See Husband and Wife.)

SETTLEMENT, PARISH.

(See Poor Law.)

SETTLEMENT, VOLUNTARY.

Bond—Assignee for valuable consideration—Subsisting equities—Forbearance to sue—Promise to pay made in ignorance of non-liability 77
Covenant to settle a moiety of the property settlor should be entitled to at time of death—Release... 167
Voluntary appointment—Power of revocation..... 224
Family arrangement—Bill—Declaration as to right of parties..... 705
Validity of, as against creditors 816

SHARES AND SHAREHOLDERS

(See Joint-Stock Company—Winding-up.)

SHERIFF.

Action will not lie against for detaining a person who has obtained a certificate of bankruptcy or deed of composition, even though he has notice of it 393

SHIP AND SHIPPING.

(See Maritime Law.)

SLANDER.

What is a privileged communication .....page 302
Verdict—Costs—Effect of certificate of judge 788

(See Libel.)

SOLICITOR.

(See Attorney and Solicitor.)

SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE.

Agreement made by an agent not appointed in writing—What sufficient allegation of the contract 68
Of an agreement for a lease contained in letters varied by parol 185
Of sale of property—Question as to acknowledgment by a married woman..... 227
Of an agreement by husband and wife to execute a separation deed 322
Of an agreement to make and maintain a road and wharf 416
Of an agreement for sale of property as freehold, part being subject to a lease 521
Of an agreement by a railway company for purchase of leasehold—Apportionment of rents 524
Demurrer that Statute of Limitations applied—When the Attorney-General is a necessary party 553
Bill for, by a sub-purchaser—Original vendor a party—Demurrer..... 628
Of a contract for sale at a price to be fixed by valuers named in contract 655
A bill for, will be supported by a receipt for the deposit duly stamped as an agreement..... 695

(See Vendor and Purchaser.)

STAMP ACTS.

Marine insurance—A contract for in a mutual company is within the Act..... 97
Bequest of residue of personalty to executors in trust for residuary legatee, such residue consisting of shares and money on mortgage—Transfer of such shares and mortgage to legatee—What is the proper stamp 151
Letters of administration—Accretions of interest—Husband dying without having administered to wife—Property to be distributed abroad—Construction of Stamp Acts 370
On marriage settlement—What is "definite and certain principal sum or sums of money"—Lands purchased with trust funds and subject to a trust for conversion into personalty 718
On a building lease—What is "further or other consideration" 720
On transfer of a mortgage to a friendly society—Exemption 721

STATUTE.

Construction of—Effect of headings to groups of sections in 288

STATUTE OF FRAUDS.

(See Frauds, Statute of.)

STOCK EXCHANGE.

Purchase of shares by country broker from London broker for an undisclosed principal—Failure of principal—Authority to London broker "to do what he thinks best"—His duties thereon—Name of country broker given to London broker to the ultimate purchase and liability thereon 432
Sale of shares to jobber—Transfer not executed by nominee—Carrying over without nominee's authority—Ratification of authority—Repudiation of transfer—Liability of jobber to indemnify vendor from calls 535

STOPPAGE IN TRANSITU.

Continuance of transitus 33

(See Maritime Law.)

Digitized by Google

SUBJECTS OF CASES.

SUCCESSION DUTY.

Bequest of money in trust to be laid out in land—Duty payable on equitable conversion—Whether succession duty or legacy duty—Amount of—Petition of appeal against assessment—Right to begin ... page 58

TELEGRAPH.

Liability of company for error in transmission of a message—Error in reading same—Damage to sender—Right of action ... 21
An agreement in writing may be made by 861

TORT.

To wife by the sale to her husband of a noxious article compounded by the vendor—Warranty—Negligence ... 495
Liability of a candidate for damage done by a mob at an election ... 527

(See Trespass.)

TOWNS IMPROVEMENT.

Scale of rating by commissioners—Railway—Private Bill ... 1

(See Health, Public—Local Government.)

TRADE MARK.

Definition of the word "patent" when used in a trade mark ... 260
Imitation of — Injunction — When entitled to damages—Costs ... 480
Piracy of—Use of name with reputed addition—Deception of customers — False statement in circular—Injunction ... 546

(See Copyright.)

TRADE, RESTRAINT OF

Contract not to carry on a certain trade in Europe 661

TRADES UNION.

Embezzlement of its funds by an officer—Indictment will lie for ... 758

TRESPASS.

Liability for an act that tends to create the doing of damage—What is the "natural consequence" of act—Liability of candidate for damage done by a mob ... 527
Right of way—Pleading ... 641

(See Tort.)

TROVER.

Exhibiting interrogatories—Common Law Procedure Act 1854, s. 51—Plaintiff's title ... 678

TRUSTS AND TRUSTEES.

Breach of trust—Following trust money—Money given by client to be invested on mortgage paid by solicitor to his own general banking account—If balance at banker's can be claimed in specie by cestui que trust ... 71
Trustee Act 1850—Transfer of fund—Non-corporate body—New trustees ... 106
Acceptance of trust by deed—Breach of trust—Whether simple contract or specialty ... 129
Vexatious refusal to hand over the trust fund—Costs ... 135
Acting for infant in exchange of lands—Acquiescence ... 385
Trustee Relief Act—Practice—Payment out of court—Service on trustees ... 413
Trustee Act 1850, ss. 28, 33, 34—Trustee Act 1852, s. 9—Appointment of new trustee of a copyhold for customary heir out of the jurisdiction ... 427
Pleading—Allegation of a trust—Demurrer ... page 448
Trustee Act 1850, ss. 3, 20—Covenant to surrender copyholds—Death of covenantor before surrender 739
Trustee Relief Act—Particular legacy paid into court—Residue in hands of trustees—Costs ... 739
Solicitor trustee for a client—Bill for an account ... 743
Appointment of new trustees—Husband of lady interested in trust fund ... 781
Trustee refusing to transfer fund—Co-trustee a lunatic ... 818
Reduction of trust fund—Costs ... 819

TURNPIKE.

What is a removing of soil from the sides of the road within sect. 118 of the General Turnpike Act—Scrapings ... 892

VACCINATION ACT.

Proceedings may be taken for non-vaccination after a conviction for a former offence—30 & 31 Vict. c. 84 ... 665

VENDOR AND PURCHASER.

Sale of goods—Contract contained in a series of letters—Proposal and acceptance—Cheque sent on account—Agreement to be drawn—Conditions precedent—Introduction of a new term ... 204
Acknowledgment by married woman, inability to obtain—Abandonment of purchaser—Subsequent sale and acknowledgment ... 227
What passes by a grant of "a warren" ... 253
Bill to rectify an alleged mutual mistake in an agreement for sale ... 253
Representation of object of purchaser—Declaration of purchaser—Obligation to perform ... 291
Fraud by married woman as to her reversionary interest—Declaration by her to the purchaser that she had duly assigned—Bonâ fide purchase ... 376
There is no essential difference between the sale of a goodwill of a business by the trader or by his assignee in bankruptcy ... 386
Specific performance—Property sold as freehold—Part of it subject to lease—Notice of tenancy by purchaser—Compensation—Abatement ... 521
Sale of land by auction—Reserved price—Employment of puffer—30 & 31 Vict. c. 48 ... 522
Agreement and sub-agreement—Bill for specific performance by sub-purchaser—Original vendor a party ... 628
Appropriation of purchase-money—Interest ... 651
Contract for sale at price to be fixed by valuers named in the contract—Inadequate valuation—Specific performance ... 655
Right of agent on a del credere commission to sue vendee ... 672
A written agreement cannot be qualified or altered by subsequent conversations or a presumed intended departure from it ... 695
A receipt for the deposit, duly stamped as an agreement, will support a bill for specific performance 695
Sale of a house without notice of an annuity charged upon it ... 745
Subsequent sale of goods obtained by false pretences—Seizure of by original owners in the hands of vendee—In whom property vests ... 754
Goods sold and delivered—Agreed terms of payment 760
Relation of—Time for payment of purchase-money—Arbitration—Award long after—Possession ... 760

(See Agreement — Contract — Covenant — Debtor and Creditor—Specific Performance.)

VENUE.

Change of ... 717

WARD OF COURT.

Concealment of—Practice—Evidence as to residence of ward—Privilege of solicitor of parent ... 292
Privilege of solicitor of—Concealment by mother—Production of envelopes of letters ... 293

SUBJECTS OF CASES.

WARRANTY.

Scienter—Negligence—Sale of a noxious article to a husband to be used by his wife ....page 495
On sale of a patent.... 819

WARREN.

What passes by a grant of "warren of conies".... 253
(See Game.)

WATER.

Pollution of a stream—Nuisance—Time given to abate.... 52

WAY, RIGHT OF.

Limited dedication—Right by user to plough up a footpath 458
Trespass on—Action for—Pleading.... 641

WILL.

Construction...4, 80, 85, 134, 136, 137, 191, 259 294, 349
Lower Canada—Coutume de Paris—Art. 289—Construction of dicté et nommé 4
Meaning of term "profits"—Surviving family—Power of appointment—Execution of by will.... 80
What is a precatory trust? 85
Charge for younger children—Tenant for life in possession—Legacy left to him—Interest on charge unpaid.... 132
Period of distribution—Direction to divide the whole equally "in case they shall die" 134
Separate use with testamentary power—Absolute interest.... 136
The word "surviving" read as "other".... 137
Consequence of bequeathing residue to executors in trust for residuary legatee 151
Conversion of real estate—Assignment of personal estate in expectancy.... 163
Charity—Gift for the benefit of a Scotch church—Free church—Cy près 165
Mortmain—Gift for digging a well—Gift of residue void for uncertainty 191
Meaning of the term "surviving".... 259
What is a vested interest.... 294
Where will not forthcoming codicil admitted to proof—Revocation—Wills Act, s. 20.... 298
Revocation by memorandum 300
Testamentary paper contingent on option of the executrix.... 340
Gift of rents with power to sell—Life estate 349
Bequests identical with the trusts of a marriage settlement 366
Chain of representation—Will of testator and executor both proved in Ireland 367
Incorporation of a memorandum 399
Signature not seen by attesting witnesses—Presumption.... 400
Devise in trust to manage the estate—Ultimate gift to children 525
Marshalling assets—Deficient personalty—Abatement by legatee and real estate rateably 526
Will—Attestation—Signature not seen by witnesses 597
Doubtful description of executor—Two nephews—Parol evidence to explain 645
Memorandum of revocation endorsed 680
Contingent will 681
Annuity charged on house—Sale without notice of it 745
Indefinite devise—Absence of words of limitation—Charge on property devised—Effect of words "property and estate"—Enlargement of life estate into a fee 793

(See Administration—Probate Court.)

WINDING-UP.

I. Petition.
II. Practice.
III. Contributory.

I. Petition.

Benefit society—Resolution ultra vires—Priority of rights—Acquiescence of petitioner 8
By shareholder dismissed—A new petition by a recent creditor....page 413
Amalgamation of insurance offices—Transfer of business—Power to wind-up transferred company 485
Order of an Irish court made an order of Court of Chancery in England—Companies Act 1862, ss. 81, 123.... 734
Unregistered company—Amalgamation before Companies Act 1862—Novation of debt 775
Dismissal of petition—Re-hearing 818

II. Practice.

Debenture payable to bearer—Claim by creditor to prove on a collateral security 12
Discharge of solicitor his costs unpaid—Lien—Order 11th Nov. 1862, r. 58 46
Mining company on cost-book principle—Debt due by company—Calls due from shareholder—Action by a creditor against the defaulting shareholder—Verdict by consent—Subsequent payment by company to creditor—Proof 67
Voluntary winding-up—Order—Re-hearing 199
Powers of liquidator—Companies Act 1862, ss. 95, 96, 159, 160—Exercise of without sanction of the court 220
Moneys received by a director from a promoter out of a profit made by the latter—If order can be made on him to refund 221
Proof by a secured creditor—Date of claim—General Order 11th Nov. 1862, r. 20 256
Debenture—Set-off 258
Proof of claim by creditor holding collateral security 286
Double proof—Interest after payment of debt 345
Proof—Secured creditor—Date of claim to prove—Gen. Ord. Nov. 1862, r. 20 411
Compromise of claims against directors—Motion by dissentient contributories to stay action—Jurisdiction—Companies Act 1862, ss. 87, 160.... 481
Rules as to appointment of official liquidator 483
Foreign executor—Payment of dividend to—Probate duty 575
Bills of exchange—Double proof against drawers and indorsers—Satisfaction of debt up to winding-up order—Subsequent interest.... 626
Appeal from chambers—Creditor with security on estate of debtor—Proof—Principal—Subsequent dividend—Interest.... 626
Companies Act 1862, s. 35—Costs 688
Debenture holders and simple contract creditors, priority of debentures issued ultra vires—Lien for moneys advanced to maintain property of company 690
Termination of engagement of a manager—Salary—Compensation.... 742
Creditor holding collateral security—Proof of claim—Letter of credit—Contribution 807

III. Contributory.

Notice of allotment—Authority to agent—Ratification of acts done.... 10
Liability by a member of a mutual marine assurance association 97
Transfer of shares; non-registration at the time of the winding-up—Delay of transferror—Laches ... 131
Infant transferee—What is acquiescence 164
Forfeiture of shares—Liability of a past member—Sched. B. Companies Act 1862, s. 38.... 165
Acceptance of shares as a consequence of amalgamation—Shareholder acting as director—Liability ... 182
Increase in nominal value of shares after application—Transfer in ignorance of it—Liability 196
Transfer of shares; set-off by transferee; transfer unregistered—Liability of transferror 197
Compromise—Cancellation of shares—Powers of directors—Lapse of time 288
Subscription of memorandum of association—What obligation to take shares thereby created—Subsequent application for, and allotment of, unpaid shares—Consolidation Act, 1862, s. 20—Official liquidator—Costs.... 317
Signing memorandum of association—Allotment of shares to a vendor—Paid-up shares 320
Liability of holders of provisional certificates for shares 350

Digitized by Google

SUBJECTS OF CASES.

Signing memorandum of association—Allotment of shares to vendor—Paid-up shares—Companies Act 1862, s. 23 ..... page 412
Subscribing memorandum of association—Application for shares and payment of deposit—Withdrawal before allotment—Power to accept surrender of shares—Companies Act 1862, s. 23 445
Bonâ fide dispute and compromise—Cancellation of shares—Lapse of time—Power of directors 446
Transfer of shares and non-execution of transfer by the transferee 479
Liability of a past member—Companies Act 1862, s. 28 572
Liability of an infant ..... page 574
Subscribing memorandum of association—Allotment of shares to nominee of vendor—Fully paid-up shares—Companies Act 1862, ss. 18, 23 632
Conditional allotment of shares—Ultra vires 654
Collusive transfer of share—Subsequent winding-up—Rectification of register—Companies Act 1862, s. 35—Costs 688
Transfer to infant to escape liability—Secret trust 811
Bankrupt—Inspectorship deed—Order to pay future calls 812

(See Bankruptcy—Joint-Stock Company.)

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

THE

LAW TIMES REPORTS:

COMPRISING

All the Cases Argued and Decided

IN ALL THE COURTS OF LAW AND EQUITY, IN BANKRUPTCY, IN THE DIVORCE AND PROBATE COURTS, IN THE ADMIRALTY COURT, AT NISI PRIUS, IN THE CRIMINAL COURTS, IN IRELAND, &c.

FROM SEPTEMBER 1869, TO FEBRUARY 1870.

In Parliament.

Reported by FREDERICK CLIFFORD and PEMBROKE S. STEPHENS, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

THE COURT OF REFEREES ON PRIVATE BILLS.

Monday, April 12.

(Before Mr. DODSON, Chairman; Mr. RICKARDS, and Mr. WYNNE, Referees.)

MILFORD IMPROVEMENT BILL.

Objection to locus standi of the GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

Railway—Scale of rating by improvement commissioners, and under the Local Government Act 1858—Incomplete transfer of line from former railway company.

An improvement Bill promoted by the commissioners of M. for the extension of their borrowing powers, but without increase of rates, was petitioned against by the G. W. Railway Company, by whom the M. Railway, within the commissioners' limits, was worked under agreement, but of which they had not yet become statutory lessees, though a Bill for that purpose was before Parliament. The Act authorising the M. Railway was prior in point of date to the commissioners' original Act of 1857, and under those Acts the railway was liable to rating on its full value. The G. W. Co., who became the workers of the line since 1857, and paid the rates, now contended that the rating should be reduced to the usual scale of one-fourth:

Held, that the petitioners had no locus standi.

The main object of the Bill was to enable the Milford Improvement Commissioners to borrow a further sum of 3000*l.* without, however, extending the rating powers already possessed by them. The petitioners, the Great Western Railway Company, opposed the Bill on the ground that they worked and occupied the Milford Railway under an agreement for a lease, and that railway being rated by the commissioners, the granting to them of additional borrowing powers, would be injurious to the petitioners. Their petition set forth that the additional sum of 3000*l.*, by the intended Act authorised to be raised on mortgage, was to be applied, first, in payment of the costs of the intended Act; secondly, in discharging the liability of the commissioners in respect of waterworks; and, thirdly, in payment of any other liability of the commissioners. And it went on to say:—

The Milford Railway extends from your petitioners' South Wales Railway, at Johnston, to the town of Milford, and your petitioners work, manage, and maintain the said railway under an agreement with the Milford Railway Company for a lease in perpetuity of the undertaking of the Milford Railway Company, which includes the said railway.

Your petitioners, as occupiers of the Milford Railway are rated in large sums by the said commissioners, and if the Bill promoted by the commissioners, and at present pending in your honourable House, receives the sanction of Parliament, as it now stands, the rates leviable on your petitioners will be very much increased, and your petitioners object thereto.

Your petitioners will derive and have derived no benefit from the objects to which the money proposed to be raised under the authority of the intended Act is to be applied as aforesaid, but, on the contrary, the provisions of the intended Act which authorise the raising of the said sum of 3000*l.* will be injurious to them, and your petitioners, therefore, object to so much of the Bill as increases the debt of the commissioners by the said sum of 3000*l.*

The interests of your petitioners differ from those of other ratepayers in the town of Milford, inasmuch as those ratepayers have derived, it is presumed, some benefit from the waterworks towards which a part of the said sum of 3000*l.* is to be applied, but your petitioners have derived no benefit or advantage from them; and some of the improvements that have been made in the town of Milford may be of advantage to the owners and occupiers of houses and property in the said town and to the inhabitants generally, while they have not been of any advantage to your petitioners.

By sect. 55 of the Local Government Act 1858 (which is a public Act), and which is to be construed together with, and be deemed to form part of, the Public Health Act 1848, and which makes further provision for the local government of towns and populous districts, it is enacted that "The owner of any tithes, or of any tithe commutation rent-charge, or the occupier of any land used as arable, meadow, or pasture ground only, or as woodlands, market gardens, or nursery grounds, and the occupier of any land covered with water, or used only as a canal or towing path for the same, or as a railway constructed under the powers of any Act of Parliament for public conveyance, shall be assessed in respect of the same in the proportion of one-fourth part only of such net annual value thereof."

The said Local Government Act 1858 contains no such exemption in favour of the ratepayers generally, except the owners of the special properties mentioned above, so that under the provisions of the said Act, which, as before stated, is a public Act, your petitioners' interest are recognised as being different from those of the general body of ratepayers.

No such provision, however, as that contained in the Local Government Act 1858, and above specified, is contained in the Milford Improvement Act 1857, nor in the said

Bill, and your petitioners submit that should your honourable House think it right to sanction the passing of the said Bill, it is only just and reasonable that the said provision should be extended to Milford, and that clauses and provisions should be inserted in the Bill to that effect, so as to give your petitioners the benefit thereof, and that other clauses and other provisions should also be inserted in the Bill for their protection, and for regulating the manner in which the valuation for assessments should be made at Milford.

The objections to the locus standi of the petitioners were:

1. The petitioners are not entitled to be heard against the said Bill as occupiers of the Milford Railway, or as ratepayers within the Milford Improvement District.

2. No right of the said petitioners is proposed to be altered by the said Bill.

3. No property of the said petitioners is proposed to be taken or used under the powers of the said Bill.

4. That no agreement for a lease of the Milford Railway to the petitioners has been sanctioned by Parliament, and that the petitioners are not entitled to be heard as lessees or occupiers of the Milford railway.

5. That the Milford Railway Act was passed in 1856, and the petitioners have become occupiers of the Milford railway since the Milford Improvement Act of 1857 was passed, and that they have undertaken such occupancy subject to the burthen (if any) imposed on the Milford Railway Company by the Milford Improvement Act 1857.

6. No additional rating power is sought by the Bill, and the petitioners are seeking to be relieved from liabilities to rates they or the Milford Railway Company are now liable to.

Saunders for petitioners.—We object to the proposal to raise the borrowing powers of the commissioners from 7000*l.* to 10,000*l.* By the Act of 1856 the Milford Railway, three miles in length, forming a drop line from the South Wales Railway, was authorised; it now forms, but was not then, a portion of the Great Western system.

Mr. DODSON.—One of the objections is that you do not represent the Milford Railway. If so, the whole thing is at an end.

Saunders.—The court will be the judges of that. In 1863 an agreement was entered into between the Great Western and the Milford Railway Companies. The first clause of that agreement provides for a lease in perpetuity of the Milford Railway to be sanctioned by Parliament; the ninth clause of the agreement provides that on the completion of the railway and works, if the lease do not sooner come into effect, the Great Western will (subject to approval as therein mentioned) work the railways until the intended lease shall commence.

Mr. RICKARDS.—Technically, then, no sanction has been given by Parliament?

Saunders.—That is so; but in a Bill of this session there is a clause sanctioning that agreement; and the Milford Company's Act of 1863 gives power to the Great Western and South Wales Railway Companies, or either of them, to enter into agreements with regard to working the Milford Railway. Under that power we are now working the railway; and that is our answer to the further objection that we are not entitled to be heard as occupiers.

Mr. RICKARDS.—Which company pays the rates?

Saunders.—I hold in my hand the last demand for rates made by the Milford Improvement Commissioners. The notice is for rates made the 9th Dec. 1868, and is directed to the Great Western Company.

Mr. RICKARDS.—Have the Great Western, in fact, paid the rates?

Saunders.—Ever since the working agreement was entered into, the rates have always been paid by the Great Western Company. It is out of the question to suppose that a three mile line could want, or be worked with, a separate rolling stock of its own. The commissioners recognise and treat us as occupiers in drawing their rates from us.

Mr. RICKARDS.—How does the name appear in the rate-book; are the Great Western entered as occupiers?

Saunders.—That would not be evidence for or against us; but notice served by the commissioners upon us would be evidence against them; no doubt the notice is taken from the rate-book. As to the second and third objections, they are merely general in their charracte; but as to the fourth, which seeks to ignore our right, both as lessees and occupiers, to uphold this objection would be to ignore the practice of Parliament altogether. An occupier even for a year, has as good a locus as a lessee, and in this case we are an occupier working the line under an Act of Parliament. Then as to the fifth objection, that we became occupiers since the passing of the Improvement Act of 1857—

Mr. DODSON.—Is this railway in any way represented on the local board at Milford?

Saunders.—I am told not.

T. Marriott (Parliamentary agent), for promoters.—They are entitled to vote in the election of commissioners.

Saunders.—I don't think anything turns on the question when we became owners of the Milford Railway. If we were owners before the passing of the Improvement Act, it might be contended that then was our time to have come forward and been heard. This is the first Bill brought into Parliament to affect the management of the town of Milford since the Great Western had any interest in the town.

Mr. RICKARDS.—Can you mention any case in which a ratepayer has been allowed a locus standi against the Board of Health, or governing body of the town, or community to which he is a contributor?

Saunders.—I don't think I can, but, as far as I know, the case has not arisen in the present shape. The petitioners have an interest quite distinct from that of the other ratepayers.

Mr. RICKARDS.—That is not so. At present their rating is not distinct; they want it to be distinct.

Saunders.—We say, not that we should be distinctly rated, but that our interests are distinct. Parliament has recognised the principle that railway and canal companies who do not get the benefit of an improvement Act in the same way as inhabitants of a town do, should be only rated at one fourth. Our interests are distinct; the only thing is that in this case, by a private Bill brought in before we had anything to do with the Milford Railway, this principle was lost sight of, and the distinction was not made. What is apparent equality, therefore, is real inequality; we are paying four times as much as the public.

Mr. DODSON.—But you voluntarily acquired the railway subject to this condition.

Saunders.—It was not in our power to bring in a Bill to change the law; but here they are bringing in a Bill themselves, and the Chancery doctrine applies—"let him that seeks equity do equity." In answer to the question put by the court, I would say that while I can quote no case that establishes our right to be heard, I know of no case that negatives our strong claim to a hearing.

Mr. RICKARDS.—There are a good many cases the other way; for instance—

Mersey Docks and Harbour Bill 1858, Smethurst, p. 86;

Whitechapel and Holborn Improvement Bill 1865, 12 L. T. Rep. N. S. 31.

Saunders.—In none of those cases were the interests proved to be as distinct as they are in this case. True, we stand at present on the same footing as other ratepayers: but look at the hardship that inflicts. We pay the same rates as others, but we do not derive the same benefit from the works done by the Improvement Commissioners. To contend, therefore, that, because we pay now we must go on paying, is to beg the whole question.

Mr. DODSON.—This privilege of being rated at only one-fourth is conferred by Parliament in some cases but not in others. In the Milford Improvement Act 1857 Parliament did not think fit to insert it, but treated the Milford Railway, previously sanctioned, on the footing of an ordinary ratepayer. You, the Great Western Company, became the workers and occupiers of the Milford Railway with a knowledge of that fact, and you are in the shoes of the Milford Company. But I do not see how you can allege that you are damnified by the provisions of this Bill?

Saunders.—At the time the Railway Act was passed the practice was not uniform, but it has since become so.

Mr. RICKARDS.—If that be so, the Milford Railway Company might have applied for a clause protecting them, in the Improvement Act of 1857.

Saunders.—We are not the Milford Company.

Mr. RICKARDS.—Yes, you are, for the purposes of this discussion.

Saunders.—Well, if so, we are shut out from relief from all time. In the nature of things we cannot derive the same benefit as other ratepayers from the powers as to cemetery, watering, paving, lighting, &c., already vested in the hands of the commissioners, or conferred upon them by this Bill; and therefore our interests are distinct. This is the only opportunity of redressing an injustice affecting my clients, and of putting them on the same footing as other railways, and I therefore contend that they ought to be heard. Let the committee afterwards decide on the merits of their application. Had the Local Government Act 1858 preceded the Milford Improvement Act 1857, the 55th section of the Local Government Act, making railway companies liable in the proportion of one fourth only, would have been incorporated in the Improvement Act.

Mr. RICKARDS.—When the Milford Improvement Bill was before Parliament, the Milford Company might have applied for a clause containing provisions like those in sect. 55 of the Local Government Act.

Saunders.—The laches of the Milford Company ought not to be visited upon us.

Mr. RICKARDS.—How are the rating powers of the Milford Improvement Commissioners governed?

Marriott, for promoters.—By the Towns Improvement Act 1847, incorporated in the Improvement Act 1857. No special mention of railways is made in that Act, but the word "person" is interpreted to mean corporations, and therefore railway companies. Under that Act accordingly railways are not dealt with differently from other property.

Saunders.—But all railway companies are rated, according to modern practice, at one-fourth; and it is a common thing, when improvement commissioners who have been working under old Acts come before Parliament, for railway companies who have not the benefit of this lower rating, to appear upon petition and claim to have the modern system applied to them. I can recall no case in which such an application was refused. The rule as to shareholders not being allowed a locus standi against a company of which they are constituent members, will not apply in this case for two reasons, first, because our interests are distinct; and secondly, because there is here no machinery analogous to the Wharncliffe meeting, at which shareholders would have an opportunity of objecting.

Marriott.—The Milford Improvement Commissioners must be taken to represent the ratepayers, including the railway company. In borrowing 7000*l.* and mortgaging the rates, under the Act of 1857, the commissioners relied upon the rating powers given by that Act, including the power to rate railway property equally with the rest. The argument as to little benefit derived from outlay upon paving, &c., is fallacious, for the heavy waggons of a railway company do more damage to the streets than any other traffic.

Mr. DODSON.—Do the Great Western Company oppose the Bill as a whole, including the confirmation of the mortgages?

Saunders.—No; we should be satisfied with a locus standi against the rating clauses.

Marriott.—The petitioners have no locus standi at all. They are neither owners, lessees, nor occupiers within the meaning of the Standing Orders, or under the practice of Parliament. No lease respecting the railway has been entered into and sanctioned by Parliament in manner contemplated by the agreement which has been referred to. The Great Western Company, by the Bill which they have introduced this session, show that they do not consider the transfer of the Milford line to them complete. If such were the case, there would be no necessity for the Bill. As to the question of rating, that was determined when the line was originally sanctioned in 1856; the same question was again considered and dealt with by Parliament in 1857, when the Improvement Commissioners were constituted with power to levy rates, and no change affecting the railway was then made. Even supposing that the Great Western Company now stand for all purposes in the shoes of the Milford Company, they are represented for fiscal purposes upon the board of commissioners elected by the ratepayers. And by the Bill which these commissioners are now promoting, and against which the company seek to be heard, no change whatever is made in the rating powers. Accordingly, the petitioners fail to show any ground, first, why their interests are in any way distinct from those of the ratepayers generally; and, secondly, why they should be heard to claim exemption from liabilities which Parliament, on two occasions, declared that the Milford Company, in whose shoes they stand, should be liable to. Moreover, though the Great Western Company may in point of fact pay the rates, it does not follow that they are entitled to be heard as ratepayers.

Mr. RICKARDS.—The promoters have treated the petitioners as ratepayers, and it is as ratepayers they desire to be heard.

In accordance with a request by Mr. Rickards, the Gazette notice was then handed in for the purpose of seeing whether it would cover any alteration in the rating.

Digitized by Google

The REFEREES took time to consider their decision. At their next sitting on the 14th April they announced that the locus standi of the petitioners was disallowed.

Locus standi disallowed.

In a case subsequently heard before the Court of Referees (Aberdare and Aberaman Gas Bill), Mr. RICKARDS took occasion to observe that in the decision at which the court arrived in this case, they were largely influenced by the fact that there appeared to be nothing in the Bill which affected the Great Western Company.

Agents for the Bill, Marriott, Jordan, and Cooper.

Solicitors for the petitioners, Young, Maples, and Co.

Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

Reported by DOUGLAS KINGSFORD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

March 4 and 15.

(Present: the Right Hon. Sir JAMES W. COLVILE, Sir ROBERT J. PHILLIMORE, Lord Justice SELWYN, and Lord Justice GIFFARD.)

EMILIE MALVINA EVANTUREL and EDWARD RÉMILLARD (apps.), v. FRANÇOIS EVANTUREL (resp.)

Lower Canada—Will—Coutume de Paris, Art. 289—Dicté et nommé.

By the Coutume de Paris, Art. 289, "pour réputer un testament solennel," it is necessary that it be "dicté et nommé" by the testator to two notaries, and then that it be re-read to the testator in the presence of the notaries.

A testatrix stated to a notary the dispositions that she wished her will to contain. The notary made a memorandum, in which the dispositions were concisely stated, and the testatrix directed him to prepare a will in conformity therewith, and to send it to her in order to have it examined by counsel. This was done. A few days later the testatrix took the draft will to the notary, who then, in the presence of a second notary, asked the testatrix what dispositions she wished to make. The testatrix repeated in brief, and as if she knew them by heart, the dispositions which the will contained. The notary read over the will to the testatrix, and some alterations were suggested by the latter. The will, with the suggested alterations, was then re-read, and the testatrix being unable to write, the formula in such cases required was appended.

On an objection to the validity of the above will,

Held (affirming the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench of Lower Canada), that the will so executed was valid.

For the Coutume de Paris (1) does not require in express terms that the will should be written by a notary at the time of dictation, though it does require that the will be read over in the presence of the notaries and testator; (2) contains no declaration, like that in the Code Napoléon, that the formalities enjoined shall be observed on pain of nullity; and (3) does not require, by the expression dicté et nommé, that the notary should write at the dictation of the testator word for word, nor forbids the testator to dictate from a written and previously prepared instrument.

The mode in which the present will was executed was not obnoxious to the mischief which the Coutume intended to guard against, the will being the expression of the undoubted wishes of the testatrix, and further the force of contemporaneous exposition, embodied and continued in the practice of notaries down to the present time, and the principle of recent decisions in the Canadian Courts, are in favour of the validity of such an execution of a will as that described.

The words dicté et nommé must be considered as conveying one idea, the latter word being only used to strengthen the former.

This was an appeal from the judgments of the Court of Queen's Bench for Lower Canada (appeal side), the one, dated June 20, 1865, reversing a judgment of the Superior Court for the Province of Canada, district of Quebec; and the other, dated March 18, 1867, affirming a judgment of the Superior Court, in an action en pétition d'hérédité, instituted by the appellants (as husband and wife) against the respondent. The respondent and the female appellant were brother and sister and children of the late Marie Anne Bédard, or Evanturel, the validity of whose will was the question in dispute.

The petition alleged in substance that Madame Evanturel died on Nov. 10, 1863, leaving five children surviving her; that such five children constituted the sole heirs of Madame Evanturel, and that consequently each of them was entitled to one-fifth share of her property; that nevertheless the respondent had unlawfully possessed himself of the whole of the property to the exclusion of his sisters; and the petition concluded with a prayer that the respondent should be ordered to deliver up to the appellants one-fifth share of such property, with all profits accrued thereon.

To this petition the respondent replied by a peremptory and perpetual exception in law (exception péremptoire en droit perpétuelle) in which he pleaded a will made by his mother dated May 18, 1861, being that of which the validity was in question in this suit.

The will in question, after ordering payment of debts, and giving directions as to her funeral, comprised a donation by instrument inter vivos, which she had previously executed, of a piece of land in favour of her only son, the respondent. It then bequeathed her piano and some articles of furniture to her youngest daughter, Elmire Aglaé, and gave all the residue of her property, real and personal, to the respondent, with remainder to his children by his wife Louise, absolutely charged, however, with annuities of 15*l.* a piece to three of the sisters of the testatrix, and of 25*l.* a piece to her four daughters, with a provision that any one of these latter legacies should be at once annulled in the case of any daughter who should attempt to dispute the validity of the will; and she discharged her son from all accounts and claims against him as her agent or attorney during her lifetime, and appointed him sole executor of her will.

The appellants, having replied to the respondent's exceptions by general and special answers, which it is unnecessary to specify because not insisted on in the appeal, subsequently moved the Superior Court of Lower Canada that they might be permitted de s'inscrire en faux against the will pleaded by the respondent, to show that it was not duly executed as a testamentary instrument. This leave was granted, and the appellants filed the moyens de faux, i. e., a statement of their objections to the due execution of the will. These were as follows:—

First, that the pretended will of the said late Marie Anne Bédard (Evanturel), under date May 18, 1861, was not dicté et nommé by the said lady to M. Jh. Petitclerc and his colleague, notaries public, as falsely alleged in the pretended will.

Secondly, that the said pretended will was not dicté et nommé by the said late lady to M. Jh. Petitclerc and his colleague, notaries public, on May 18, 1861, as falsely alleged by the said pretended will.

Thirdly, that important parts of the said pretended will (other than the preamble), appeared to be manuscript written or altered in a strange hand,

Digitized by Google

other than that of either of the said two notaries, who passed the said will.

On the objections so pleaded issue was joined.

The testatrix could read imperfectly, but was unable to write.

The law which governed the execution of wills at the time when Madame Evanturel's will was made, consisted of Article 289 of the Coutume de Paris, and of the Statute 14 Geo. 4, c. 83, which extended to the people of Canada the power of making wills in the English form.

The provisions of the Coutume de Paris, the manner in which the will was executed, and the evidence in support of the objections made by the appellants, are sufficiently stated in the judgment of the Judicial Committee (post). The appellants, at the trial below, contended that on the evidence of the two notaries (Petitclerc and Huot) who prepared the will, it was clear that the will was not dicté et nommé by the testatrix, as required by the Coutume de Paris, because it was not dictated to the two notaries and then and there written by one of them in the presence of the other, and read and re-read to the testatrix, but was prepared by one notary (Petitclerc) alone, at his office, from notes taken down by him on a previous day, in the absence of the second notary; and that the other notary (Huot) was not present when the will was dictated, nor when it was written, and had never even seen it or the testatrix until his attendance at the office of Petitclerc, where he found the will already prepared for execution; that, in fact, Huot, instead of being present with Petitclerc at the dictation, writing, reading, and re-reading of the will as required by the Coutume, was present only when it was read and re-read and repeated in epitome, and acknowledged by Madame Evanturel; and that her repetition, "as if she had known them by heart," of the provisions of the will, bearing in mind that she could neither write nor read writing, must have been a mere parrot-like repetition of a lesson in which she had been beforehand instructed. And further, that the will was only read once, and not read and re-read after the alterations were made, and also that one of the most material clauses was not the spontaneous suggestion of, nor dictated by, Madame Evanturel, but was first suggested to her by her legal adviser, M. Casault.

The respondent called some notaries of Montreal and Quebec in order to prove a custom of the notaries of Lower Canada to pass testaments in the manner, above described, that had been adopted in this case. On the other hand, the appellants called eleven notaries from Quebec and Montreal and country districts in order to disprove any such custom.

The cause came on for hearing on June 10, 1864, in the Superior Court of Lower Canada, before Taschereau, J., who on Sept. 5 following pronounced judgment, which, so far as material, was as follows:—"Considering that it is established by the proof given in this cause on the objection to validity . . . that the will was not dictated and expressed (dicté et nommé) by Madame Evanturel to the notaries, according to the law. Considering that the fact of having in advance and upon notes given to a single notary, and taken by him in the absence of his brother notary, prepared during the next day the said will out of the presence of the testatrix, and of having submitted it to her all prepared on a following day in the presence of the second notary, in whose presence the will was read and re-read after the testatrix had repeated her dispositions to the notaries, is not equivalent to the formality required by the law as to dictating and expressing the will, and does not meet the exigencies of the law. Considering that in the execution of a solemn notarial will, the formalities prescribed by the law ought to be strictly observed under the penalty of nullity, and that equivalents ought not to be admitted in their execution, in order to avoid mistakes, errors, and frauds. The court maintains the objection to validity (inscription en faux) made against the will of Madame Evanturel, bearing date May 18, 1861, as being illegally executed; that is to say, as not having been dictated and expressed by the testatrix to the notaries public, who drew the will . . . and declares such will null for all legal purposes."

Against this decision the present respondent appealed to the Court of Queen's Bench of Lower Canada, and that court, on June 20, 1865, by a majority of one (Duval, C. J., Aylwin and Meredith, JJ., against Drummond and Mondelet, dissenting), reversed the judgment of the court below, dismissing the appellant's inscription en faux, with costs in both courts, and remitting the cause to the court below. The considérant for the decision, as stated in the preamble of the judgment, was as follows: "Considering that it is established by the evidence given in this cause on the inscription en faux against the testament of the late Madame Evanturel, passed before M. Petitclerc and his fellow notary, at Quebec, on May 18, 1861, that the said testament was dicté et nommé by the said testatrix to the said notaries, following and conformably to the law, and ought to be executed according to its form and tenor; and that in the judgment pronounced by the Superior Court at Quebec, on Sept. 5, 1864, which maintains the said inscription, there is error." This is the first of the two judgments appealed against.

The Court of Queen's Bench afterwards ordered that the appellants should be at liberty to prove their allegations as to the incapacity of the testatrix, and the fraud and undue influence alleged by them to have been practised by the respondent, but without recurring to the moyens de faux already decided upon by the court. The suit accordingly proceeded on these issues, and came on for hearing before the Superior Court. The cause was heard on the merits, and on May 16, 1866, Taschereau, J. gave judgment, dismissing the appellants' action with costs, on the grounds that they had failed to prove the allegations of their réponses spéciales to the respondents' exception péremptoire en droit perpétuelle, relative to the charges of suggestion et captation, and the mental condition of Madame Evanturel, and her capacity to make such testament. The Court of Queen's Bench of Lower Canada, on appeal, affirmed the judgment of the court below with costs. This is the second of the two judgments appealed against.

Bowring, for the appellants, and Wickens for the respondent, referred to the following authorities:

Ferrière, Coutume de Paris (edit. 1714), vol. 4, pp. 18, 105, 106, 107, 133;
Dalloz, Répertoire de Législation, vol. 16, p. 829 (edit. 1856), "De l'écriture par le Notaire," Artt. 2866-2904;
Routier v. Robitaille, 4 Stuart's Lower Canada Rep. 440, K. B.;
Toullier Droit Civil (edit. 1830), vol. 5, p. 330, "De la Dictée des Testaments;"
Code Napoléon, Art. 972, 1001;
Troplong Donations Entre-vifs et des Testaments (2nd edit.), vol. 3. p. 69, et seq.;
Burge Colonial and Foreign Laws, vol. 4, pp. 420, 425-426.

March 15th.—Judgment was delivered by Sir R. J. PHILLIMORE.—This is an appeal against two judgments of the Court of Queen's Bench of Lower Canada—one of the 20th June 1865, which reversed the judgment of the Superior Court of the 5th Sept. 1864, and the other of the 18th March 1867, which affirmed the judgment of the Superior Court of the 16th May 1866. The subject of these judgments and of the present appeal is the validity of the testament of the late Marie Anne Evanturel, widow, of Quebec. She died on the 10th Nov. 1863, leaving five children surviving her, among whom were the appellant, Emilie Malvina, wife of Edouard Rémillard; and the respondent, the Hon. François Evanturel. These five children, if she had died intestate, would have been entitled in equal shares to her property. The suit was begun by a claim to the succession of Madame Evanturel, entitled pétition d'hérédité, filed by the present appellants in the Superior Court of Lower Canada on the 7th Dec. 1863. In answer to this petition the present respondent, on the 5th Jan. 1864, replied by a peremptory and perpetual exception in law (exception péremtoire en droit perpétuelle), by which he pleaded a testament made by his late mother, dated the 18th May 1861. To this exception the appellant replied by a general answer, and by a special replication in which they impugned the validity of the testament on the ground of incapacity or undue influence (fraude, suggestion, captation, ménaces, employés par le défendeur). It may be convenient here to state that this allegation was disproved in the opinion of all the judges in the Canadian courts, and has not been insisted upon before their Lordships. The appellants in their special replication also relied on the invalidity of the execution of the testament. The mode of raising this latter issue is, according to the law of France and Lower Canada, to enter, by permission of the court, a process which is called inscription en faux. The appellants having duly obtained this leave, filed their moyens de faux, which were as follows:—"1. That the pretended testament of the 18th May 1861, was not dicté et nommé by the deceased to two public notaries, as falsely asserted in the pretended testament. 2. That it was not dicté et nommé by her to two public notaries on the 18th May 1861, as falsely asserted in the pretended testament. 3. That an important part of the alleged testament, other than the preamble, was written and altered by some stranger's hand, other than that of the two notaries who passed the testament." It appears from the evidence that M. Petitclerc, a notary, went to the testatrix, in obedience to a summons, on the 16th May 1861; he found her alone; she told him that she desired to make her testament; she then and there expressed the dispositions and bequests which it was to contain. M. Petitclerc drew up a memorandum in which they were concisely stated; the testatrix then told him to prepare her testament in conformity therewith, and to send it to her in order to its being examined by her counsel; he drew up the testament on the same or on the following day. Madame Evanturel, on the 17th, had an interview with her counsel, M. Casault, whom it appears that she had consulted on the subject of her will on the 15th and 16th May; he wrote in the margin of the will an alteration, subsequently cancelled and re-written by the notary; and on the afternoon of the 18th May Madame Evanturel went to the office of M. Petitclerc, bringing with her the draft testament, which he opened, and on perceiving M. Casault's alterations drew his pen through them; he then sent for a brother notary, M. Huot, who arrived; there was also present M. Casault. M. Petitclerc then asked the testatrix what were the dispositions which she desired to make, and she repeated in brief (en raccourcis), as M. Huot says, "as if she had known them by heart," all the dispositions which are contained in the testament, though not exactly, it would appear, in the same terms and in the same order. M. Petitclerc then read the testament—she suggested certain corrections, and the addition of the following correction attendant on the bequests to her daughters: "Et que quant à celle ou celles qui voudront contester mon dit testament, le legs à elles fait de la dite rente soit non avenu et caduc." It appears that M. Petitclerc then re-read the testament with the corrections and addition which have been mentioned; the testatrix then declared that she could not write, and what Taschereau, J. calls the énonce sacramentel, the essential formula, was put in the following words:

Digitized by Google

Ce fut ainsi fait, dicté et nommé par la dite dame veuve François Evanturel, testatrice, aux dits notaires soussignés, et son présent testament lui ayant été lu et relu par Maître Joseph Petitclerc, l'un des dits notaires, en presence de Maître Philippe Huot, son confrère, pour ce mandé, la dite dame Evanturel a dit le bien entendre et comprendre, et y a persisté, à Quebec, en l'étude de Maître Joseph Petitclerc, l'un des notaires, l'an 1861, le 18me jour du mois de Mai, après-midi, sous le numéro 11,686. Et la dite dame veuve François Evanturel a déclaré ne savoir ni écrire ni signer de ce requise, lecture faite et refaite.

Signé sur la minute, demeurée en la dite étude.

PHI. HUOT, N.P.
JH. PETITCLERC, N.P.

It may be convenient here to dispose of the two moyens de faux which relate respectively to the date of the testament and to the alterations in a strange hand. It has scarcely been contended before this court that the testament was dicté et nommé on the 16th May; and such a contention, in their Lordship's opinion, cannot be sustained. The question of the execution of the testament must be confined to the date of the 18th May. With respect to the alterations in a strange hand, they are fully accounted for by the testimony of the witnesses, and can in no way affect the decision in this case. In the evidence given by the witnesses, MM. Petitclerc, Casault, and Huot, some discrepancies occur, and also in the two depositions of M. Petitclerc made at different times; but their Lordships entirely concur with the remarks of M. Taschereau, J. upon this subject, and are of opinion with him that their discrepancies are insignificant, and do not affect the real and only question in this case, viz., the true construction of the law which governs the execution of this testament. There is no controversy as to what that law is. It is the 289th Article of the "Coutume de Paris," as declared by the Parliament of Paris in 1580, and it is in these words:

Art. 289.—Pour réputer un testament solennel, il est nécessaire qu'il soit écrit et signé du testateur: ou qu'il soit passé pardevant deux notaires, ou pardevant le Curé de la paroisse du testateur, ou son vicaire-général, et un notaire; ou du dit curé ou vicaire et trois témoins; ou d'un notaire et deux témoins: iceux témoins, idoines, suffisants mâles et âgés de vingt ans accomplis, et non légataires, et qu'il ait été dicté et nommé par le testateur aux dits notaires, curé ou vicaire-général, et depuis à lui relu en présence d'iceux notaires, curé ou vicaire-général, et témoins, et qu'il soit fait mention au dit testament qu'il a été ainsi dicté, nommé et relu; et qu'il soit signé par le dit testateur et par les témoins: ou que mention soit faite de la cause pour laquelle ils n'ont pu signer.

It is contended by the appellants that the provisions of this regulation have not been complied with, and that the testament is therefore invalid. They maintain that, according to the true construction of that regulation, and especially of the words "dicté et nommé par le testateur aux dits notaires," the testator must declare the dispositions which he desires to make, and that one notary at least, if not the two, must then and there write down these dispositions, and that unless this requisition of the law be obeyed, the testament is null. This construction of the Coutume was adopted by M. Taschereau, J., in the Superior Court of Lower Canada; and, accordingly, he sustained the inscription en faux, and pronounced against the validity of the testament. From this sentence an appeal was prosecuted to the Court of Queen's Bench of Lower Canada. That court reversed this decision, holding that the testament was duly executed. The court was composed of five judges; of these three, Duval, C.J., Aylwin and Meredith, JJ. delivered their judgments in favour of the validity of the testament; while two, Drummond and Mondelet, JJ. dissented, and agreed with Taschereau, J. From this sentence the present appeal has been prosecuted. The case has been fully argued before their Lordships, and we have now to deliver our opinion upon the true construction of the 289th Article of the Coutume de Paris in its application to the testament which is the subject of this litigation. Some preliminary observations occur which it will be well to mention in this place. First, that the language of this Coutume does not require in express terms that the will should be written by a notary at the time of dictation; though it does require that the will should be read over in the presence of the notaries and of the testator; and, secondly, that there is no declaration, like that which is to be found in the Code Napoléon, that the formalities enjoined shall be observed on pain of nullity. In respect to these particular words dicté et nommé, it appears to their Lordships that they must be considered as conveying one idea, the latter word being only used to strengthen the former; and in this opinion their Lordships are justified by the opinion of the learned editor of Ferrière, and of the decision to which he refers:—"La première chose à observer est qu'il faut que le testament soit dicté et nommé par le testateur, sur quoy on a demandé autrefois, si des mots équivalants suffisoient, comme proferez de sa propre bouche, il a été décidé qu'ils ne suffisoient pas, la Coutume disant dicté et nommé; mais que si un notaire ne mettoit que l'un des deux, ou dicté ou nommé, comme ils sont synonimes, qu'il n'y auroit point de nullité:" (Vol. 4, p. 133.) It was admitted by the counsel for the appellants that it was not necessary that the notary should write mót à mót the dispositions of the testament as dictated by the testatrix, that he might put them in proper language and in proper order, and with whatever amplifications were necessary to give them due legal force and effect, and that the testatrix might dictate from a written and previously prepared instrument. And their Lordships are clear that this view is correct, having regard both to the reason of the thing, and to the decisions which have been given upon the particular Coutume, as well as those which have been delivered upon the far more rigorous language of the article in the Code Napoléon, which are collected in Dalloz, vol. xvi., tit. 4, c. 2, sect. 4, article 2, sect. 2. (De l'écriture par le notaire.) In forming our judgment upon the general construction of the Coutume, one of the primary considerations has necessarily been to ascertain what was the mischief which this law was framed to remedy, and upon this point there is really no room for doubt. The authority of the commentator Claude de Ferrière has been much relied upon by both parties, and it is entitled to considerable weight in the explication of this law. After mentioning the various ways in which a testament solennel may be made under this Coutume, he adds: "Notre Coutume outre cela requiert dans les testamens plusieurs solemnitez, pour empêcher les fraudes et les suggestions. La première formalité ést, qu'il ait eté dicté et nommé par le testateur à celuy qui l'a reçû. La deuxième, qu'il soit relû au testateur, et qu'il soit fait mention qu'il a été dictè, et nommé, et relû. La troisième, qu'il soit signé par le testateur et par les témoins." (Ferrière, "Coutume de Paris," vol. iv, p. 18, edit. 1714.) And again, the same author, speaking of a will made ad interrogationem alterius, "La validité d'un testament ainsi fait, dépend beaucoup des circonstances, car les formalitez ne sont pas requises dans les testamens pour empêcher de tester, mais pour empêcher qu'ils ne fassent contre la volonté et l'intention des hommes, ainsi il paroît par les circonstances, que la disposition faite ad interrogationem alterius a été l'esprit de celuy qui l'a faite, elle doit être confirmée ainsi cela dépend de la prudence des Juges." (Pp. 105, 106.) This mischief of a fraudulent, or false, or extorted, or even suggested disposition, instead of the genuine expression of the testator's wishes, is certainly not incurred where, as in this instance, the testator is asked what his wishes are, where he deliberately expresses them, and where the instrument which contains them, though previously written, is read over to and approved by him. Their lordships agree with the opinion of Taschereau, J. on this point: "Il y a peu de doute que dans le cas présent, le testament argué de faux en cette cause présenterait à mon esprit une idée très forte de l'expression vraie et complète des volontés de Madame Evanturel." The execution of this testament not having sinned against the mischief which the law was intended to prevent, the consideration next in order appears to be, what interpretation did this law receive from contemporaneous exposition? This exposition is derived from the arrêts, or judicial decisions on the question, and is evidenced by the usage and practice of notaries public. 1. In considering the various arrêts cited both in the courts below and at the bar before us, we must distinguish those in which the testament was merely acknowledged in the presence of two notaries, though twice read in their presence and approved by the testator, from the present case, in which there was an actual dictation by the testatrix of the whole of her testamentary dispositions, though the writing did not follow that dictation. Even with respect to arrêts of the former description, there are three reported by Ferrière: that of Machéco, in 1597; that of Pisany, in 1602; and that of Claude Pollaët, in 1616, which latter arrêt was also confirmed by the Appellate Court, in which the testaments, acknowledged indeed and in the last case also signed by the testator in the presence of two notaries, but not dictated, were pronounced to be valid. It will be borne in mind that the date of the declaration of the Coutume is 1580; these arrêts, therefore, so far as their authority extends, have the force of a contemporaneous exposition. There are, it is true, on the other hand, various arrêts to be found in the books, in which testaments acknowledged and approved by the testator in the presence of two notaries, and twice read over, have been pronounced null, on the ground of their not having been dictés et nommés, according to the Coutume: but there does not appear to be one in which a testament, dicté as this testament was, has been set aside on the ground, either that the dictation was insufficient, or that the writing ought to have followed the dictation. And lastly, upon this point it is to be observed, that in the cases of Robitaille v. Bonneville and Routier v. Robitaille (Stuart's Rep. in K. B. of Lower Canada, 440), decided by the Court of Queen's Bench for the district of Quebec by Sewell, C. J. and Kerr, J. in the year 1829, in which cases the testament was inscrit en faux on the ground that it was not legally executed as a testament solennel, that is, not dicté et nommé according to the law and as certified by the notary, Meredith, J. says, and no doubt with perfect accuracy, "The evidence adduced in that case has been placed before us, and from the depositions of the two notaries and other evidence, it appears that the second notary was not present when the will was written. And yet the will was held to be a good will. The case went to appeal and was disposed of, as the gentlemen of the bar are aware, upon a different ground, and all that is said in the report respecting the point now under consideration is:—the court below, however, considered that the will had been regularly made, and rejected the inscription en faux." There is no doubt that jurists, both in Canada and in France, have differed upon the construction of this article of the Coutume. Their discordant opinions are more or less reflected by the conflicting decisions above referred to, and also by the difference in the practice of notaries in Canada. The interpretation put by the usage of these officers, who perform a public duty in the preparation of wills, is by no means unimportant; and the result of the evidence upon this head is, that the practice of the leading notaries in the principal Canadian towns of Montreal and Quebec greatly preponderates in favour of the mode of executing a testament adopted in the case before us. It appears, therefore, to their Lordships that even, if the French authority were admitted to be in favour of the stricter construction of the Article in question, the latter interpretation has, both by decision and by long usage, acquired the force of law in Lower Canada. The 23rd Article of the Ordonnance des Testaments of 1735 and the 972nd Article of the Code Napoléon have been referred to, and the decisions with respect to them were considered by the judges of the court below, whose opinions were adverse to the validity of this testament. Their Lordships do not think it necessary or expedient to enter into an examination of these decisions. There is, however, an observation arising from the consideration of these two latter Acts of French legislation which is, perhaps, not irrelevant to the question before us. The Ordonnance requires that the notaries, or one of them, écriront les dernières volontés du testateur telles qu'il les dictera, and the Article of the Code Napoléon, that the testament doit être écrit par l'un des notaires tel qu'il est dicté; and a subsequent article (1001) provides that the prescribed formalities shall be observed under pain of nullity. The inference from the insertion of these additional formalities, and of the penalty by which they are guarded in this later legislation, is certainly not unfavourable to the liberal construction of the Coutume declared in 1580, under the authority of which the testament before us was made. After a careful consideration of the law, and of the authorities applicable to this case, inasmuch as it appears to their Lordships, that the mode in which this testament has been executed is not obnoxious to the mischief which the Coutume intended to guard against, the testament being the expression of the undoubted wishes of the testatrix, and inasmuch as the force of contemporaneous exposition embodied and continued in the practice of notaries down to the present time is in favour of the validity of such an execution—an exposition in itself reasonable and sound—and having regard to the principle of the comparatively recent decisions of the Canadian Courts in Robitaille v. Bonneville, their Lordships will humbly advise Her Majesty that the judgments appealed from ought to be affirmed, the validity of this testament pronounced for, and the costs of this appeal paid by the appellant.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Judgments affirmed.

Solicitors for the appellants, Clarke, Son, and Rawlins.

Solicitors for the respondent, Bischoff, Cox, and Bompas.

Equity Courts.

COURT OF APPEAL IN CHANCERY.

Reported by THOMAS BROOKSBANK and E. STEWART ROCHE, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Saturday, May 8.

(Before the LORDS JUSTICES.)

Re THE LONDON PERMANENT BENEFIT BUILDING SOCIETY.

Winding-up — Petition — Benefit society — Resolution ultra vires—Priority of rights—Acquiescence of petitioner.

F. in 1853 paid up the full amount payable upon ten shares in the above-named society, and thereupon became a member of it. The rules provided that, any member not having received an advance might withdraw the balance to his credit on notice, but such withdrawal would be subject to his proportion of expenses and other deductions. In 1854 F., being entitled to do so, gave the notice, but the money was not repaid to him, and three years later a resolution was passed by the society which, in effect, left the losses to be exclusively borne by persons who were members antecedently to the resolution. The resolution was admitted to be bad, as being ultra vires of the society, but money was borrowed on the faith of it, and the claims of the lenders obtained, of course, a priority against the members. These claims were shown to exceed the value of the whole assets of the society. At the time F. was absent from England, but was aware of its position and proceedings, and twelve years after presented a winding-up petition:

Held (affirming the decision of Malins, V.C.), that the petition must be dismissed, as F. had no such substantial interest in the society's assets as would entitle him to support it, and had acquiesced in the resolution complained of.

This was an appeal by Col. French, who had presented a petition for the winding-up by the court of the above-mentioned society, against an order of Malins, V.C. dismissing his petition with costs. The hearing before his Honour is reported 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 388. That report contains a statement of all the necessary facts.

During the argument their Lordships offered to the petitioner a reference to chambers to inquire whether the sums advanced in consequence of the resolution were applied in satisfying debts, &c., of the society which were entitled to priority over the petitioner, but this offer was declined, and the arguments were continued.

Cole, Q. C. and Miller supported the appeal, and as to resolutions ultra vires referred to Hutton v. The Scarborough Cliff Hotel Company, 2 Dr & Sm. 514; 12 L. T. Rep. N. S. 228; and on appeal ib. 289.

Cotton, Q. C. and Hemings for the society.

Glasse, Q. C. and Macnaghten for the creditors.

Lord Justice SELWYN said:—I think, Mr. Cotton, we ought not to call upon you in this case, as the reference which has been offered by the court to the petitioner has been declined, and I have no doubt very prudently declined, by his counsel.

It is clear upon the evidence, and it has been in truth admitted at the bar on the part of the petitioner, that, if the sums which were paid upon the faith of the resolution of 1857 are entitled to priority over the claim of the petitioner, the petitioner has no longer any substantial interest in the funds, estate, or property of the company. But on behalf of the petitioner the validity of that resolution is disputed, and he contends that the resolution is entirely void; and this in truth is the substantial question existing between the petitioner and the respondent. Now, under these circumstances, although we have, as we have shown upon a very recent occasion, been willing to give full effect to the provisions of the Winding-up Act, and not to require the filing of a bill when the purposes of justice can be obtained by a less expensive proceeding under the powers of that Act: yet on the other other hand the court is bound to be cautious, and not allow the provisions of the Winding-up Act to be used for purposes other than those for which they were intended, nor to allow the extensive machinery of that Act to be put in motion, when other and more appropriate means of trying any particular question have been pointed out, and have been for a long time neglected by the petitioner for winding-up.

In the present case the position of the affairs of the company at the time when the present petitioner gave notice of withdrawal is very clearly stated in the affidavit of the secretary of the company. To that statement, I may observe, no substantial contradiction has been given in any affidavit filed on the part of the petitioner. But, considering the primâ facie right originally which the petitioner who paid this sum of 400*l.* had to the repayment of that money, and upon the statements made on this application to have a winding-up order, we thought it right to make an offer of reference; but that offer having been declined, we must, in the absence of any substantial contradiction, take the statements in the affidavit of the secretary of the company to be conclusively established.

The short result of that statement is this—this society had been started with very insufficient funds. They had incurred very considerable expense and debts, as anyone engaged in building speculations must do. Having been obliged to borrow considerable sums of money, those sums of money so borrowed were charges antecedent to the claims of any shareholder of the company, and, of course, the petitioner could not, by merely giving notice of withdrawal, obtain any priority as against those charges.

The affidavit further proves that, if at that time the company had been wound-up and the whole of the property disposed of, it would have been insufficient to discharge those prior claims; and consequently the petitioner, even assuming that he would be entitled to make this harsh claim because he gave the first notice, and that thereupon the company would be wound-up, and that he would be entitled to be paid in full his claim in priority to that of any other shareholder, would have obtained nothing. Assuming that he could have established the harsh claim, it would have no avail against the rights of the creditors; and consequently, upon the facts stated in the secretary's affidavit, he would have received nothing. He, therefore, very prudently abstained from taking any proceedings to enforce his claim, which would have resulted in his obtaining nothing.

Shortly afterwards he goes to India, but it appears that, although in India, his brother, who was trustee according to one of the letters, seems to have assumed the position of a director of the company; but whether he was or was not a director, he certainly was a trustee. In addition to that, he appears to have acted through another gentleman who was a stockbroker, and who appears to have been in constant communication with the officers of the company, and to have received certain letters and communications from them, none of which have been produced.

Under these circumstances, although of course due allowance ought to be made for a gentleman absent from this country engaged in the service of the country in a military capacity, still I think we cannot treat him as being altogether ignorant of the proceedings of the company.

That being the state of things, and it being obvious that if the affairs of the company had been wound-up no one would have received anything, as the amount would have been insufficient to pay the creditors, the reasonable course was taken of obtaining an advance of money, which could only be obtained on the condition of allowing the persons who advanced the money the right to stand in the shoes and on the footing of the creditors whose claims were paid off.

The substantial claim on the part of the present petitioner is that he is to have a winding-up order, the sole purpose and object of which is to have it decided that he is to be entitled to a priority over those persons who have advanced the money to pay off the creditors. In my judgment he has no right whatever to any priority. I think he must be taken to have lain by with some knowledge or means of knowledge of what was going on, and that he wisely and purposely abstained from insisting on his strict right, viz., the realisation within a short time after the making of his claim of all the property and effects of the company, that he lay by and acquiesced in matters being carried on in the only way in which they could be carried on, viz., by means of money obtained by the resolution, such money being applied in discharge of claims entitled to priority over those of the members or shareholders. If he had wished to run the risk of raising the question, he should have availed himself of an opportunity of raising it before. As Mr. Cole says, there are considerable difficulties, notwithstanding the rule now established, in the way of a person coming to ask for the dissolution of a partnership consisting of a great number of members. On the other hand the practice is well established that where, in pursuance of an invalid resolution, the directors or governing body of a partnership or society are making payments which are proved to be illegal and only justifiable by that void resolution, it is competent for any shareholder, either on his own behalf or on behalf of others who are prejudiced, to bring the company and the managing body before the court, and to ask for an injunction to restrain them from making any such payments.

That course was open to the petitioner during the whole time this was going on, but he did not avail himself of it. It appears to me that this is an attempt to put the court in motion by means of the extensive machinery of the Winding-up Act, without the risk to which he would be exposed if he came himself in person to try the question. Of course all the observations made with respect to acquiescence and laches would be applicable against him in addition to the risk he would have to run in raising the question at law. I think, therefore, this is an attempt to obtain a winding-up order at the instance of a person who has no substantial interest in a winding-up order being made at all. The matter is now before us for the purpose of trying the question, and, as far as we are now competent to decide it, we decide it against him. As far as the facts are concerned, he has had an opportunity of answering them by means of affidavit, of which he has not availed himself. And he has had a further opportunity of an inquiry which his counsel have prudently declined. Under these circumstances I think the only course will be to affirm the order of the Vice-Chancellor, and to dismiss this appeal petition with costs.

Lord Justice GIFFARD said:—The order on this petition will contain this recital, and be to this effect, viz., that "The court having offered the petitioner an inquiry to ascertain whether the sums referred to in the affidavit of the secretary as having been advanced on the faith of the resolution of 1857 were applied to any, and if to any to what, extent in discharge of the debts or liabilities having priority to the petitioner's claim, and that offer having been refused, the appeal be dismissed with costs."

That having been refused, the secretary's affidavit must be taken as accurate, and that being so the case stands in this way. The plaintiff some years ago gave notice to withdraw, and thereupon he was entitled to claim 400*l.* from this company; but it was a claim which was subject to the then external debts of the company. In that state of things in the year 1857 a committee is appointed. The committee make a report, and that report is confirmed and converted into a resolution of the company. One paragraph of that report is this: "Your committee most decidedly feel that all subscriptions on unadvanced shares subsequent to the third annual meeting being subscribed for the special purpose of rescuing the society from a position of total insolvency, should be exempted from participation in any losses which may ultimately arise in the realisation of the assets then held by the society, leaving such losses to fall solely upon the balances due to the shareholders on June 30th 1856, in rateable proportion to the amounts thereof."

Well that was acted upon, and we must now take it that, as the offer we made has been refused, the money so advanced was actually applied in payment of debts, which debts had priority, and have priority to the plaintiff's claim.

Well, then, throwing aside technicalities, I do not think it at all necessary to look at what the effect of not registering a resolution may be, or whether the resolution is or is not ultra vires. What the transaction was is a very simple one. Here you have a society, no one member of which can be compelled to advance or to pay a single sixpence; here you have the society in an insolvent state; you have debts which have priority over the payments, and you have the members and the society agreeing together, and saying, "We will voluntarily advance moneys for the purpose of paying the debts which have priority over the plaintiff's claim, provided we can stand in the shoes of those creditors who have that priority." They acted upon the faith of that, and, although I do not think it the least material whether the petitioner had or had not knowledge, I certainly must say that I have on the statement before us the clearest possible opinion that he had knowledge, and I do not hesitate to say that, if we either gave him priority, or put him on the same footing as those that had advanced the money, we should be doing a gross injustice, and I am happy to say there is no rule of law which at all compels us to do anything of the kind.

I am of opinion, therefore, that the petitioner really and truly has no locus standi, because it was admitted, that if those persons have priority there can be nothing coming to the petitioner by any possibility. That being so, the petition was improperly presented, and the appeal must be dismissed with costs in the usual way.

Solicitors: Lanfear and Stewart; Shaw and Fraser.

Friday, May 28.

(Before the LORDS JUSTICES.)

Re CHARLES LAFFITTE AND CO. (LIMITED); DE ROSAZ'S CASE.

Contributory—Notice of allotment—Authority to agent—Ratification of acts done.

De R. having applied for shares in the above named company, wrote to the company requesting that the letter of allotment might be handed to H., who was one of the promoters of the company. Shortly after the shares were allotted to De R., and on H.'s applying for the allotment, a bundle which contained numerous letters of allotment was handed to him. It was disputed whether the allotment to De R. was amongst these, but it was proved that when H. received the bundle, De R.'s letter to the company had not been posted, but it was afterwards sent by De R. to H., and by him produced to the company. De R. never paid anything in respect of the shares, but his name having been inserted by the liquidator in the list of contributories, it was removed by the Master of the Rolls.

Held, that the letter, though not in H.'s hands when he received the allotment, was a ratification of what he did, and the evidence showing that the allotment letter of De R.'s shares was in the bundle handed to H., De R. had notice of the allotment, and must be settled on the list.

This was an appeal by the official liquidator of the above-named company, which is now being wound-up in the chambers of the Master of the Rolls, against a decision of his Lordship removing from the list of contributories the name of the respondent, the Chevalier De Rosaz, as the holder of 500 shares.

The hearing at the Rolls is reported in 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 348, where all the circumstances are sufficiently stated. It should, however, be mentioned that, whereas Mr. Hillel received the letter of allotment of the shares on the 23rd Dec. 1865, the letter of Mr. De Rosaz authorising him to do so, which was dated on the 20th, was not posted until the 8th Jan. 1866.

Jessel, Q. C., and Waller supported the appeal.

Swanston, Q. C., and Higgins argued the case for the respondent.

The authorities cited were:

Gunn's Case, Re The Universal Banking Corporation, L. Rep. 3 Ch. App. 40; 17 L.T. Rep. N. S. 365;
Levita's Case, L. Rep. 3 Ch. App. 36; 17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 337;
Cookney's Case, 3 De G. and J. 170;
Re The Anglo-Danish, &c., Steam Navigation Company, Sahlgreen and Carrall's Case, L. Rep. 3 Ch. App. 323;
Fletcher's Case, 17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 136.

Lord Justice SELWYN said: Mr. Jessel, I think we ought not to call upon you to reply in this case. In the first place the application for shares on the part of Mr. De Rosaz is proved, and it is, in fact, admitted by himself in his own affidavit that he applied for the shares. I think the allotment of shares is also conclusively proved. The allotment appears in the allotment book of the company; but what goes much further than that is, that the transaction relating to the allotment of these shares, which form part of the total of 10,000 shares, distinctly appears not only from the document which has been produced from the books of the company and referred to in Mr. De Rosaz's affidavit, but from the whole series of transactions. It was certainly a singular, and to some extent an irregular transaction but I think the present respondent cannot be heard to complain of it when he was a party to the transaction, when he allows his name to be made use of by Hillel, and was held out to the world as being one of the shareholders in the company; and without paying any sum of money, he was to have the advantage of the chance of a rise in the price of the shares and to receive some compensation from the promoter. A person who does so cannot be heard to complain of the irregularity of the transaction. The transaction is a very simple one. He applies for the shares; the shares are allotted to him, and at or about the same time—I think nine days after the application, which was on the 11th Dec., on the 20th Dec.—he writes a letter in which he says: "I have applied for 500 shares in your company, I have to request you to hand the letter of allotment of same to Mr. Jules Hillel." That he signs. It is true that is not posted until the 8th Jan., but, provided it is received by Mr. Hillel, it is, of course, an authority to him to do what is expressed in that letter. The allotment takes place on the 22nd, and on the 23rd Mr. Hillel, who, no doubt, had suggested this letter and many other letters, comes, and being the agent who was to pay for getting subscriptions to the amount of 10,000 shares, asks for the letters of allotment, and he is, of course, met with the very patent objection that he has not got the authority of the allottees to receive their letters of allotment; but he says "I have the authority of a great many of them, and the others I will produce at a subsequent time;" and upon the faith of the letters of allotment which he then produced, and upon his promise, which was subsequently performed, to produce the rest, he receives a bundle of letters. I think if, after he receives from this very person a letter, and does, in pursuance of that promise, deliver that letter to the secretary of the company, it is perfectly inmaterial whether that letter was posted on the 8th Jan. But so far as the person who wrote the letter put himself in Mr. Hillel's hands, he is in the same position, having ratified what was done, as if it had been posted on the day on which it was written, and been received in London on the same day. Then if that be so, there is due communication of this allotment to the person authorised to receive it, provided only that the letter of allotment was included in that bundle which is the only question that remains. After that the whole transaction goes on entirely in accordance with the arrangement entered into between the parties. It is true, as Mr. Swanston said, that Mr. De Rosaz was not in the position which is ordinarily filled by a person who has applied for shares, and who has received an allotment of these shares; but he was not in that position because he himself had omitted the very essential part of the duty of a person applying for shares, namely, payment on the same day in respect of the deposit and allotment, amounting to 5*l.* a share. He would have been bound to pay, if he had been an ordinary shareholder, 2500*l.*; but the arrangement was that another person was to pay that for him. He is a creditor for that 2500*l.* in the books of the company, as if it had been paid by himself; and on the other hand, in the account with the company Mr. Lafflitte is debited and the company is credited with the sum of 2500*l.*, that being in exact accordance with the original arrangement. The question, therefore, is narrowed to the simple question of fact, whether this letter of allotment was included in the bundle, which was delivered on the 23rd Dec. to Mr. Hillel, who was authorised to receive the letter.

In the first place we have the affidavit of Mr. Read, who states positively that it was included and that it was delivered, and this is entirely in accordance with all the probabilities of the case, seeing that the transaction was in every other respect acted upon and carried into execution exactly in accordance with the arrangement, as to which there is no dispute; and it would be a very singular thing if by any accident this particular letter had been omitted from that bundle. Mr. Read positively swears that it was included, although it is true that Mr. Hillel has made a subsequent affidavit in which he has denied that it was there. Then we have next in order of date the deposition of Mr. Bate, which is not contradicted at all. It has been argued before us that that deposition of Mr. Bate does not state positively the delivery of the letter. What he says is this, "I remember Mr. Hillel coming to the office of the company and asking Mr. Read for some letters of allotment. They were letters of allotment of 10,000 shares to gentlemen whose names Mr. Hillel had previously handed in as applicants for shares." Now there were not two such sets of 10,000 shares, and this is a distinct allegation that there was an application for the letters of allotment for 10,000 shares, which, according to the uncontradicted evidence, included the shares of De Rosaz. Then Mr. Bate goes on to say, "This happened shortly after the allotment of shares had been made. Mr. Hillel handed to Mr. Read, or undertook to procure, letters in a certain form signed by all the applicants, requesting that the letters of allotment should be handed to Mr. Hillel for them. I saw Mr. Read hand the letters of allotment to Mr. Hillel." In the absence of all suggestion that there were other letters of allotment to which that evidence could apply, and when it is joined with the established fact that Mr. De Rosaz's shares constituted a portion of the 10,000 shares which are referred to in the previous part of the deposition, in my judgment it is a clear statement that Mr. De Rosaz's letter of allotment was included in the letters of allotment which Mr. Bate says he saw Read hand over to Mr. Hillel. I think, therefore, that we have all the probabilities of the case, we have the acts of the parties, and we have, supposing there to be a conflict of evidence, the evidence of two disinterested witnesses as against the evidence of Mr. Hillel, with this additional observation that one of the witnesses makes his depositions after the date of Mr. Hillel's depositions, and he is not met, as I have already said, with any subsequent denial. Therefore I think that Mr. De Rosaz, who has applied for the shares under the circumstances I have mentioned, and given the authority which I hold in my hand to Mr. Hillel, cannot now be heard to dispute the necessary consequences of his own act, and I think, therefore, that he ought to have been included in the list of contributories; and as it appears by the order that the application made at the Rolls was an application made by him, and it was, I presume, an application to remove his name from the list of contributories, that application ought to have been refused with costs. I think there should be no costs of the appeal, excepting that the official liquidator will have his costs out of the estate.

Lord Justice GIFFARD said:—This appears to me to be a very plain case. Hillel was the promoter of this company. and Mr. Charles Lafflitte was to receive from the company a very large sum of money—I believe 150,000*l.* In the course of the formation of the company 10,000 shares were to be allotted, in respect of which Charles Lafflitte arranged to pay 5*l.* per share, and Mr. Hillel was employed for the purpose of obtaining applications for allotment, and the letters of allotment were, in fact, to be held until the parties who made the applications themselves paid the 5*l.* a share, which 5*l.* a share was, in the first instance, to be paid by Mr. Hillel. The letters of application were, beyond all question, sent in to the company, and amongst others was a letter of application from Mr. De Rosaz. Upon that there is no dispute whatever. It is plain upon the evidence that there was as a matter of fact an allotment. There is the allotment book, and, no doubt, there was an allotment upon the footing of those applications. But then it is said that there was no notice to Mr. De Rosaz of the allotment having been made. Whether there was notice given to him, or to his agent, comes to the same thing. The Master of the Rolls, at the hearing before him, does not at all appear to have disbelieved either Mr. Bate or Mr. Read, nor is there any ground for his doing so. Taking their evidence, what the matter amounts to is this—there having been this allotment which must be taken to have been known beyond all question to Mr. Hillel, Mr. Hillel goes and asks for the letters of allotment, and there is handed to Mr. Hillel a bundle which, he is told, contains the letters of allotment, and they are handed back in a box to which he has access. Whether the letter was there or not, I do not think material—upon the evidence I infer beyond all doubt that it was; but whether it was there or not would not be in the slightest degree material, because that very transaction told Mr. Hillel in plain terms that the allotment had been made, and it was represented to him that the bundle delivered to him was the letters of allotment. I think also that this amounts to quite a sufficient delivery of the letters of allotment, and again I say that it is not material whether the letter of allotment was there or not. Then we go beyond that, because Charles Laffitte having this interest in the matter, the company owing him 150,000*l.*, he is debited with 5*l.* a share upon the 10,000 shares, and the company is credited with that amount.

The only other point urged was this—that Mr. De Rosaz's letter, giving the authority, was not posted till the 8th Jan. Whether it was posted before or after the transaction is not in the slightest degree material, and I have no doubt that there was plenty of authority as appears by the letter, but whether there was or not that letter was written to Mr. Hillel after the transaction; of course it ratified everything that had taken place before, and Mr. De Rosaz must be bound by it.

I am clearly of opinion that he contracted to take these shares, and therefore his application to have his name taken from the list should have been refused, and refused with costs. His name will now be inserted on the list of contributories for 500 shares.

Solicitors: Stevens and Rawlinson; Abrahams and De Roffey.

ROLLS COURT.

Reported by HENRY PEAT, Esq., Barrister-at-L

June 1, 3, and 7.

Re BLAKELY ORDNANCE COMPANY; Ex parte THE METROPOLITAN AND PROVINCIAL BANK.

Company—Winding-up—Debentures payable to bearer—Claim by creditor to prove on collateral security.

A company gave to a bank, as a collateral security for a debt, certain debentures containing a covenant to pay to C., his executors, administrators, or assigns, or to the bearer thereof, the sums therein mentioned. The debentures had been made out in the name of C. with the view to a transaction between him and the company, which went off. These debentures were then handed over to the bank, but were not formally assigned:

Held, first, that the bank, being merely holders and not assignees of the debentures, took them irrespective of any equities existing between C. and the company.

Secondly, that the bank were not entitled to prove on the debentures, as they had already proved for the full amount of the debt owing to them.

Re Barned's Banking Company—Kellock's case, 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 671; L. Rep. 3 Ch. App. 769, distinguished.

This was an application by the Metropolitan and Provincial Bank for liberty to prove under the winding-up of the above company upon thirty-two debentures of 250*l.* each. issued to them by the company, as well as upon the acceptances of the company for 4000*l.*, which was the entire amount due to the bank.

The company being in the early part of the year 1866 indebted to the bank in the sum of 9000*l.*, an arrangement was made by which all but 4000*l.* was paid off, and it was agreed that bills for the 4000*l.* should be renewed, and that thirty-two debentures of the company for 250*l.* each should be given to the bank as a collateral security for the debt.

These debentures were part of a number which had been made out in the name of a Mr. Challis, the manager of the Albion Bank, for the purpose of carrying out an arrangement between the company and the Albion Bank, which arrangement had gone off.

By each of these debentures the company covenanted to pay to Challis, his executors, administrators, or assigns, or to the bearer thereof, the sum of 250*l.*; and also to pay to the bearer of every coupon thereto annexed the sum of money in such coupon mentioned. And it was thereby provided that the bearer of the debenture, and every bearer of any of the coupons thereto annexed, should have power to give receipts for the money which was intended to be secured by the instrument of which he should so be the bearer, although he might not be the owner, or the sole or absolute owner thereof, and that the company or persons paying the same should not be bound to inquire into the title of the bearer, or be bound to take any notice of any trust affecting such money, or be affected by express notice of any equity which might then be subsisting in relation to the title of such bearer, or to such instrument as aforesaid, or to the money intended to be thereby secured.

The transaction with the Albion Bank having gone off, these debentures were handed over to the Metropolitan and Provincial Bank as a collateral security for the amount due to them, on the occasion of their renewing the bills for 4000*l.* The bank had been admitted to prove upon the bills for 4000*l.*, and they then carried in their claim to prove upon the debentures; their claim was disallowed by the chief clerk, who adjourned the case into court at the request of the bank.

Southgate, Q. C. and R. E. Turner, for the bank, submitted that they were entitled to prove on the debentures in their own name without being subject to any equities existing between Challis and the company. They cited—

Re Blakely Ordnance Company, ex parte New Zealand Banking Corporation, 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 132; L. Rep. 3 Ch. App. 154;
Dickson v. Swansea Vale Railway Company, 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 346; L. Rep. 4 Q. B, 44.

Sir Richard Baggallay, Q. C. and J. Napier Higgins, for the official liquidator, contended that the bank could only prove once for the amount of their debt, and not on the debentures as well as on the bills; and that even assuming that they could prove on the debentures they could only do so subject to the equities between Challis and the company. They cited—

Re Natal Investment Company; Claim of the Financial Corporation, 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 171; L. Rep. 3 Ch. App. 355.

Google

June 7.—Lord ROMILLY.—I think in this case that the bank was only entitled to prove for 4000*l.*, the amount due to them. Upon the first opening I thought this was a case where the question arose, whether the bank took the debentures, subject to any equities, which might exist between the company and Mr. Challis, in whose name the debentures were issued; but, on further investigation of the facts, I am of opinion that no question arises here upon that part of the case. In my opinion they are not assignees of the debentures at all. I will assume, for the purpose of this argument, that any assignees of the debentures from Challis would take subject to the equities of the bank. In my opinion, in this case they are not assignees of any chose in action at all; they are the holders of a chose in action, but they are not the assignees of it. I mean the original holders; that is of course, as between the man who gives the right and the person who holds the chose in action, whether it is a debenture or whether it is a bill of exchange. There is no question that that is subject to all the equities between the person who gave it and the person who holds it. Then the question arises when he is not the person to whom the chose in action is originally given, but the person to whom it is assigned, whether he does not take the chose in action subject to the equities between the first two persons. The thing is very obvious and clear; in the one case there are three persons, and in the other only two. If A. gives a bill of exchange to B., of course that is subject to all the equities between A. and B.; but if A. gives a bill of exchange to B., who assigns it for value, without notice, to C., then C. holds it subject to all equities, not between him and A., which would otherwise be so, but between A. and B. That case does not arise here. I thought at first that was a question which would have to be determined in this instance; but it is not so at all. Then the next question is this, whether the bank can prove for anything more than 4000*l.*? Now I understand the facts of the case to be these: [His Lordship stated the facts of the case, and continned.] Having stated my opinion that there is no equity between them, the next question is whether this was a bonâ fide issue of these debentures? I have no doubt it was a perfectly bonâ fide issue of debentures. They were issued by Captain Blakely, and they were given to Captain Blakely by the company for the purpose of being issued to Mr. Challis upon a transaction which went off. That transaction having gone off, he issued these debentnres as perfectly good and bonâ fide debentures to the Metropolitan and Provincial Bank. That is a perfectly good and perfectly proper transaction; and it does not lie in the mouth of the Bank to say that Captain Blakely had no authority to deliver them over to the Metropolitan and Provincial Bank. On the contrary it is quite clear that, as he did not commit a fraud, as he did not issue them for any benefit of his own, but issued them only as a consideration for having the 4000*l.* bills renewed, the transaction was a perfectly good and valid one. Now certainly up to that point all the observations I have made are in favour of the Metropolitan and Provincial Bank, but after that the case, I think, entirely fails as to them. Then the question comes to this—does this case come within, what I may for shortness call, Kellock's case (sup.)? I am of opinion that it does not. I will give two or three instances to show what my meaning is. For instance, the company owes the bank 4000*l.*, for which they give a bill and they execute a mortgage upon Whiteacre. There Kellock's case applies. The bank may enforce the mortgage upon Whiteacre and prove for the whole amount of the debt. Again, if the company owe 4000*l* and pledge 100 bales of cotton, then Kellock's case applies; the bank may sell the cotton for what it is worth and prove for the whole debt. I will go a step further. I will assume that they have got thirty two debentures of 250*l* each in Company X., and that they pledge those. Then Kellock's case applies again. The bank may realise those debentures against Company X., and prove for the whole of their debt. But the present case is quite different. Suppose that, in addition to the promissory notes for 4000*l.* they give two other promissory notes for a similar amount, then Kellock's case does not apply at all. Supposing that, in addition to that, they give a covenant that they will pay the debt, then Kellock's case has no application whatever. Supposing they issue debentures, if there was in addition to that, a covenant to secure the debt, then Kellock's case has no application at all. It is only one debt secured in various modes against themselves, and that distinction is perfectly plain as it appears to me. In every one of the cases which I have last put, you must prove against the company itself; whether it is on the bill, or on the debenture, or on the covenant, you must prove, and you can only prove, for the amount that is due; but in the other cases where there is a mortgage, where there is a pledge of cotton, or a pledge of debentures belonging to another society, they have nothing to do with the proof against the company which you are seeking to establish. Those things are to be realised, you may get the full amount for them, and there you may prove for the full amount of the debt. In the present case you can only prove for the amount of the debt. Then it was very ingeniously suggested by Mr. Higgins in his argument, that they might sell the debentures; but the person to whom the debentures are sold and transferred, stands in no better position than the person who transfers them in respect of that particular debt. You cannot by selling or transferring these debentures to ten persons multiply the proof ten times over. You can only prove once for the debt. Therefore, in my opinion, Kellock's case does not apply to this case. In other respects I think they are in the right, but that they can only prove for the 4000*l.* Accordingly I will answer the summons in that form. I will not make the bank pay any costs, but I do not think I can give them any costs; the official liquidator will have his costs out of the estate.

Solicitors for the bank, Davidson, Carr, and Bannister.

Solicitors for the official liquidator, Lewis, Munns, Nunn, and Longden.

Feb. 18 and 19.

THE MADRID BANK (LIMITED) v. PELLY.

Company—Directors—Promoters—Promotion money—Payment by promoters to directors—Costs.

A limited company was incorporated in 1868 for the purpose of establishing an international bank under a concession to be obtained from a foreign Government. The nominal capital of the company was 1,200,000*l.* in 60,000 shares, of which the first issue was to be 30,000*l.* It was provided by the articles of association that as soon as the allotment of shares under the first issue should take place, the directors should pay 10,000*l.* to the promoters. Before the concession was obtained so as to place the company in a position to begin business, and when only about 5000 shares had been subscribed for, the directors allotted the shares, and paid 5000*l.* to the promoters, who on the same day paid 500*l.* apiece to four of the directors. This payment to the promoters almost exhausted the funds of the company, and it was soon afterwards ordered to be wound-up.

On a bill by the company and its official liquidato

Digitized by Google

against the directors to render them liable for a breach of trust in thus misapplying the moneys of the company and to compel repayment thereof:

Held, that no decree could be made as to the 5000l., as the persons who had received the money had not been made parties to the suit, but that each of the directors must refund to the company the 500l. received by him from the promoters:

Held also, that, when costs are given against a company in the process of winding-up, they are to be paid by the liquidator out of the assets, and are not to be proved for.

This was a suit instituted with the sanction of the court by the Madrid Bank and its official liquidator against all the former directors of the bank, praying that it might be declared that a certain payment of 7000l. to the promoters was a breach of trust on the part of the defendants and a misapplication of the moneys of the bank, and that the defendants were liable to make good the same; and also that in any event it might be declared that the receipt of 500l. apiece by Pelly, Chapman, Daniell, and Turck, four of the directors, from the promoters, was a breach of trust on the part of the four directors and a misapplication of the moneys of the bank, and that they might be ordered to repay the same.

The Madrid Bank, Limited, was on the 13th May 1863, incorporated as a company limited by shares under the provisions of the Companies Act 1862. The nominal capital of the bank was 1,200,000l. divided into 60,000 shares of 20l. each, with power to increase. According to the prospectus, the first issue was to be 30,000 shares; 1l. per share was to be paid on application, and 1l. per share on allotment. The first call was to be 3l. per share, and it was not proposed to call up more than 10l. per share.

By the memorandum of association the objects for which the bank was established were stated to be the transacting of every kind of banking business in London, and by means of banks, branch banks or agencies, at other places in the United Kingdom and in Spain and its colonies and dependencies, and elsewhere.

By the articles of association, it was provided that Messrs. Daniell, Chapman, Turck, Dumas, Pelly, and Venning should be the first directors of the company; that George Williams, of Madrid, one of the promoters of the company, should be the first director general of the company at Madrid; that the directors should be at liberty to commence the business of the company as soon as they should see fit, notwithstanding the whole capital might not have been then subscribed for or taken; and that in consideration of the great labour, expenses, and risk which the promoters had incurred and been put to in and relating to the promotion and formation of the company, and in registering the memorandum and articles of association, and otherwise in forming and bringing the company into operation in Spain as well as in England, the directors should, when and as soon as the allotment of shares under the first issue should take place, pay to the promoters the sum of 10,000l. in full of all charges of whatever description incurred by the promoters, either on their own behalf or on behalf of the company prior to the day on which such allotment of shares should be made.

At a meeting of the board of directors, held on the 29th June 1863, it was resolved that an allotment of shares should be immediately made. The total number of shares which had at that time been subscribed for in England did not exceed 5000l. of which 1000l. were subscribed for by the directors, each of whom, except Dumas, subscribed for 200 shares, and only 5876l. stood to the credit of the company at their bankers. The directors had been informed that about 15,000 shares had been subscribed for in Spain, and that 12,600l. must be deposited as caution money, to obtain a concession from the Spanish Government to carry on the bank at Madrid, for which concession they had applied.

At a meeting of the board of directors, held on the 6th July 1863, at which all the directors, except Dumas, were present, it was resolved that the sum of 5000l. should be paid to the promoters of the bank on account of the promotion money; and the payment was accordingly made on that day. On the same day the promoters paid 500l. a piece to Pelly, Chapman, Daniel, and Turck, without the knowledge of the two other directors, Venning and Dumas.

On the 20th June 1864, a resolution was passed at a meeting of the board of directors, at which all the directors, except Dumas, were present, that a further sum of 2000l. should be paid to the promoters on account of the promotion money, and the same was accordingly paid.

No shares had in fact been subscribed for in Spain, and the total number of shares allotted at any time did not exceed 5319. A concession was obtained from the Spanish Government in April 1864, but the bank transacted little or no business, and, on the 18th March 1865, an order was made for its compulsory winding-up.

In the course of the winding-up the promoters sent in their claim against the bank for the sum of 3000l., being the balance remaining unpaid of the 10,000l. promotion money mentioned in the articles of association, but this claim was disallowed by the Master of the Rolls: (See Re Madrid Bank, ex parte Williams, 14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 456; L. Rep. 2 Eq. 216.) In support of that claim J. E. Williams, one of the promoters, deposed that the sum of 500l. was paid to the directors under an agreement previously entered into between the promoters and the four directors; that the money paid by these directors in respect of the shares which they should apply for should be returned to them. This was made evidence in the present suit.

Pelly, Chapman, and Turck, in their answers, stated that after the allotment of shares the promoters presented each of them with a sum of 500l. as a spontaneous gift, but not in pursuance of any previous arrangement or agreement.

The defendant Daniell, being out of the jurisdiction of the court, had not been served.

Roxburgh, Q.C., and Edmund James, for the plaintiffs, submitted that the directors, being trustees for the shareholders, were liable to refund the moneys of their cestuis que trust, which they had improperly paid to the promoters. They cited Turquand v. Marshall, 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 385; L. Rep. 6 Eq. 112; on appeal, 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 766; L. Rep. 4 Ch. App. 376.

They submitted that it was at any rate clear that the directors must refund the money which they had received from the promoters. It was settled that when a director shares with a stranger the benefit of a bargain made between the stranger and the company, the director's share of the benefit belongs to the company. They cited

Re The Brighton Brewery Company, Hunt's case, 37 L. J. 278 Ch.

Sir Richard Baggallay, Q.C., and Eddis, for Pelly and Chapman, contended that the whole transaction had been bonâ fide; that there was no evidence that the money had been paid in pursuance of any previous arrangement; and that the company had no right to what had been given gratuitously to the directors by the promoters.

Southgate, Q.C., and Renshaw, appeared for Venning.

Digitized by Google

J. Napier Higgins, for Dumas.

Turck did not appear.

Lord ROMILLY intimated that he would not make any decree as to the 5000*l* and 2000*l* in the present suit, as the promoters who received these sums were not parties to the suit; that he thought the bill must be dismissed with costs against Venning and Dumas; and as to the other defendants he would read the evidence and dispose of the case on the following day.

Feb. 19.—Lord ROMILLY.—I shall not trouble you in this case, Mr. Roxburgh, because what I said on the former occasion, when this matter was before me, applies entirely to the present case. The case is as distinct, in my opinion, as it can possibly be. The facts of the case, which are not denied, are these;—that there was 10,000*l.* to be paid to the promoters; it was well known that this 10,000*l.* was to be paid to the promoters as soon as the allotment of shares was made, and the allotment of shares was to be made when they were in a situation to carry on the business. Therefore, three things were necessary. It was necessary that they should be in a situation to open the bank and carry on the business; that they should also thereupon allot shares; and thereupon that they should pay the promotion money, or the money to the promoters. Well, what takes place is this; they do not get the concession from Spain. It is essential to observe that the very essence of the company was to make it a bank having connection with Spain—a bank which should be a Spanish and English bank, carrying on business at Madrid and London. Their object was not to form another mere joint-stock bank in London, and they did not get the Spanish concession until, I think, the month of April 1864. In the month of July 1863, nine months before that, as soon as they get a little money, they determine to allot shares when they have only got in round numbers 5000 shares taken; when they have got 5000 shares and very little more, they give 5000*l.* to the promoters at once. Well, that seems to be a very strange proceeding, and one that requires to be looked into, that they should begin business before they had got the concession from Spain, and before, in point of fact, they had got capital enough to carry on the business. It is true that they could acquire fresh capital by making fresh calls, but it is exceedingly unpopular to do so in the case of a bank; it does not answer with a bank. The object is to carry it on with as small an expense as possible. They make this payment to the promoters. Well, what takes place is this; out of the sum so paid, the promoters pay 500*l.* to each of the four directors, who ordered the payment to be made. That takes place forthwith. Well, it is very properly admitted by Sir Richard Baggallay and Mr. Eddis that if the promotion money was paid for the purpose or with the knowledge, or under an express agreement that this payment should be made to the directors, it is a transaction which cannot be supported. They cannot properly pay money to the directors in order that they may have 500*l.* a piece. They state in their answers that this was, in fact, mere bounty, unexpected bounty, on the part of the promoters, who out of pure gratitude and good-will gave them this large sum of 500*l.* a piece. Well, really the thing is disposed of by the deposition of Mr. Williams, who expressly states that it was expressly agreed to. (His Lordship here read Mr. Williams' deposition.) That is expressly stated by him. He says that he made the arrangement, and accordingly it was actually done. Well, the real fact is that the combination, and the simultaneousness of the transaction, is evidence that the whole matter was one transaction between them. If it were perfectly true that no arrangement was made at all, but that it was out of mere bounty and goodwill that the promoters thought fit to do this, then the answer of the directors should have been, "Why, the mere fact that we are directors, and that you could not have obtained the money except by our order, makes it impossible for us to receive anything, or for you to give anything." No absence of agreement or the like will justify such a transaction as that, where there is that particular species of relation between the parties. In point of fact it is impossible to suppose that the promoters would involuntarily and willingly have paid out of their own money 500*l.* a piece to four gentlemen whom they knew very little about, except that they were directors of this company, and with whom they had no particular reason to be friendly, except for the advantage they had done them in making this payment to them. Then we find that this payment is made to them at a time when the company was not in a situation to carry on business, when it really was not in a situation to do more than just to pay the preliminary expenses for the purpose of carrying the matter into operation. Then this money is paid, and they receive this 500*l.* apiece without any knowledge of it being imparted to the rest of the shareholders of the company. I am of opinion that the present case is governed by what I stated, in fact, on the former occasion with respect to the resisting the claim of the promoters to get the 3000*l.* This case is also governed by what I did in the case of the Brighton Brewery Company (sup.), which is exactly similar to this. This is, in point of fact, dividing money which was properly the money of the shareholders and not the money of the promoters at all. If the promoters thought fit to take 3000*l.* instead of 5000*l.*, or, in fact, to take 7000*l* instead of 10,000*l.*, or 8000*l.* instead of 10,000*l.*, that was a matter of which the shareholders must have the advantage, and the advantage cannot go to those directors who thought fit to take it, and in respect to whom it is obvious that nobody can doubt but that the leading motive for the rapid allotment of shares and payment of the promotion money was the repayment of this sum to them. Now, I fully admit the argument that they did not enter into the transaction with the bank for the purpose of obtaining this 500*l.*; that they did not take 200 shares each and incur this liability for the purpose of getting 500*l.* No doubt they entered into the transaction with the belief that it would succeed, but before they could ascertain whether it would succeed, before they could ascertain that it was on such a footing as to justify the payment, in order to obtain this 500*l.*, they pay the promotion money and they get 500*l.* apiece in return. If they had inquired a little more accurately into it, they would have found that all the communications from Madrid were perfectly fallacious; that there was not a single share taken at Madrid; that there was no likelihood of a single share being taken at Madrid, and that the whole idea and attempt to form a bank at Madrid would entirely fail. I am of opinion, therefore, that an order must be made that these three gentlemen pay 500*l.* apiece. I observe that you have not made the fourth a party, which is unfortunate. If you had made him a party you would have been entitled to have taken the bill pro confesso, and obtained it from him. As he is not a party, you cannot obtain any decree against him. The other three must pay 500*l.* apiece, and they must pay the costs of the suit. I am of opinion that the bill must be dismissed with costs against Mr. Dumas, Mr. Higgins's client, respecting whom I find nothing at all to affect him. He appears to me to have come out of the matter not only without any receipt of money, but without any taint of any description. I do not think there is anything to affect his character in the slightest degree. The same observation applies to Mr. Venning, and the plaintiffs must pay his costs also; and I cannot allow them to add those costs to their own—they are separate and distinct. The other defendants must pay the costs of the suit, except so far as they have been augmented by making a case against Dumas and Venning.

J. Napier Higgins.—As to the payment of our costs, there is some question sometimes before the registrar as to whether costs given against a company in winding-up are to be paid by the liquidator out of the assets.

Lord ROMILLY.—He must pay the costs out of the assets. You have not to prove for the costs.

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Treherne and Wolferston.

Solicitors for the defendants, Pelly, Chapman and Venning, Flux, Argles, and Rawlins for J. J. and E. Venning, Devonport.

Solicitors for the other defendants, G. S. and H. Brandon; W. and H. P. Sharp.

V. C. MALINS' COURT.

Reported by G. T. EDWARDS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Tuesday, May 4.

THE MID-WALES RAILWAY COMPANY v. THE CAMBRIAN RAILWAYS COMPANY.

Practice—Demurrer—Ouster of jurisdiction—Necessity for answer.

Three railway companies, under an Act of Parliament, being entitled to the joint use of a station, one of them, as it was alleged by one of the others, unfairly used the station to the detriment of such other company, who filed a bill to restrain the use of the station by the defendant company, except in accordance with the Act. A general demurrer was put in to this bill on the ground chiefly that a committee of the three companies was, under the Act, the proper tribunal.

Demurrer overruled.

This was a general demurrer for want of equity to a bill filed by the Mid-Wales Railway Company against the Cambrian Railway Company, for a declaration that the plaintiffs were entitled to equal traffic rights over the joint station at Llanidloes. The bill also prayed for an injunction to restrain the defendants, their agents and servants, from showing a preference in the enjoyment of the joint station and works to the traffic of the defendants over the traffic of the plaintiffs, so as to subject the plaintiffs or persons receiving or bringing goods over the plaintiff's line of railway, to any unnecessary delay, impediment, or disadvantage in that respect; or delay in the wharfage, certain matters excepted. And to restrain the defendants from making any arrangement or issuing such orders with reference to the management and enjoyment of the joint station or works as would subject the plaintiffs to prejudice or disadvantage, or create undue preference in favour of the defendants. The bill referred to an act giving the plaintiff and defendant companies, and the Milford Haven Company the joint use of the Llanidloes station, and the alleged unfair use by the defendants. The short ground of the demurrer was that the plaintiffs asked the court to undertake a duty when a machinery was pointed out by the legislature which appeared on the face of the bill, and which the bill did not state there had been any attempt to put in force.

W. W. Mackeson, Q.C. and Fry appeared in support of the demurrer, and insisted that it appeared upon the bill itself, that the proper tribunal to settle the disputed question was a committee jointly appointed by the three companies; and there was no statement that such a committee had ever been appointed. The same question would arise upon the motion, and the demurrer was the shorter and least expensive form:

The Shrewsbury and Birmingham Railway Company v. The Stour Valley Railway Company, 2 D. G. M. & G. 866.

The Shrewsbury and Chester Railway Company v. The Chester and Holyhead Railway Company, 14 L. T. N. S. 217 and 433.

In that case a joint committee had been appointed, but the ground of the bill was ultra vires, and the Lord Chancellor assumed that if the committee had had power, cadet questio.

Foss v. Harbottle, 2 Hare, 496.

Ernest v. Weiss, 11 W. R. 206, where Vice-Chancellor Kindersley dismissed the bill without costs. There was no allegation that the other companies had been applied to to make bye-laws and refused; if there had been, the court would have had jurisdiction. A plaintiff was bound to show that he had done everything possible before he came into this court. If the act put in motion the Milford company, they should have been parties.

Osborne, Q.C., and Dryden for the plaintiffs were not called upon.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—The principles upon which injunctions are granted are well settled. I agree, if the case before the court is one in which no relief can possibly be obtained, the defendant is bound to demur, and if he omits to do so, as was the case in the Barnsley case (sup.) and Ernest v. Weiss (sup.), which, I suppose, was a clear one, the court refused the costs to those who ought to have demurred, but evidence was gone into. Apply that principle here: I must be satisfied that the the plaintiffs are clearly not entitled to any relief; if they are, the demurrer must be overruled. It has, however, been argued by the demurring parties that there is another tribunal with all the advantages and speed of a remedy by bill in this court, by which the plaintiffs can obtain relief. This is a case of one railway company against another, three companies being entitled to the use of a joint station by Act of Parliament, which gives them equal rights—such rights not to be taken advantage of by one to the disadvantage or prejudice of the other or others, but what has taken place is this. In consequence of the plaintiff's company (who have just as much right as the defendants) having of late ceased to bring coals over the defendant's line as they had hitherto done, instead of giving them the full advantage of the use of the station, the defendants have thrown upon them a very inconvenient mode of using it, and this the bill alleges, and therefore the demurrer admits. The defendants, instead of allowing the use of the upper side, which would be convenient while the lower would clearly be inconvenient, took the latter course, it being their duty to allow the plaintiffs the most convenient mode, and they did this, as the bill alleges, from improper motives. If I allow the demurrer, I put the plaintiffs out of court, and it is impossible to say to what extent the consequences of doing so may go, or what detriment may ensue by their loss of trade before they can obtain the remedy the demurring parties suggest as the other tribunal under the act. It is admitted by the demurrer to be a wrongful act, and I may suppose that they may commit other wrongful acts, before there is a joint appointment of a committee. Moreover, the other companies may refuse to concur in such appointment, and therefore, instead of having the speedy remedy of an injunction—more speedy than any other in this country—they may be kept at bay for two or three years, and even when a joint committee is appointed, they may be so much swayed one way, that the plaintiffs may, after all, fail to obtain justice. I am not aware of any case that decides that the appointment of another tribunal ousts the jurisdiction of this court, which can just as well deal between all the parties with the question of prohibiting the use of the station in a particular way, as the tribunal alluded to. The plaintiffs are asking an immediate remedy on this bill, and I am bound to assume that the injury is a material one, and requires an immediate remedy. Without prejudicing the question, therefore, which can be entirely decided on this bill at the hearing, I am of opinion that it ought to be answered, and the demurrer must be overruled in the usual way.

May 8th.—On the motion for the injunction of this date the following order was made:—The defendants undertaking without prejudice to any question at the hearing, to allow the plaintiffs to use the line and conveniences as they have been accustomed to use, the upper sidings during a period to be fixed, for the purpose of delivery, not stacking, their coals at a point marked on the plan, as distant as 200 yards from the town-hall, and the plaintiffs' company undertaking to abide by any order the court may make at the hearing, as to the payment of 3*d.* per ton, let the motion stand over until the hearing of the cause.

Solicitor for the plaintiffs, Noyes.

Solicitors for the defendants, N. and C. Milne.

May 4 and 5.

CATLING v. THE GREAT NORTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

Specific performance—Arbitration—Lands Clauses Act—Possession—Interest—Costs—Withdrawal of opposition to an Act of Parliament.

C. agreed with a railway company, that, in consideration of the stipulations of the company, he sho ld withdraw his opposition to the Bill in Parliament, and it was agreed that if such Act passed in any form, the company should purchase the plaintiff's interest, and the contract contained various stipulations as to price, drainage, roads, &c., the value of the property, compensation, &c., in case of difference, to be referred to a surveyor. It was, inter alia, provided that the plaintiff should cease building. The Act passed, and the plaintiff sent in a claim for 46,000l., and the matter being referred to a surveyor, he awarded 16,675l., but was silent as to interest and costs; and added a statutory declaration that he made the award under the Lands Clauses Act. A dispute then arose, the plaintiff claiming against the company interest on the purchase-money and the costs of the reference, and filing a bill for the specific performance of the agreement. The plaintiff had ceased building, but the company had never taken possession:

Held, that, although the company had never had possession, it was the same thing, as the plaintiff was deprived of it, and the proceeding was as much under the Lands Clauses Act as if the royal assent to the Special Act had been obtained before the agreement, and as putting into motion the compulsory powers, and therefore in substance under that statute. The company were therefore liable for interest, and as the award was silent as to costs, it must be assumed that the surveyor intended the company to pay them, and they were therefore liable.

This bill was filed by David Bowker Catling, for the specific performance of an agreement dated the 19th April, 1866, entered into between the plaintiff and the defendant company in consideration of the withdrawal by the plaintiff of a petition of opposition to an Act promoted before Parliament by the defendants; it also asked for the interest on the purchase-money and the cost of a reference to arbitration, as well as damages. The plaintiff was the lessee for a term of eighty-eight years from the 29th Feb. 1864, of a plot of about eighteen acres of land at Seven Sisters-road, Holloway, at a rent of 325*l.* 10*s.*, under Sir John Taylor Coleridge and the Rev. Thomas Carter. In April, 1866, the defendant company, being the promoters of The Great Northern Railway (additional powers) Act 1866, which the plaintiff had presented a petition of opposition to, on the 19th of that month the agreement in question was entered into between him and the company. This instrument recited the above fact, and witnessed that it was thereby agreed—1st. That the plaintiff, in consideration of the stipulations on the part of the company thereinafter contained, should withdraw his petition, and all further opposition to the Bill; 2nd. That, in consideration of the withdrawal of the petition and such opposition, if the said Bill in any form should receive the royal assent, the company should purchase of the plaintiff, at a price to be ascertained as after mentioned, the leasehold interest of the plaintiff, subject to the apportioned rent of 100*l.* 5*s.* 9*d.*, in respect of the ground and buildings thereon, shown on the plan. And the company should also pay to the plaintiff compensation for the damage to the adjoining building property of the plaintiff, and for the loss of profit consequent on, or resulting from, the taking of the land by the company, the amount to be settled as after mentioned. The said company should also pay to the plaintiff the cost of altering the existing mode of drainage. The said purchase should be completed, and the purchase and compensation moneys and costs should be paid within six calendar months after the said Bill, in any form, should have received the royal assent. The said company should not have any right of entrance or exit to or from the land purchased from the plaintiff in or to the adjoining roads. If the present system of drainage of the said estates of the plaintiff was interferred with by the company, a substituted system should be made at their expense. 3rd. The value of the property to be purchased as aforesaid by the said company, and the amount of compensation to be paid, and the cost of the said drainage, should, in case of difference, be referred to a surveyor to be agreed upon between the parties in the usual manner. But it was agreed that the amount to be paid for the said ground should be ascertained by taking the value thereof at twenty-five years' purchase of the improved rents, which could be made by the plaintiff, beyond the ground-rent payable by him, subject, however, to deductions on account of and for the time occupied in making such improved rents. 4th. If the said Bill should, in any form receive the royal assent, the company should pay 25*l.* to the plaintiff's surveyor, and to his solicitors their reasonable costs of opposing the Bill. 5th. The plaintiff should at once cease from any further building on the said property. This agreement was executed by two directors, and the seal affixed. About the same time the company also agreed to purchase the lessor's interest for 4285*l.*, on withdrawal of the vendor's opposition, to be paid within three months after the passing of the Bill, with 5 per cent. interest from that day. The rent to be apportioned as provided by the 119th section of the Lands Clauses Act, in the proportion of 100*l.* 5*s.* 9*d.* to 225*l.* 4*s.* 3*d.* The Act passed, and the plaintiff sent in a claim in respect of the land required by the company (about five acres) of 46,000*l.*, but the company objecting to such claim, on the 25th Oct. 1867 the question was referred, under the 3rd clause of the plaintiff's agreement, to Mr. John Clutton, the eminent surveyor, whose award it was agreed should be final and binding on both parties. On the 13th March 1868 Mr. Clutton made his award, whereby, in the usual form, he awarded that the sum of 13,490*l.* was the amount to be paid by the company for the purchase of the estate and interest of the plaintiff (subject to the apportioned ground-rent of 100*l.* 5*s.* 9*d.*) referred to in the agreement, and marked in the plan, and the buildings thereon. That 2600*l.* was the amount to be paid by the company to the plaintiff for damage to the adjoining building property, and for the loss of profit consequent on, or resulting from, the taking of the land by the company, and 675*l.* for alteration of drainage. Annexed to this award was a statutory declaration by the arbitrator that he made it under the provisions of the Lands Clauses Act. It then appeared that the company handed a cheque to their solicitors for the 16,675*l.*, but, an offer by the plaintiff to receive that sum, leaving all the other questions open, not being acceded to by the defendants, the cheque was not paid to the plaintiff, although draft deeds of surrender and release, and an agreement for an apportionment of the rent, were prepared and sent for his approval. A correspondence ensued between the respective solicitors upon the question whether the company were liable to pay interest on the purchase-money and the cost of the reference, the award being silent on that subject, and this bill was filed on the 8th June 1868, insisting upon the plaintiff's right to such interest and costs under the provisions of the Lands Clauses Act. He also claimed repayment of rent in respect of the land paid to the lessors subsequently to the 28th of Dec. 1866, which was the expiration of six calendar months after the act received the royal assent, from which day he also claimed interest. The bill charged that before the arbitration the subject of subsequent rent was referred to, and that, being a builder, and ready money being necessary for his operations, the non-completion of the contract was a serious detriment to the plaintiff. There was a considerable amount of evidence, and it appeared that all building had ceased upon the land from the time of the agreement.

Digitized by Google

Glasse, Q. C., Waley, and Maidlow appeared for the plaintiff, and contended that there was nothing to take the case out of the ordinary rule that interest was payable to the vendor from the date of the contract. That the plaintiff was entitled to be reimbursed what he had paid to his lessors since that date, and was also entitled to the costs of the reference. The discrepancy between the claim and the sum awarded was no test, for a case was on record of land in London being valued at 14,000*l.* and sold for 29,000*l.* As to the question of interest, the arbitrator only found what was referred to him, the purchase-money, the compensation, and the cost for drainage, and the other matters were left to the ordinary rule of law.

The following cases were cited:

Esdaile v. Stephenson, 1 Sim. & Stu. 122:
Dart's V. & P. 3rd edit. 82;
Greenwood v. Churchill, 8 Beav. 413;
De Visme v. De Visme, 1 M. & G. 336.

Cotton, Q.C., and Stevens, for the company, insisted that the difference between the claim and the award was so monstrous, that it was impossible for the parties to agree. By his conduct before the arbitration, the plaintiff, either waived or deprived himself of interest, and there was evidence showing the intention. [VICE-CHANCELLOR.—I cannot receive it, that would be going behind the award, which has not been sought to be set aside. I must assume that the arbitrator did his duty, he had no right to consider subsequent circumstances.] The plaintiff had caused great delay, and the company never had had possession. Interest could not be payable on the whole sum, 13,490*l.* only represented purchase money. The agreement was not an ordinary contract, and the rules of law as to interest did not apply to it. The value could not be ascertained under the Lands Clauses Act, because that Act only allowed three weeks to send in a claim, and that was not done here. There was no allusion to the Lands Clauses Act in the contract, and as to the reference to a surveyor, he was to be chosen by private agreement.

Morse v. Merest, 6 Madd. 26;
Perry v. Smith, 1 Car. & M. 554;

Glasse, Q.C., in reply on the question as to the costs of the reference.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR (after stating the facts). This contract being for valuable consideration, the withdrawal of opposition to a Bill in Parliament, which I must assume to have been of a formidable character; that was conclusive upon the company; and I am of opinion that the word "value" as used in the contract meant "price;" the expression "in case of difference," not being immaterial, because it evidently contemplated that the parties might fix the amount themselves. I am also of opinion that the payment to Mr. Isborne, the plaintiff's surveyor, and his solicitors, applies only to the agreement, and to nothing subsequent; and so far only am I against the plaintiff. The most material circumstance is, that the plaintiff was to cease any further building. It is contended that by this agreement the company were not put into possession, and that is true; they never took possession, not having Parliamentary powers; but the question is, not whether the purchasers have taken possession, but whether the vendor has not been deprived of it. It is clear that he has, and it is immaterial whether the company took possession or not. By the terms of the contract they virtually took the possession from the plaintiff, for the only purpose for which he required it, viz., building. I think it is a case in which the principles with respect to the payment of interest from the date of the contract are applicable. If it had not been for the six calendar months being fixed for the completion, I should have thought the company were bound to pay interest from the date of the contract. The Act gave the company compulsory powers to take the land; but, although there was an agreement, they never could have taken it unless the Act had become law; and therefore, taking the Act and the agreement together, it is clear they took it in the only way they could do so, namely, compulsorily, and it was as much a proceeding under the Lands Clauses Act as if the royal assent had been obtained before the agreement. It was a part of it that they should arrange the price between themselves, and they were only to call in a surveyor in case of difference. There was a difference; Mr. Clutton was referred to, and made his award, which was silent on the subject of costs. [The Vice-Chancellor referred to the award.] But annexed to it is a declaration that he would hear and determine under the Lands Clauses Act; and whether that was strictly correct or not, nothing can be more distinct than that Mr. Clutton considered it so; otherwise, to go before a magistrate and make such a declaration was a simple nullity. On the surrounding circumstances, I am further of opinion that the parties all proceeded on that assumption, and the defence of the company is most ungracious. I am bound to assume that the arbitrator faithfully and intelligently discharged his duty; and had he fixed the date of the award as the time of payment, he would have miscarried, because, when parties enter into a contract and refer to arbitration some question under it, it must be treated as if inserted in the contract, for he may not make his award for years after. Therefore the price fixed must be regarded as if agreed upon on the 19th April 1866. On the question of damage, however, perhaps subsequent circumstances might be taken into consideration. The first question is from what period interest is to be paid, all parties agreeing to it from the date of the award, although on what principle I cannot understand. The plaintiff lost the land from the date of the contract, and it is well settled that wherever a contract fixes a day for completion, the purchaser must pay interest from that day, for he is entitled to the rents. Here it happens that there is no rent. Lord St. Leonards, in the 14th edition of his work, p. 627, lays that down. The plaintiff was charged with delay, but the dispute arose while the demand was made, and delay is in fact attributable to both, and I should be coming to an unwarrantable conclusion if I held the ordinary principle as to interest was not applicable to this case. I am of opinion, therefore, that the ordinary rule applies. As to Esdaile v. Stephenson (snp.), Mr. Stevens well knows that a vendor cannot be deprived of the interest and the rents. It happens here there are no rents; but the company have had everything they contracted for, and must pay interest from the date of the contract. The next question is, as to the ground rent. Now it is the basis of the contract that it was to be apportioned, and the company having purchased the reversion, are themselves entitled to it, and must bear the burthen from the time fixed for completion, the 28th Dec. 1866; and if the plaintiff has paid anything since in respect of it, he must be reimbursed. The next question is, as to the costs of the arbitration. No doubt the words in the Lands Clauses Act are "otherwise than by agreement," and no doubt if a landowner and a company agree in the ordinary case of a notice to treat, they may do so; otherwise they go to a justice and get two surveyors appointed. In this case there is one, but I consider it is no less a proceeding under the Lands Clauses Act, because the whole thing was under a contemplated Act of Parliament which became law, it was a purchase of the plaintiff's opposition, and I must take the whole as one piece of machinery, putting in motion the compulsory powers; and, although there is some apparent technical objection, in substance and in form it is under the Lands Clauses Act. Another thing is conclusive, which is the arbitrator's declaration, and therefore he did not provide for the costs of reference, and being aware of the terms of the 34th section of that Act, and that the costs of arbitration and "incident thereto" were payable by the company, he refrained from making an award as to costs, and I must attribute to him a deliberate intention that the promoters should pay them; and, had he been asked, he would have said so, and if not, would have given a larger sum. The company are most ungracious in raising this question and occasioning this suit, the cheque for 16,675*l.* being actually, as it is stated, drawn and handed to the solicitor, who, I believe, handed it back, because the company would not agree to leave all other matters open, the plaintiff accepting it on those terms. He was, therefore, baffled at every step, and there must be a decree for payment of interest to him at 4*l.* per cent. from the date fixed for the completion of the contract, for repayment of any ground rent paid by him during that time, and he must have the costs of the reference and the costs of suit.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Terrell and Chamberlain.

Solicitors for the company, Johnson, Farquhar, and Leech.

V. C. JAMES'S COURT.

Reported by W. H. BENNET, and R. T. BOULT, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Saturday, July 10.

Re THE ANGLO-EGYPTIAN NAVIGATION COMPANY.

Practice—Companies Act 1862, sect. 79, cl. 5—Alleged collusion to assist a rival company—Petition—Costs.

On a petition to wind-up the affairs of a limited liability company, on the ground of a misapplication of the funds by the directors, it must be conclusively shown that the interference of the court could be obtained under the Companies Act 1862, sect. 79.

One set of costs only allowed as between the respondents to the petition.

The Anglo-Egyptian Navigation Company was incorporated in April 1865, for the purpose of working a line of steamers between Liverpool, Egypt, and Syria, taking over for that purpose the steamships then owned and managed by Messrs. Chappel, Dalton, and Co., of Liverpool, and Messrs. Chappel and Co., of London, and "making such additions and improvements in the line as the requirements of the trade may render advisable."

An amended prospectus of the company stated "that the line as at present constituted" consisted of two principal and two auxiliary steamers. The capital of the company was announced to be 500,000*l.* in 25,000 20*l.* shares, of which 8250 were to be fully paid up and 16,750 were to be issued." The articles of the association were registered on the 3rd April 1865, and recited the terms of the contract, whereby Messrs. Chappel, the vendors, agreed to sell certain steamships to the company, and in this agreement it was stipulated that Messrs. Chappel and Co. should retain no shipping interests of their own in the Mediterranean, except a share in another line called "Bibby's line of Steamers," and in a ship called the Araxes. The affairs of Messrs. Chappel and Co. subsequently became embarrassed, and their interests had become vested in the International Financial Company, who had also brought out the Anglo-Egyptian Navigation Company, and Messrs. Bibby and Co. became ship's husbands to the several vessels belonging to the company. The general character of the allegations in the petition and the points sought to be raised by it were that the International Financial Company who had obtained by virtue of the number of their shares, a preponderating influence in the company's affairs had, instead of making calls on the shareholders, discharged the liabilities of the Anglo-Egyptian Navigation Company by selling off the company's fleet of vessels, which were now reduced to two—one of which had been chartered to a telegraph company, and were in fact using the company's remaining assets as affording facilities to and forming part of the working capital of Bibby's company.

The petitioner held 1300 fully paid up shares in the Navigation Company, and they also stated that the International Financial Company had received from Messrs. Chappel and Co. 35,000*l.* for bringing out the Anglo-Egyptian Navigation Company and 5000*l.* in addition for the purpose of improperly influencing the share market with respect to the shares of that company; that the losses thereby incurred had been continuous, and that the affairs of the company had also thereby become utterly hopeless.

Sir Roundell Palmer, Q. C., E. E. Kay, Q. C., and Fischer appeared for the petitioners and contended that sufficient had been shown to induce the company to direct the usual order for winding-up the affairs of the company.

Digitized by Google

Wickens and H. Davey for the company, and Fry, Q.C. for certain shareholders who were instructed to oppose the petition, and De Gex, Q. C. and A. G. Marten for other shareholders instructed to support it, were not called upon by the court.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said he must dismiss the petition, as it did not appear to him to disclose such a case as should induce the court to grant the order under the section and clause in the Companies Act 1862 upon which the presentation of the petition had been founded. Of course it must be dismissed with costs, but he should only allow one set of costs, to wit, the parties appearing to oppose the petition.

Solicitors: Ashurst, Morris, and Co.; Gregorys; Linklaters and Co.

Common Law Courts.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.

Reported by T. W. SAUNDERS and J. SHORTT, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Thursday, April 22, 1869.

DENSTON, (Assignee, &c.), v. ASHTON AND OTHERS.

Costs—Security for—Assignee of a bankrupt suing for the benefit of the estate.

Where the assignee of a bankrupt with the sanction and by the directions of the Commissioner of the Court of Bankruptcy, brings an action for the benefit of the estate, he will not upon the allegation that he is without visible means of paying costs if unsuccessful, be required to give security for costs.

This was rule calling upon the defendants to show cause why the order of Willes, J., directing that the plaintiff should give security for the defendants' costs in this cause to the satisfaction of the master, should not be rescinded. It appeared this was an action of ejectment brought by the plaintiff as assignee of one Henry Hawgood, a bankrupt, to recover from the defendants the possession of certain premises situated in Chiswell-street, Middlesex; and in support of the application for costs, it was alleged that the plaintiff is a carpenter, in a small way of business in East-street, Walworth, without any visible means of paying costs, and other facts tending to show that he would be unable to pay costs if unsuccessful in the action. On the other hand it was sworn by the plaintiff that he is the creditors' assignee of one Henry Hawgood, a bankrupt, who at the time he became bankrupt was in the occupation of the said premises; that he (the plaintiff) is a creditor in the sum of 140*l.*; that the allegations as to his means are untrue. It was also sworn by the attorney for the plaintiff that the action is brought under the advice of counsel, and with the sanction and direction of the Commissioner of the Court of Bankruptcy acting in the prosecution of the said matter, and that he believed there is a good cause of action, and that a verdict will be found for the plaintiff on the trial.

Bere showed cause.—Where a party is suing in a representative capacity, and is shown to be without means, the court will require him to give security for costs. [COCKBURN, C. J.: The plaintiff here is suing as an officer of the Court of Bankruptcy.] There is no direct authority in the books upon the point. In Perkins v. Adcock, 14 M. & W. 808, it was held that where the plaintiff was a bankrupt or insolvent, and had assigned the debt for which the action was brought, and is suing for the benefit of the assignee, the court would require security for costs; and in Goateley v. Emmett, 15 C. B. 291, this ruling was upheld. In Elliott v. Kendrick, 12 Ad. & E. 597, the plaintiff assigned all his effects to N. for the benefit of his creditors, with power to sue in his name; afterwards he became insolvent and also bankrupt, and had not obtained his certificate, and had no means of paying the costs of an action. N. having commenced an action in plaintiff's name, and without his authority (except under the assignment), the court stayed the proceedings till N. should give the defendant security for costs.

Day appeared in support of the rule—As this action is brought with the sanction and direction of the Court of Bankruptcy, the question is whether the plaintiff, who is in the performance of a public duty, is to be fettered by giving security for costs? The present case is different from those cited on the other side where no such authority was given. It would be very hard upon a plaintiff who is suing under the direction of the Court of Bankruptcy to be put under these terms. Here he is ordered to bring this particular action, and he is acting therefore merely as the officer of the court. [COCKBURN, C. J., The assignee having the bankrupt's egtate in him, could bring the action without the consent of the Court of Bankruptcy, but in order to protect himself he gets the authority of the Court of Bankruptcy. It is hardly as though the court had in the first instance directed the assignee to take these proceedings; he will get his costs out of the estate.] The Commissioner gives a judicial consideration, and would not direct an action to be brought if it would waste the estate; all the decided cases are where the action has been brought by private persons. [COCKBURN, C. J., Suppose the sanction of the Commissioner had not been obtained, would you contend that he would not be liable for costs?] There is no authority upon the point when he is exercising a public duty. [COCKBURN, C. J., The position of the defendant is equally the same whether the plaintiff sues with or without the authority of the court.] It is a common hardship which all persons occasionally suffer. [HAYES, J., Is not the general principle, that if an insolvent person is suing for another, he must give costs?] There is no official capacity in any of the plaintiffs in the cases cited. There are numerous instances, of course, of suits of this kind, but I know of no case in which the plaintiff has been required to give security for costs. [COCKBURN, C. J., The point being a novel one we will consider it.]

Cur. adv. vult.

July 3.—HAYES, J. now delivered the judgment of the court.—This was the case of a rule obtained to set aside an order of Willes, J., requiring the plaintiff to give security for costs in the action, which was ejectment by the plaintiff as assignee of one Hawgood, a bankrupt, to recover some premises formerly occupied by the bankrupt, and claimed by the plaintiff for the benefit of the estate. The order had been made on the ground of the plaintiff's poverty and alleged inability to pay costs if he failed, and because he was suing not for his own benefit but for that of the creditors. The case was argued in Easter Term, when cause was shown against the rule by Mr. Bere on the part of the defendant, and the rule was supported by Mr. Day on the part of the plaintiff. On the part of the defendant reliance was placed on the general rule for requiring security for costs in the case of an insolvent who is suing as a mere nominal plaintiff for the benefit of a third person, and the cases of Perkins v. Adcock, 14 M. & W. 808; Elliott v. Kendrick, 12 Ad. & E. 597; and Goatley v. Emmart, 15 C. B. 291, were cited. On the other hand, it was contended by Mr. Day that the case was distinguishable from the cases cited, and withdrawn from the ordinary rule on the ground that the plaintiff had, as assignee, a duty to collect the assets for the benefit of the estate, and that there was no instance in such a case of requiring security for costs which might obstruct him in the performance of his duty, and prevent the assets from being collected. We took time to consider the case, and being unable to find any authority in favour of enforcing security for costs in such a case, we were disposed against requiring it in the present instance. Very recently the subject has been before the Common Pleas, in the case of Sykes and others v. Sykes, 17 W. R. 799 (June 12); 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 663, in which the plaintiffs sued as executors for an inquiry to the assets of the estate; and on an application by the defendant, security for costs had been ordered to be given by Brett, J., on the ground that one of the plaintiffs resided in Scotland, out of the jurisdiction of the court, and the other had become bankrupt and was unable to pay costs; and the court, who considered the case of an executor to stand on the same footing as assignee in regard to the duty of collecting the assets of the estate, held that the circumstances offered no ground for requiring security, and rescinded the order. This decision entirely agrees with our opinion, and therefore we think that the rule should be made absolute.

Digitized by Google

Rule absolute.

Plaintiff's attorney, R. Jones, New Inn.

Defendant's attorney, T. E. Harper, 17, Gracechurch-street.

April 20, and July 3, 1869.

PLAYFORD v. THE UNITED KINGDOM ELECTRIC TELEGRAPH COMPANY (LIMITED).

Electric telegraph company—Transmission of message—Error in reading same—Damage to sendee—Right of action.

When a message is sent by a telegraph company the contract is one alone with the sender and not with the sendee of such message.

Where, therefore, A., resident in London, informed B., resident at Hull, that he had a cargo of ice at Grimsby, and requested an offer from them for the same by telegraph, and B. thereupon sent a telegraphic message by the defendants making an offer of 23*s. per ton, which was erroneously read off by the defendants' servants at London as* 27*s. per ton; whereupon A. caused the ice to be tendered to B. at Hull at this price, and B. refused to receive it, as not being the price he had offered.*

Held, upon an action brought by A. against the company for the loss he had sustained by their error, that the contract was between B. and the defendants, and that there was no relationship between A. and B. of principal and agent, and so the action could not be maintained.

This was a special case stated by consent of the parties and by a rule of the Court of Queen's Bench, dated the 19th day of November in the year of our Lord 1867.

This action was brought by the plaintiff against the defendant to recover damages for the misdelivery by them of a certain telegraphic message, under the circumstances stated in the following case: The plaintiff is a merchant in London, and dealt, amongst other things, in ice, the defendants are an Electric Telegraph Company (Limited) incorporated under the Joint Stock Companies Acts 1856 and 1857, and in the year 1862 they obtained for themselves a certain Act of Parliament, namely, 25 & 26 Vict. cap. cxxxi. local and personal, to enable them to carry on the works and business of an electric telegraph company. A copy of this Act accompanies and is to form part of this case. On the 28th May 1866, the plaintiff had a cargo of ice lying on board the schooner Victor, and wrote on that day to Messrs. Rice and Hellyer, ice merchants at Hull, informing them that the Victor was at Grimsby with about 100 tons of ice, and requesting from them an offer for the same by telegraph.

Accordingly the said Messrs. Rice and Hellyer went on the following morning about eleven o'clock to the defendants' office, at the quay side station at Hull, for the purpose of telegraphing to the plaintiff, and having obtained at that office from the defendants one of their ordinary printed forms for telegrams, filled it up, and thereby requesting them to send to the plaintiff the message of which, so far as it is material to the present case, the following is a copy: "We can give you 23*s.* for cargo now at Grimsby. Small ice, the same cash, 30 tons day."

The said printed form was directed to the directors of the defendants' company, and was headed, "Gentlemen, I request you to send the following message according to the conditions printed hereon, and I agree to abide by the same."

There was the following memorandum at the foot of the said printed form:

"All messages taken by this company are received subject to the following conditions."

The said conditions were as follows:

In order to provide against mistakes, and more effectually insure delivery, every message of consequence ought to be repeated by being sent back from the station at which it is to be received to the station from which it is originally sent, half the usual price for transmission will be charged in addition for repeating the message. The company will not be responsible for mistakes or delays in the transmission of, nor for the non-delivery of, unrepeated messages, from whatever cause arising, either upon its own lines or those of any other company or government which may be employed to forward the message to its destination. Nor will the company be responsible for mistakes or delays in the transmission of, nor for the non-delivery of, a repeated message to any extent above 5*l.*, unless it be insured at the rate of 1*l.* per cent.

A fac-simile copy of the said printed form with the said message on it, as written by the said Messrs. Rice and Hellyer, is hereunto annexed marked A., and it is to form part of this case.

When Messrs. Rice and Hellyer had filled up the printed form as aforementioned, they handed the same back to the defendants at their said office, and paid them the sum of 1*s.* 6*d.* for transmitting to the plaintiff by telegraph the said message, which was to be forwarded and was forwarded as an uninsured message. No charge was tendered for repeating such message, and it was forwarded as an unrepeated message. As soon as the said message was delivered to the defendants as aforementioned, it was despatched by them to their central station at Hull, and was thence forwarded by them to their head office in London, where it was duly received at 11·43 a.m. of the same day, and where the mistake in respect of which the present action is brought originated as hereinafter mentioned.

The telegraphic apparatus which was then and is still used by the defendants in their said head office in London was the best telegraphic apparatus then known and was in perfect condition. There is a long slip of paper attached to the said telegraphic apparatus, and on a message being transmitted to the said head office the letters and numbers contained in such message are, by means of the said apparatus and the telegraphic wires connected therewith represented on such slip of paper by certain combination of dots and of strokes of different lengths which respectively denote the various letters and numbers. These are read off by that clerk of the defendants at the said office, whose duty it is to receive the message, and who at once writes down the said letters and numbers on a certain printed form. When the message so sent by the said Messrs. Rice and Hellyer was being transmitted to the defendants' head office it was received there by Edith Smeaton, a clerk of the defendants, whose duty it was at the time to receive such message to read it off and to write it down on the telegram paper in manner aforementioned. In reading off the message from the slip of paper attached to the telegraphic apparatus as afore mentioned she mistook the combination . . . . which was on the slip and which denotes the number 3 for the combination . . . . which denotes the number 7, and she consequently wrote down on such printed form as aforesaid instead of the message actually sent by Messrs. Rice and Hellyer the following message:

"We can give you 27*s.* for cargo now at Grimsby; small ice, the same cash, 30 tons day."

A telegram paper with the last-mentioned message on it (a facsimile copy of which is hereunto annexed marked B., and is to form part of this case) was then forwarded by the defendants to the plaintiff.

On receipt of the said telegram the plaintiff ordered the schooner Victor to proceed to Hull with the said cargo of ice for the said Messrs. Rice and Hellyer, but they refused to accept the same except at the price of 23*s.* per ton; and it is admitted that by reason of the aforesaid error in the telegram the plaintiff sustained damages to the amount of 39*l.* 1*s.* 6*d.*, and that if entitled to recover at all, he is entitled to recover the said sum of 39*l.* 1*s.* 6d.

The said Edith Smeaton had been at the time when she made the aforesaid mistake in the service of the defendants for about two years. The defendants had used all due care in testing her competency before engaging her as a clerk, and in fact she was in every respect well qualified for the performance of her duties as such clerk, and had made during the said period of two years a less number of mistakes in reading of messages than the average number of mistakes made during the same period by the numerous clerks who were employed by the defendants in the same department.

The extreme charge which the defendants could, under sect. 75 of the aforesaid statute 25 & 26 Vict. c. cxxxi. have made for transmitting the aforesaid telegraphic message from Hull to London was 2*s.*

It is the practice among ice merchants that when a merchant who desires to sell a cargo of ice requests from another merchant an offer for such cargo by telegraph, and the latter makes such offer by telegraph, and the offer is accepted for the merchant accepting such offer to deduct from the price of the cargo sold the cost of the telegram.

The plaintiff has not repaid to the said Messrs. Rice and Hellyer the said sum of 1*s.* 6*d.*, so paid by them to the defendants for the said telegram, nor have the said Messrs. Rice and Hellyer claimed the said sum from the plaintiff.

The court is to be at liberty to draw such inferences of fact as a jury would be entitled to do.

The question for the opinion of the court is whether, under the circumstances as above stated, the defendants are liable to the plaintiff for or on account of the mistake committed as aforesaid in the transmission of the said telegraphic message.

If the court shall be of opinion in the affirmative, then judgment shall be entered up for the plaintiff for 39*l.* 1*s.* 6*d.* with costs of suit.

If the court shall be of contrary opinion then judgment shall be entered for the defendants with costs of defence.

Littler appeared for the plaintiff, and contended that the defendants were liable, for that the plaintiff had a property in the message sent. He quoted Scott and Jarnagin's treatise on the law relating to Electric Telegraph Companies, and the cases cited upon the subject therein.

Pollock, Q. C. (A. L. Smith with him) appeared for the defendants, and argued that there was no liability as between the plaintiff and the defendants. He cited:

Swain v. Shepherd, 1 Moo. & Rob. 223;
M'Cance v. The London and North-Western Railway Company, 31 L. J. 65, Ex.;
Harrison v. The London, Brighton and South Coast Railway Company, 31 L. J. 113, Q. B.

The argument sufficiently appears in the following judgment:

Cur. adv. vult.

July 3.—LUSH, J. delivered the following judgment of the court.—The plaintiff having a cargo of ice on board a schooner of his at Grimsby invited an offer for it from Messrs. Rice and Hellyer, merchants at Hull, and requested them to make such offer by telegraph. Accordingly Messrs. Rice and Hellyer sent to the office of the defendants' company at Hull a message for transmission to the plaintiff by which they offered to take the ice at 23*s.* per ton. In the reading off of the message at the defendants' office in London, a mistake was made in the figures, and the telegram sent to the plaintiff represented the offer to be 27*s.* instead of 23*s.* per ton. The plaintiff, thereupon, in acceptance of the supposed offer, ordered the schooner to proceed to Hull with the ice, and upon her arrival there the mistake was discovered. Messrs. Rice and Hellyer refused to receive the cargo except at 23*s.* per ton, and this action was brought by the plaintiff to recover the damage he had sustained by reason of the mistake, and which amounted to 39*l.* 1*s.* 6*d.* It was stated as a fact in the case that when an offer made upon the invitation of the seller by telegraph is accepted, the cost of the telegram is allowed to the buyer on account. On delivery of the message for transmission, Messrs. Rice and Hellyer signed the ordinary printed form by which the defendants stipulated that "they would not be responsible for mistakes or delays in the transmission of, nor for the non-delivery of unrepeated messages from whatever cause arising, and that half the usual price for transmission would be charged in addition for repeating the message." By 25 & 26 Vict. c. cxxxi. (private Act), certain powers for laying down the line were conferred on the defendants, and by sect. 61 it was enacted "that the use of any telegraph and apparatus erected and formed under the provisions of the Act for the purpose of receiving and sending messages, should, subject to the prior right of use thereof for the service of Her Majesty, and subject to such charges and reasonable regulations as might from time to time be made and entered into by the company, be open for the sending and receiving of messages by all persons alike without favour or preference;" and sect. 75 limits the charges to be made by the company to the rates specified in the schedule. It appeared that if the message had been repeated, the charge for such repeated message, according to the Company's scale, and the prize by Messrs. Rice and Hellyer would have exceeded the traffic rate. It was contended on behalf of the plaintiff, first, that the defendants were liable either as upon a contract with him, made through Messrs. Rice and Hellyer, as his agents, or for the breach of a duty to take due care of a message which it was argued became his property as soon as it was delivered to the defendants; and, secondly, that the stipulation that they would not be responsible for any mistakes however caused, unless a charge was paid which exceeded the maximum allowed by the act was an unreasonable regulation within the meaning of sect. 61, and therefore void. As we are against the plaintiff on the first point, it is unnecessary to give any opinion upon the second. The obligation of the company to use due care and skill in the transmission of the message is one arising entirely out of contract. There is nothing in their special Act which affects their relation either to the sender or the sendee of a message, or makes it different from what it would have been had no Act of Parliament been passed. We cannot agree with the judgments given in the American courts in the cases cited in the argument that there is any analogy between a consignment of goods by a carrier and the transmission of a telegram. We cannot see how the person to whom a telegraph message is sent can be said to have a property in the message any more than he could had it been sent orally by the servant of the sender. The only question, therefore, is, with whom was the contract made? And to this there can be but one answer. It was made with Messrs. Rice and Hellyer. The offer was sent by them on their own behalf and in their own interest. In so doing they acted, it is true, on the invitation of the plaintiff, but not as his agent, or as representing him; and the circumstances that there was an implied understanding between them, that in the event of his accepting their offer he should reimburse them the expense of making it, in no way alters the relation between the two parties, which was that of seller and buyer, and not that of principal and agent. It follows that the plaintiff, who is a stranger to the contract with the company, cannot maintain an action against them for the breach of it. Our judgment is, therefore, for the defendants.

Digitized by Google

Judgment for the defendants.

Attorney for the plaintiff, Morley.

Attorneys for the defendants, Crosley and Burn.

May 31 and June 8.

CARY v. DAWSON.

*Bankruptcy—Contingent debt not provable under—Liability in an action—*12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, s. 178—24 & 25 Vict. c. 133. s. 154.

The M. Insurance Company had, in Jan. 1866 lent, a large sum in Consols to be deposited by the promoter of a Bill then before Parliament. The plaintiffs, the defendant, and others, six in all, entered into an undertaking with the company, that if the Bill was thrown out the Consols should be returned, and that if it passed (which was the event that happened), an equal amount of stock should be transferred to the company, and that a sum in the nature of interest on the value of the Consols (at the time they were lent) from the end of six months to the date of the transfer should be repaid to the company. In June 1866 the defendant was adjudicated a bankrupt. In July he obtained his certificate. In August the Bill passed, but the Consols were not transferred till the 8*th July* 1867, and the plaintiffs were compelled to pay under the undertaking 500*l. as an equivalent for interest. Upon an action brought against the defendant to recover his contribution for one-sixth part of the above sum, he pleaded his bankruptcy:*

Held, that this claim was not provable under his bankruptcy, and so his bankruptcy was no answer to the action.

In this case, which was tried before Blackburn, J., a verdict was returned for the defendant, with leave to the plaintiff to move to enter a verdict for himself. The declaration was upon the usual money counts for money paid, &c., to which the defendant pleaded his bankruptcy.

H. James having accordingly obtained a rule nisi,

Murphy showed cause.

H. James appeared in support of the rule.

The facts and arguments sufficiently appear in the following judgment.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 8.—LUSH, J.—This was an action for money paid. The only material plea was bankruptcy. On the trial, before Blackburn, J., it appeared that the Marine Insurance Company had, in Jan. 1866, lent a large sum in consols to be deposited by the promoters of a Bill then before Parliament. The plaintiff, the defendant, and others, six in all, entered into an undertaking with the company that if the Bill was thrown out, the Consols should be returned, and that if it passed (which was the event that happened), an equal amount of stock should be transferred to the company, and that a sum in the nature of interest on the value of the Consols (at the time they were lent), from the end of six months to the day of the transfer should be paid to the company. Interest for the first six months had been paid to the company as the consideration for the loan of the consols. In June 1866 the defendant was adjudicated bankrupt. In July 1866 he obtained his certificate. In Aug. 1866 the Bill was passed, but the Consols were not transferred until 8th July 1867, and the plaintiffs were compelled to pay, under the undertaking, 500*l.* as the equivalent for interest. The action was brought to recover contribution for one-sixth part of this sum. A verdict was entered for the defendant on the plea of bankruptcy, with leave to enter a verdict for the plaintiff. A rule accordingly was obtained, against which cause was shown in this term. The only question was whether the claim against the defendant in respect of his undertaking could in any way have been proved under the bankruptcy, for, if so, the defendant was discharged by his certificate. Had the undertaking been to pay the value of the consols within a reasonable time after the passing of the Bill, together with interest from a fixed day up to the actual payment, there seems to be no doubt that the principle debt would have been provable under the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, s. 178, as a contingent liability, and the interest would in that case have been so much considered an accessory to the principal that it might have been proved along with it, as in ex parte Barwis, 25 L. J. Bank. 10, though in this case at the time of the bankruptcy it was uncertain what sum might be payable as interest along with the principal in the event (which has happened) of the bill not being passed till after the fixed day. But though a promise to replace a particular amount of Consols at a future day is not in substance different from a liability to pay a sum of money, and though if the contract be broken before bankruptcy, the amount which is then ascertained may be fixed (see Betteley v. Stanisly, 12 Com. B. N. S. 477); still, whilst the day at which the stock is to be replaced, and consequently the value of what is then to be replaced is at the time of the bankruptcy unascertained, we think it cannot be treated as a liablity to pay money within sect. 178. The 24 & 25 Vict. c. 134, s. 153, removes the objection that a jury is required to ascertain the amount when the liability to damages is at the time of the adjudication already incurred; but there is no provision in the bankrupt laws as yet under which such a liability not yet incurred at the time of bankruptcy can be proved. The liability, therefore, under the promise to pay the interest must, if provable at all, be proved as a separate matter, and we think that the case of Harbury v. Tucker, Ell. Bla. & Ell. 914; 28 L. J.

Digitized by Google

56, Q. B., is a decisive authority that it cannot be proved under the 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, s. 178. The question then arises whether it can be proved under the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 154? We think that though the general words, "any other sums of money, whether yearly or otherwise," taken by themselves would include every kind of payment, yet they must be restrained by the context to sums of money so far ejusdem generis, with premiums of insurance, that the liability may at the time of the adjudication be capable of valuation. This is distinctly laid down by Giffard, L. J., in Ex parte Hastie, 38 L. J. 283, Ch.; 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 93; 17 W. R. 152, and we are unable to see how, or on what principle a value could have been put in June 1866, when the adjudication took place on the liability of the defendant in case he and his co-contractors failed to transfer the stock in due time according to their undertaking, to pay interest until they did perform it. We think, therefore, that the rule must be made absolute.

Rule absolute.

Attorney for the plaintiff, E. J. Parsons.

Attorneys for the defendants, Tatham and Son.

Wednesday June, 2, 1869.

REG. v. DIPLOCK.

Coroner—Election of—Validity of votes—Decision of Sheriff final—Quo warranto.

Upon an election of coroner, the legality of votes tendered to and received by the sheriff cannot be questioned upon a quo warranto information.

This was an information in the nature of a quo warranto against Dr. Thomas Bramah Diplock for exercising the office of coroner for the Western division of the county of Middlesex.

The writ stated that after the 9th Aug. 1844, and within that part of the county of Middlesex which for the purpose and by virtue of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 92 had been duly created and was the Western district of the said county, there ought to be a coroner, and that Thomas Bramah Diplock, M.D., on the 7th April 1868, did use and exercise without any legal warrant, royal grant, or right whatsoever the office of coroner for the said district, &c.

The plea alleged that after the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 92, the justices of Middlesex having duly divided the county of Middlesex into districts, Her Majesty by order in Council divided the said county into districts, one of which districts being the Western division of such county, and on the death of one James Bird, who exercised the office of coroner for one of the districts, the justices ordered a list to be prepared by the clerk of the peace of the several parishes, townships, or hundreds in each of the said districts specifying the place at which the court for the election of coroner was to be holden, and the place or places at which the poll was to be taken. That a writ was delivered to the sheriff commanding him the sheriff that in their full county within the said division, by the assent of such persons as should be duly qualified to vote at the election of coroners according to law, they should cause another coroner to be chosen and certify his name; and that afterwards an election took place at Brentford, on the 19th Feb. 1868, and the court was duly held by the sheriff at the said place, and Dr. Diplock and W. Hardwick and J. Walter offered themselves as candidates, and the said Dr. Diplock was duly qualified, and, a poll being demanded, the sheriff adjourned the court to the next day, and the said sheriff thereupon deputed and appointed such a number of persons as then seemed meet and convenient for the taking of the poll to be poll clerks to take the said poll with him, and the said sheriff thereupon caused booths to be erected for taking the poll at the court or principal place of election, and at other polling places being respectively within the said district and being the places appointed in this behalf by the quarter sessions as aforesaid; and the said sheriff thereupon also caused to be affixed on the most conspicuous part of each of the said booths the names of the several parishes, townships, and places for which such booth was respectively allotted, and that before they began to take the said poll every clerk so appointed as aforesaid was duly sworn truly and indifferently to take the same poll, and to set down the names of each elector, and place of his residence, and for whom he should poll, and to poll no elector who was not sworn if required to be sworn by the candidates or either of them; and the said sheriff appointed for each candidate such one person as was nominated to him by each candidate to be inspector of every clerk who was so appointed for taking the poll as aforesaid. And the said Thomas Bramah Diplock further saith that the said poll was duly taken by the said clerks in the presence of the said sheriff, on the 21st day of February, 1868, at the several places aforesaid and continued for one day only for eight hours of such day, and the said poll was not kept open later than four of the clock in the afternoon of the said day, and that the said poll clerks truly and indifferently took the said poll, and, in books provided by the said sheriff for the purpose, set down the names of each elector and the place of his residence, and for whom he polled; and the said poll-clerks polled no elector without first being sworn in accordance with the provisions of the said Act when required so to be by the said candidates or either of them. And that at the close of the said poll the said poll clerks inclosed and sealed their several books, and publicly delivered them so inclosed and sealed to the said sheriff, who duly received and kept all the poll books unopened until the reassembling of the court, and that the said court reassembled on the day next but one after the close of the poll, the same not being a Sunday, and then and there the said sheriff openly broke the seals on the said books and cast up the numbers of votes as they appeared on the said several books, and openly declared the state of the poll and, made a proclamation not later than two of the clock in the afternoon of the said day that the said Thomas Bramah Diplock was duly chosen by a majority of the persons residing within the said district as were at the time of the said election duly qualified to vote at the election of a coroner for the said division of the said county, and so the said Thomas Bramah Diplock avers that he was, after the receipt of the said writ as aforesaid, at the same election so held, under and by virtue of and in obedience to the said writ, and according to the provisions of the said statute, and before committing any of the alleged acts in the said information alleged, to wit at the time, and in manner aforesaid, duly proclaimed by the said sheriff to be the coroner for the said division, duly chosen and elected to be such coroner as aforesaid, by a majority of such persons residing within the said district as were at the time of the said election duly qualified to vote at the election of coroner for the said division of the said county; and that the said Thomas Bramah Diplock then and there was duly sworn and took the oaths required by law to be administered to and taken by a person appointed or elected coroner for any county, and accepted and took upon himself the duties of the said office, by virtue whereof he the said Thomas Bramah Diplock, during all the time in the said information in that behalf mentioned at the Clarence Hotel, North End, Fulham, in the said western district of the said county, hath used and now exercised and still doth use and exercise the said office of coroner of the said county for the said district of the said county, and hath there claimed and yet doth there claim to be coroner of the said county for the said district of the said county, and to have, use, and enjoy all the liberties, privileges, and franchises to the office of the coroner of the said county for the said district of the said county, belonging and appertaining as it was lawful for him to do, without this, that he the said Thomas Bramah Diplock hath usurped or doth usurp the said office, liberties, privileges, and franchises, upon our said Sovereign Lady the Queen in manner and form as by the said information is above supposed; all which said several matters and things, he, the said Thomas Bramah Diplock, is ready to verify as the court here shall award; wherefore he prays judgment, and that the aforesaid office, liberties, privileges, and franchises in form aforesaid, claimed by him the said Thomas Bramah Diplock, may for the future be allowed to him; and that he may be dismissed and discharged by the court here of and from the premises above laid to his charge.

Digitized by Google

The replication alleged, 1st, that the said Thomas Bramah Diplock was not seised as of fee of land within the said district, and was not in other respects duly qualified. 2nd, That the said Thomas Bramah Diplock was not elected to the said office by a majority of valid voters duly qualified. 3rd, That in the alleged majority of voters were included votes given at polling booths other than the polling booths allotted for the parishes, townships, and places within which the properties in respect of which the said votes were given were situate; and that but for including such votes the said Thomas Bramah Diplock would not have had a majority of valid votes recorded for him at the said election. To the second replication there was a demurrer.

By the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 92 (An Act to amend the Law respecting the Office of County Coroner), it is by sect. 10 enacted:

That from and after the division of any counties as aforesaid into coroners' districts, upon every election to be made of any coroner or coroners for any county, the sheriff of the county where such election shall be made shall hold a court for the same election at some convenient place within the district, for which the election of coroner shall take place, on some day to be by him appointed, which day shall not be less than seven days, nor more than fourteen days after the receipt of the writ de coronatore elegendo; and in case the said election be not then determined upon the view with the consent of the electors there present, but that a poll shall be demanded for determination thereof, then the said sheriff, or, in his absence, his under-sheriff, shall adjourn the same court to eight of the clock in the forenoon of the next day but one, unless such next day but one shall be Saturday or Sunday, and then of the following Monday; and the said sheriff, or, in his absence, the under-sheriff, with such others as shall be deputed by him, shall then and there proceed to take the said poll in some public place or places by the same sheriff, or his under-sheriff as aforesaid, in his absence, or others appointed for the taking thereof as aforesaid, and such polling shall continue for two days only (altered by the 22 & 23 Vict. c. 116, s. 2, to one day only) for eight hours in each day, and no poll shall be kept open later than four of the clock in the afternoon of either of the said days.

Sect. 13 contains provisions for the taking of the poll, and enables the sheriff, if required, by or on behalf of any candidate to administer the following oath to any voter:

I swear (or being one of the people called Quakers, or entitled by law to make affirmation, solemnly affirm) that I am a freeholder of the county of , and have a freehold estate consisting of . lying at , within the said county; and that such freehold estate has not been granted to me fraudulently or colourably on purpose to qualify me to give my vote at this election; and that the place of my abode is at (and if it be a place consisting of more streets or places than one, specifying what street or place); and that I am twenty-one years of age as I believe, and that I have not been before polled at this election; adding (except in cases of solemn affirmation) so help me God.

The 14th section subjects a party taking a false oath, or making a false declaration, to the punishment of perjury.

The 15th section provides for the declaration of the poll by the sheriff.

Keane, Q. C. (Day with him) for the relator, and contended that the plea was bad.

Gray, Q. C., for the defendant, stated that he should contend that this court could not entertain the question, for that the question of the right of the voters to vote was one alone for the sheriff.

Keane.—This is a most novel objection, which was not taken in Reg. v. Day, 3 Ell. & Bla. 859, nor in Re the Coronership of Hemel-Hempstead, 5 De G., M. & G. 228.

Gray, Q. C.—The sheriff is the only party to decide whether or not the voters, who are in fact suitors in the County Court, are duly qualified, and the return of the sheriff being a judicial act, this court will not review his decision (2 Inst. 175).

Keane was heard in reply.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I am of opinion that the plea is good. The sheriff in taking the poll at the County Court is no doubt exercing judicial functions. Certainly before the passing of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 92, it was his undoubted duty to make a scrutiny at the time, in the same way as in the case of an election of members to serve in Parliament, when as we know, the right of the voters used at the time of the election to be inquired into and judicially determined, and I take it that where there was formerly a scrutiny, it was not intended by the statute that there should be an appeal to this court instead. It is true that the scrutiny has been rendered practically impossible by the limitation of the time for polling, which precludes such a course being adopted, but we cannot say that on that account the power and duty of taking a scrutiny have been transferred to this court. What the Act of Parliament has done, has been to shorten the time for voting to one day, and it has substituted for the former scrutiny, which has thus become practically impossible, the oath of the person who tenders his vote. It may well be that this state of things is open to objection on the ground of inconvenience, but probably the Legislature has thought that upon the whole, the risk of proceedings for perjury which might follow upon a false declaration, is a sufficient protection.

MELLOR, LUSH, and HAYES, JJ., concurred.

Judgment for the defendant.

Attorneys for the relator, Merriman and Buckland.

Attorney for the defendant, F. J. Hand.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

Reported by H. LEIGH and E. LUMLEY, Esqrs., Barristers at-Law.

Friday, June 4.

Re THE ESTATE AND EFFECTS OF JOHN GREENWOOD (deceased).

Revenue—Legacy duty—Legacy payable after death of an annuitant to different persons in succession chargeable at the same rate of duty—Rate of duty thereon and when payable—Legacy Duty Act (36 Geo. 3, c. 52), ss. 6, 9, 12—Right to begin—Practice.

J. G., by will, gave all his real and personal estates (not specifically bequeathed) to trustees, upon trust to pay an annuity of 100l. a year to his wife for life, and after her decease to pay to his natural daughter, M. S., the sum of 600l.; and after making several other bequests, then as to a certain freehold public-house, after the decease of his wife, upon trust to pay the rents and annual income to be derived therefrom unto his natural daughter E. M. for her life, and after her death to stand possessed of the said public-house, in trust for such of the children of the said E. M. as might be then living, and the issue of any that might be dead, share and share alike. And as to all the residue of his estates, after answering the several purposes aforesaid, he directed his said trustees to invest the same, and pay two-thirds of the dividends thereof unto the said E. M. during her life, and after her death the principal to be equally divided between her children on attaining twenty-one years; the remaining one-third to be paid unto the said M. S. during her life, and after her death the principal to be equally divided between her children. By a codicil to his will the testator stated that the said freehold public-house had been sold and realised 2200l., and he therefore revoked the devise of the said public-house in his will mentioned in favour of the said E. M. and her children, and in lieu thereof he directed his said trustees to stand possessed of the sum of 2200l. and invest the same, and to pay the interest arising therefrom unto the said E. M. for her life, in manner in his said will expressed with reference to the rents of the said public house so sold as aforesaid; and after her death to stand possessed of the said sum of 2200l. for the benefit of the children of the said E. M. as in the said will mentioned, and he thereby gave and bequeathed the same to them accordingly. Upon the testator's death, his widow being still alive, the executor in the residuary account deducted from the net amount of the residue on which duty was now payable the sum of 2800l. which he claimed to detain to answer the above outstanding legacies of 600l. and 2200l. The commissioners of Inland Revenue, on the other hand, claimed payment of duty on the said two legacies as having fallen into the residue.

Held, by the Court of Exchequer (Kelly, C.B. and Bramwell, Channell, and Cleasby, BB.), that legacy duty at the rate of 10l. per cent. was payable at once by the executor upon the two several sums of 600l. and 220l. By Kelly, C.B. and Bramwell and Channell, BB. as to both sums, and by Cleasby, B. as to the 2200l., under the express provisions of sect. 12 of the Legacy Duty Act (36 Geo. 3, c. 52) as "a legacy or residue, or part of any personal estate given over for the benefit of, or so that the same shall be enjoyed by, different persons in succession, chargeable with duties at one and the same rate;" and that, according to the provisions of that section, or of the 1st, 2nd, or 3rd sections, of the Act, or of the whole of them taken together, the Crown was entitled to that amount of duty; and by Cleasby, B. as to the 600l. under sect. 6 of the same Act.

In this case, which was a writ of summons from the Exchequer, calling on the executor to show cause why he should not deliver an account of the deceased's estate, and pay the legacy and succession duties chargeable thereon, the practice as to the right to begin being stated to have varied, the court decided to hear counsel for the Crown in the first instance. (a)

This was a case of a writ of summons issued out of the Court of Exchequer at the suit of the Crown, under the provisions of the Crown Suits Act 1855 (28 & 29 Vict. c. 194), calling upon one William McFadzen, the executor of the last will and testament of John Greenwood, deceased, and also trustee of certain property to which certain persons became entitled as successors upon the death of the said John Greenwood, deceased, to show cause why he should not deliver to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue an account upon oath of all the legacies and of all the property of the said John Greenwood, deceased, paid or to be paid or administered by him as such executor as aforesaid. And also an account of all the property to which or to the income whereof the persons aforesaid became beneficially entitled as such successors as aforesaid upon the death of the said John Greenwood, deceased, by reason of the disposition thereof, made by the last will and testament of the said John Greenwood, deceased, the predecessor or otherwise and of the value thereof, and also pay the duty chargeable under the Legacy Duty Acts upon the said legacies and property of the said John Greenwood, deceased. And also the duty chargeable under the said Succession Duty Act upon the said property as such succession as aforesaid and the costs of these proceedings.

From the affidavit filed by the executor's solicitor in answer to the said writ, it appeared,

1. That the said John Greenwood, of Liverpool, in the county of Lancaster, licensed victualler, duly made and executed his last will and testament in writing, dated 7th Dec. 1859, whereby he gave all his real and personal estates whatsoever (not specifically bequeathed) unto the use of Henry Morris and William McFadzen, their heirs, executors, and assigns, upon the several trusts therein declared concerning the same (that is to say) upon trust, inter alia, to pay into the hands of his wife, Mary Greenwood, for her own use and benefit, the clear sum of 100l. per annum during her life, and from and after the decease of his said wife he directed his said trustees, or the survivor of them, or the heirs, &c., of such survivor, or other the trustees or trustee for the time being of his said will, to pay to his natural daughter, Martha Sutcliffe, the sum of 600l. for her own use and benefit absolutely. And after making several other bequests, then as to all that freehold public-house at Liverpool called the Queen's Arms, after the decease of his said wife, upon trust that his said trustees or trustee for the time being did and should pay the rents and annual income to be derived from the said Queen's Arms unto his natural daughter, Elizabeth McArville, for her life, and from and after her death; then the testator directed his said trustees to stand possessed of the said hereditaments called the Queen's Arms, in trust for such of the children of the said Elizabeth McArville as might be then living, and the issue of any that might be dead, share and share alike. And as to all the residue of his estate after answering the several purposes aforesaid, he directed his said trustees or trustee to invest the same in their or his names or name as therein mentioned, and to pay two-thirds of the dividends derived therefrom unto the said Elizabeth McArville during her life for her own sole and separate use absolutely, and after her death the principal to be equally divided between her children, share and share alike on their attaining twenty-one years, and the lawful issue of a deceased child, the remaining one-third thereof to be paid unto the said Martha Sutcliffe during her life for her own sole and separate use absolutely; after her death the principal to be equally divided and paid between and to each of her children. And by a codicil to his will bearing date the 31st day of March 1863, the said testator stated that the said freehold public-house called the Queen's Arms, had been sold and realised 2200l., and he therefore revoked the devise of the said public-house in his will mentioned in favour of the said Elizabeth McArville and her children; and in lieu thereof he directed his said trustees or trustee to hold the sum of 2200l., and invest the same in their or his names or name, and to pay the interest to arise therefrom unto the said Elizabeth McArville for her life in manner in his said will expressed with reference to the rents of the said public-house so sold as aforesaid, and after her death to stand possessed of the said sum of 200*l.* for the benefit of the children of the said Elizabeth McArville as in the said will mentioned, and the testator thereby gave and bequeathed the said 2200*l.* to them accordingly. And after revoking one other devise the said testator in all other respects confirmed his said will.

(a) See the case of Re De Lancey's succession, argued subsequently on the same day, and reported post, in which the court held that the appellant should begin.

2. That the said testator, John Greenwood, died on or about the 4th May 1868, and probate of his said will was granted on or about the 8th June 1863 to the said William McFadzen, the surviving executor, the said Henry Morris having died in the testator's lifetime.

3. That Mary Grenwood, the widow of the said testator, John Greenwood, is still living.

4. That the residuary accounts of the personal estate, and of moneys arising out of the real estate of the said John Greenwood, were duly prepared by the executor on the 19th June 1867, for the purpose of the amount of legacy duty, payable in respect of the bequests contained in the said will being duly assessed, and that the net amount of such residuary personal estate and moneys amounted, according to the statement in such accounts, to the sum of £4958 3 6

That from such net amount the executors claimed to be allowed to make the following deductions:—
Detained to pay outstanding legacies	£2800	0	0
Annuities:
Thomas Greenwood ...	49	9	10
Hannah Carter	38	12	1
Mary Greenwood Rathbone	381	16	7
Mary Greenwood, testator's widow, born 17th Sept. 1797	761	19	0
				4031	15	6
Leaving as net residue on which duty was payable				£926	8	0

That the said accounts were duly tendered by the executor to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue; but were refused at the office of the said commissioners on the ground that they were incorrectly drawn, the said commissioners claiming the payment of duty upon two legacies of 600*l.* and 2200*l.*, they having, according to their view of the case, fallen into the residue. The executor, however, declined to pay the duty upon such legacies until after the death of the said testator's widow; but he offered to pay the sum of 92*l.* 12*s.* 10*d.* for the duty, after the rate of 10*l.* per cent. upon the sum of 926*l.* 8*s.*, the said residue and moneys to which he claimed to be entitled, and to retain for the use of the said Elizabeth McArville and Martha Sutcliffe, being natural children of the deceased.

5. That the said William McFadzen has paid duty on the annuities left to the several parties mentioned in the said will and also expressed his readiness to pay duty on the residue, after deducting the aforesaid sums of 2200*l.* and 600*l.*

6. That the said William McFadzen, before paying the duties claimed upon the said residuary estate, is desirous of obtaining the opinion of this honourable court whether or not duty is payable upon the sums of 2200*l.* and 600*l.* (being legacies left by the testator to his two natural children Elizabeth McArville and Martha Sutcliffe, to be paid to them after the decease of the testator's wife) (who is still living) at once, or whether the payment of the said duty ought to be postponed until the final distribution of the said testator's residuary personal estate after the death of the widow of the said testator, the said two legatees being the persons entitled to the said residue.

The following sections of the Legacy Duty Act (36 Geo. 3, c. 52) were referred to and relied on as material to the case.

Sect. 6:

By this section the duties thereby imposed shall in all cases in which it is not thereby otherwise provided, be accounted for, answered, and paid by the person or persons having or taking the burthen of the execution of the will, &c., or the administration of the personal estate of any person deceased, upon retaining for his, her, or their own benefit, or for the benefit of any other person or persons, of any legacy or part of any legacy, or of the residue of any personal estate, or any part of such residue, which he, she, or they shall be entitled to retain, either in his, her, or their own right, or in the right or for the benefit of any other person or persons, and also upon delivery, payment, or other satisfaction or discharge whatever of any legacy, &c., to which any other person or persons shall be entitled.

By sects. 8, 10, and 11, the duties payable on legacies given by way of annuity, whether annually or for life or lives, or for years determinable on life or lives, or for years or other period of time, and the duty on legacies whose value can only be ascertained by application of the allotted fund, and the manner of calculating the same, and of the payment thereof are prescribed.

Sect. 9:

That the value of any legacy given by way of annuity for any life or lives, or for years determinable on any life or lives, or for years or other period of time, and charged on and made payable out of any other legacy or legacies, shall be calculated, and the duty shall be charged thereon, in the same manner as hereinbefore directed with respect to other annuities (sect. 8); and the duty on the legacy charged with such annuity, if any duty shall be payable for such legacy, shall be calculated on the value of such legacy after deducting the value of such annuity, and the duty for such annuity shall be paid by the person or persons entitled to the legacy or legacies charged with such annuity, by four equal quarterly payments, in the same manner as the same would be payable according to the provisions hereinbefore contained, if such annuity had been a direct gift to the annuitant, and subject to the like proviso in case such annuity shall determine before four years' payment shall become due; and the payment which shall be made for such duty shall be retained by the person or persons paying the same out of the first four years' payment of such annuity, if so many shall become due, or out of so many of such payments as shall become due by equal portions.

Sect. 12:

The duty payable on a legacy, or residue, or part of residue of any personal estate, given to or for the benefit of, or so that the same shall be enjoyed by, different persons in succession, who shall be chargeable with the duties hereby imposed at one and the same rate, shall be charged upon, and paid out of, the legacy or residue, or part of residue so given, as in the case of a legacy to one person; and where any legacy or residue, or part of residue, shall be given to or for the benefit of, or so that the same shall be enjoyed by different persons in succession, some or one of whom shall be chargeable with no duty, or some of whom shall be chargeable with different rates of duty, so that one rate of duty cannot be immediately charged thereon, all persons who, under, or in consequence of any such bequest, shall be entitled for life only, or any other temporary interest, shall be chargeable with the duty in respect of such bequest in the same manner as if the annual produce thereof had been given by way of annuity; and such persons respectively shall be so chargeable with such duty, and the same shall be payable when they shall respectively become entitled to and begin to receive such produce, and shall be paid by equal portions during the aforesaid term of four years, if they shall so long continue to receive such produce; and where any other partial interest shall be given or shall arise out of such property so to be enjoyed in succession, the duty on such partial interest shall be charged and paid in the same manner as the duty is hereinbefore directed to be charged and paid, in like cases of partial interests charged on any property given otherwise than to different persons in succession; and all and every person and persons who shall become absolutely entitled to any such legacy or residue or part of residue so to be enjoyed in succession shall, when and as such person or persons respectively shall receive the same, or begin to enjoy the benefit thereof, be chargeable with and pay the duty for the same or such part thereof as shall be so received, or of all the benefit shall be so enjoyed, in the same manner as if the same had come to such person or persons immediately on the death of the person by whom such property shall have been given to be enjoyed, or in such manner that the same shall be enjoyed in succession.

The Solicitor-General (Sir J. D. Coleridge, Q. C.), with him were the Attorney-General (Sir R. P. Collier, Q. C.), and C. Hutton, commenced to argue this case on the part of the Crown, when

C. Crompton, who appeared to show cause on the part of the executor, claimed the right to begin.

KELLY, C. B. (after some consultation on the bench).—According to what I am informed the practice has been in such cases, I think we should first hear Mr. Crompton show cause.

The Solicitor-General.—I have no wish to interfere with, nor have I any experience of what the practice has been in such cases; but I am told that it has been both ways in this court. It certainly seems more convenient, if I may be allowed to say so, that the Crown should let the other side know how they put their claim, because, failing to satisfy the court that they are entitled to this duty, a great deal of time would be saved.

BRAMWELL, B.—I do not remember such a case as this before. What would happen if no one appeared on the other side?

The Solicitor-General.—I apprehend I should have to satisfy the court why they should make the executor pay the duty claimed from him.

BRAMWELL, B.—I should have thought so, too.

KELLY, C. B.—If the practice has at all varied we must settle the question for ourselves. We will therefore hear counsel for the Crown in the first instance in the present case. (a)

The Solicitor-General, on the part of the Crown, then proceeded to argue as follows:—The point is, whether 2800*l.*, the capital of which is not to be paid until after the decease of a certain person, ought or ought not to pay duty at the present time, and it arises on the construction of the testator's will. [KELLY, C.B.—Does it not turn on the Legacy Duty Act, the question being, as I take it, whether 10*l.* per cent. legacy duty should be paid at once, or upon the death of the widow, when the legacy is to take effect in favour of the illegitimate children?] With submission, it depends on the construction of the will. The question is, Is the property or beneficial interest in this money at the present moment in the widow or in the illegitimate children of the testator? If in the widow, then it is conceded that the 10*l.* per cent. duty ought not to be paid by the executors; but if on the true construction of the will, the children have the present interest, subject only to the 100*l.* a year to the widow, then they ought to pay the duty at once. On the true construction of the will, the whole realty and personalty are charged in the hands of the trustees with 100*l.* a year to the wife, the 2200*l.*, and the dividends arising from its investment, are by the codicil put in exactly the same position as the receipts of the public-house would have been in if not sold. [KELLY, C. B.—How under the terms of the will can this legacy of 2200*l.*, which is to be divided amongst several children, take effect until Mrs. McArville's death, she having a life interest?] The executor has furnished an account, and claims certain deductions from the residue. The residue passes at once into the beneficial possession, in different measures and degrees, of the two illegitimate children, and upon that residue, whatever its amount may be, the executor is bound to pay legacy duty, and he does not dispute that it is so; but the question is what deductions from the residue he has a right to claim. [BRAMWELL, B.—If I understand the matter rightly, when a legacy is payable to certain persons after a life estate, the legacy is not due until after the life falls in. Why then are these persons called upon to pay 10 per cent. upon this 2200*l.* now?] Because, on the true construction of the will, it is part of the residue, and the residue having passed into their beneficial possession the duty ought to be paid. They are liable to pay upon the general residue, and so legacy duty is payable at once thereon. The will operates as a gift in presenti of the entire estate to the residuary legatees, subject to the annuity, and there is no pause in the succession as regards the 600*l.* and 2200*l.*, the daughters or their children being entitled to the intermediate income thereof as residuary legatees during the widow's lifetime. It will, perhaps, be contended, contra, that this 2800*l.* is a security for the annuity to the widow; but the executor has retained 761*l.* 19*s.* to answer the purchase-money of an annuity of 100*l.*, according to the widow's age, and he cannot have it both ways and the 2800*l.* also, as by the account he claims to do. With regard to 600*l.* of the 2800*l.*, the legatee is entitled, though not to the sum itself until after the widow's death, yet to the interest of it now, there being no trust for accumulation. Legacy duty is payable at once upon the whole of the corpus of the estate, except the 761*l.* 19*s.*, either as being legacies retained, or as constituting, until the time of retainer arrives, part of the general residue of the testator's estate.

Crompton, for the executor, contra, showed cause in obedience to the writ of summons. The account tendered is correct, and the executor is not liable to more duty than by such account he charges himself with. The annuities given by the will have been capitalised according to the Act at 49*l.*, 38*l.*, 381*l.* and 761*l.* respectively, for the purposes of assessing the duty thereon, which has been paid. The 2800*l.* has been put aside by the executor because the legatees are not entitled to either principal or interest until after the widow's death. Were the executor to invest the capitalised amounts and purchase these annuities in order to enable him to pay the 2800*l.* at once, he would commit a breach of trust. No legacy duty is payable so long as the annuity exists. [BRAMWELL, B.—Upon what section of the Act do you found that statement?] The 6th section, which is the principal section relating to the present question, makes the duty payable when the executor either retains the legacy for the benefit of the persons entitled, or pays it over to them, and the Crown is not entitled to duty until that period. The will contains no direction to the executor to accelerate the coming into possession of the residue by purchasing an annuity for the wife. But he has to pay these annuities out of the corpus of the property remaining in his hands. The whole amount is uncertain and contingent, and cannot be really estimated until it is known what really comes into possession on the widow's death. he can only be liable now to pay duty on the surplus dividends after the annuity is satisfied, as he may pay them over from time to time to the residuary legatees. The 9th section, relied on contra, merely says that duty is to be payable on the annuities; it does not say how it is to be paid on the legacies if they are not received until after the annuitant's death. The section referred to applies to the case of a legacy payable at once with an annuity out of it. These two sums, 600*l.* and 2200*l.*, cannot, it is submitted, be considered as part of the residue. Sects. 9 and 12, as to payment of duty on a legacy charged with an annuity, apply where the legacy is payable at once. Here, by the will the legacy is deferred. But that these legatees are entitled to the surplus income during the widow's life, there would be no claim by the Crown for duty at present.

(a) But see the case of Re De Lancey's succession, reported post.

The testator's intention obviously was that there should be no distribution of the residue until his wife's death, the annuities being his first object. The executor cannot accelerate, and the Crown has no right to insist upon his accelerating, the trusts of the will. It is very probable, looking at the terms of the will and codicil, that the testator was not certain whether or not the income of his estate would be more than enough to pay these annuities. If otherwise, why did he not devise the rents of the public-house at once to Mrs. McArville? The 2200*l.* is a security for the wife's annuity. The annual proceeds are part of the residue, and must be invested as much as any other part of the residue which is not as yet distributable, until the proper time of distribution. He referred also to sect. 10, and submitted that the account was right and the executor entitled to judgment.

C. Hutton replied.—There is no express trust for accumulation in the will, and the implied trust to that effect, which seems to be relied on by the other side, cannot avail against the express and absolute gift of the residue. The corpus of the estate is admittedly more than enough to pay all the annuities and these legacies, and to leave a surplus besides. The Crown, therefore, is entitled to the whole duty at once upon the residue, under the 12th section; the policy of the Act being, too, it is to be remembered, to accelerate the payment of duty.

Kelly, C. B.—I am of opinion that the Crown is entitled to the judgment of the court. The question arises as to two sums of 2200*l.* and 600*l.*, and the annual proceeds of both sums for a certain period of time, or until a certain event shall happen; Now, in order to determine this question according to the provisions of the Act of Parliament, we must first ascertain what is the legal effect of the will taken together with the codicil thereto. Now, it appears that the testator, who was possessed of, among other things, a freehold public-house, and considerable personal property, made this will, by which he bequeathed to his wife an annuity of 100*l.*, to be charged and chargeable upon the whole of his real and personal estate. In his lifetime it appears that he had disposed of the public-house mentioned in his will, and accordingly by a codicil he left the produce or what is supposed to be the nett produce of the public house, namely, the sum of 2200*l.* to his daughter, Mrs. M'Arville, for life, and the remainder to her children. And the sum of 600*l.*, which is clearly part of his personal estate, and has nothing to do with the possession of the public-house, he by his will left to his daughter Martha Sutcliffe, but to be payable to her only at the death, or from and after the death, of his wife.

Now the question arises when and in what form and manner, looking to the whole of the provisions of this will and to the Act of Parliament, the legacy duty is payable upon those two sums of 600*l.* and 2200*l.*? We must deal with them separately, because the right of the several legatees to them arises under very different circumstances. First, as to the 600*l.*; the testator, as I have observed, being possessed of a considerable personal estate, and having bequeathed several legacies which are admitted to have been provided for, and are not now in question, left this annuity of 100*l.* to his wife. It appears that his personal estate is of very considerable value, far exceeding the value of this annuity, for the executor claims to retain 2800*l.* of the personal estate in his hands, independently of and over and above the sum of 761*l.* 19*s.*, the value of the annuity of 100*l.* to the widow. Now, on looking at the 9th section of the Act of Parliament, we are enabled at once to dismiss from the case, and to set aside all reference whatever to this annuity, or its value. By that section of the Act, where an annuity is bequeathed payable out of the personal estate of a testator, the mode to be adopted for the payment of the legacy duty is this: the legacy is to be valued, and then the duty, if any be payable, is to be paid by the annuitant in the way pointed out in the Act, upon the value of that annuity. Then, with regard to the rest of the personal estate, which may be termed the residue, if it be sufficient, the value of that annuity is to be deducted from the whole amount of the personal estate upon which it is charged, and whatever is the residue the legacy duty becomes payable on that according to law, that is, according to the other directions of the Act of Parliament applicable to the legacy or residue in question. Well, deducting that, it appears clear, from the account rendered by the executor, that he has become possessed, independently of all other claims, of 2800*l.*, plus the 761*l.*, the value of the annuity. We have first, then, to deduct from that the aggregate of those two sums, and then we find that the executor has in his hands the clear net sum of 2890*l.*, the residue of the personal estate of the testator, and we are now to consider what and when, that is to say, what is the duty payable, and when is it payable upon that residue? Now that is divided into two sums, and first in respect of the sum of 600*l.* In order to determine what legacy duty is payable upon the 600*l.*, and when it is payable, we must look to the whole of the provisions of the will in relation to this sum. It is a part of the residue. Before, therefore, we can determine how it is bequeathed, and consequently in what manner legacy duty is to be imposed, we must take the residuary clause of the will into consideration, together with the clause bequeathing this sum of 600*l.* to Martha Sutcliffe; and, taking the whole of the will together, its effect is obviously this: the residue is bequeathed, in the first instance, to executors, and they are to hold upon trust only to invest, from time to time, the annual rents and proceeds of the personal estate; and with regard to the whole of the residue or annual proceeds and capital, it is bequeathed and disposed of, in the first instance, in this way: two-thirds to Mrs. McArville, who is the testator's natural daughter, for her life, with remainder at her death, the capital to be divisible and to be divided equally among her children; and with regard to the other third, it is bequeathed to Mrs. Sutcliffe, and at her death to be divided among her children. So that included the capital of the sum of 600*l.*, with which alone we are dealing now. But I may add, to avoid any complication, or any question arising upon what might have altered the effect of the Act of Parliament, as applicable to these legacies, that, with respect not only to the 600*l.*, but to the 2200*l.*, and with respect to the annual proceeds of both those sums, until the one and the other would become payable, that is, with respect to the whole of the residue of the personal estate, the whole aggregate sum of 2800*l.* is bequeathed in some way or another, or payable at some time or times or another, to Mrs. McArville and her children, and to Mrs. Sutcliffe and her children. Now these legatees are all strangers in blood to the testator, and each and every of them liable to 10*l.* per cent. legacy duty upon whatever may be the amount of their legacies. Then we have to see next, in what way these legacies are payable, in order that we may determine whether there is anything in the effect of the dispositions in the will that would disentitle the Crown to claim at once, upon the ground of the residue being ascertained, which it is at 2800*l.*, and the legacy duty being payable immediately upon that entire sum. When we look to the residuary clause its effect is this,—the whole residue (let it be in whatever way and at whatever time it may arise) is bequeathed as to two-thirds to Mrs. McArville and her family, and as to the remaining third, to Mrs. Sutcliffe and her family. A question has been raised as to how those annual proceeds are to be disposed of in the meantime, and until, at all events, this sum of 600*l.* shall become payable, which is not until the death of the widow, who is still alive. Looking at the residuary clause, I am of opinion that the annual proceeds of this sum of 600*l.* fall into the residue, and become payable under the residuary bequest in the proportion of the two-thirds and one-third to the two ladies before-mentioned, and ultimately to their children. Then how stands the legacy of 600*l.* apart from any other obligations arising out of the other provisions of this will? Why, this 600*l.* parcel of the residue is left during the life of the widow to Mrs. McArville and Mrs. Sutcliffe, in the proportion of two-thirds and one-third, and at the death of the widow altogether and at once to Mrs. Sutcliffe. How then stands the case? It is exactly and precisely a case within the provision of the 12th section of the Act of 36 Geo. 3, c. 52, which enacts "That the duty payable on a legacy or residue or part of any personal estate, given to or for the benefit of, or so that the same shall be enjoyed by different persons in succession, who shall be chargeable with duties hereby improved at one and the same rate, shall be charged upon and paid out of the legacy or residue in part of residue so given, as in the case of a legacy to one person." Then here is a legacy of 600*l.*, of the annual proceeds of it during the life of the widow of the testator in the proportions before-mentioned to Mrs. McArville and to Mrs. Sutcliffe, and on the death of the widow, of the whole of it to Mrs. Sutcliffe. Both Mrs. McArville and Mrs. Sutcliffe are strangers in blood, and so are liable to the duty of 10 per cent., within the precise words of this provision of the Act, that is where the duty is thereby imposed at one and the same rate. It is clear, therefore, that the legacy of 600*l.* is to be dealt with by the Crown with respect to their claims of duty, exactly as if it had been a legacy of 600*l.* to one person alone. The question has been raised whether, looking at the peculiar terms of the residuary clause, the annual proceeds of the 600*l.* are payable in the meantime, and during the life of the widow, to the two jointly—that is to Mrs. McArville and Mrs. Sutcliffe, or whether they are to accumulate until the death of the widow, and then to be payable either to the two or to the one, as it may be? I think that the effect of this clause is that the annual proceeds are not to accumulate, but that they are liable to be dealt with in the same way as the dividends, interest, or annual proceeds of the rest of the residue of the personal estate—that is to say, they are to be given to those two persons in the proportions provided by the will. But, if it be otherwise, whether the payment of the annual proceeds to those two persons is to be made during the life of the widow or is to be postponed until after her death, either Mrs. McArville and Mrs. Sutcliffe jointly, or Mrs. Sutcliffe alone, is entitled to the 600*l.*, as well as to the annual proceeds, until the principle or capital should become payable. In either case here is a simple legacy of 600*l.*, whether payable at once or payable at a future date is perfectly immaterial, and upon that sum legacy duty attaches but once, whether under the provisions of the 12th section or under the earlier sections of the Act. Under these circumstances, whatever may be the construction of the will, the result is that 600*l.* is left, sooner or later, the annual proceeds as well as the capital, to these two persons, or one of them, and their respective families, and that 10 per cent. would attach and be payable to the Crown, whenever the legacies were paid by the executor to the legatees, or were retained by them, and so came to their hands, and were held by them for the benefit of the legatees. It is quite immaterial when that sum should become payable to the legatees; they are all liable to the same rate of duty, and consequently the Crown is entitled to this amount of duty, according to the provisions of the 1st, 2nd, and 3rd sections, or of the 12th section of the Act of Parliament; or of the whole of these sections taken together. With regard to the 2200*l.*, it is unnecessary to say more than that, whether that sum shall be payable only under the codicil, upon the death of the widow, to Mrs. McArville, or whether the proceeds thereof, in the meantime, shall be payable during the life of the widow, in the proportions of two-thirds and one-third, to the two daughters or their families, is perfectly immaterial, because it comes under the same principle; it is a portion of the residue in moneys numbered, in the hands of the executor, and it is payable, sooner or later, in one proportion or another to Mrs. McArville or Mrs. Sutcliffe, or their families, or to the whole together. Some of these persons, either one family or another, must, sooner or later, be entitled to the sum of 2200*l.*, and as they are all liable to the same rate of legacy duty, namely, 10 per cent., that amount of duty is chargeable, and immediately on the money coming into the hands of the executor, whether paid over by him to the several legatees, or retained, from the time of the money coming into his hands, for the benefit of those who should ultimately be entitled to the various component parts of that sum. Under these circumstances we have only to look at the different sections of the Act to which I have referred to clear the case from the complication arising from mixing up the annuity and the liability to pay it out of the rest of the estate, to see that the residue, taken separately by itself—that is, the 2200*l.* and the 600*l.*, is payable sooner or later to one or the other or all of these several persons, who are liable to the same rate of duty, and that therefore the Crown is entitled to the duty as soon as the money is received by the executor, and from the time it is retained in his hands for the benefit of the legatees who are ultimately entitled.

Bramwell, B.—I am of the same opinion.

Channell, B.—I am of the same opinion, and for the reasons given.

Cleasby, B.—I am of the same opinion. But I will just say, that with regard to the 2200*l.* I do not think there is much difficulty. As I read the will and codicil together, the 2200*l.* go in succession to persons paying the same duty, and therefore come within the 1st clause of sect. 12. But I confess that, as regards the 600*l.*, I felt some difficulty—perhaps, even more than the Lord Chief Baron—because if this 600*l.* had been given, for instance, to "such persons as shall be then my next of kin," so that you could not ascertain what duty was payable upon it until the death of the tenant for life,—then, although the executor retained it in his hands for the purpose of paying the legacy, undoubtedly the legacy duty would not have been payable until the death of the tenant for life, when it could be ascertained who the persons were who were beneficially entitled to the legacy; and whether the duty were 3 or 10 per cent., or whatever other rate it might be. But that is not the case here. Undoubtedly this does not come within the 12th section. This clearly is not the case of taking a legacy in succession, nor is it that it comes within the 9th section. The 9th section applies to the case of an annuity like that of the 100*l.*, where the rest is given to a particular person, who immediately after deducting the amount of the valuation of the annuity is to be paid the amount of his legacy. But here there is a particular sum charged upon the same fund that is subject to the annuity. Now, we know what the sum is which is to be paid; for it is a gift to Mary Sutcliffe, who is to pay 10*l.* per cent., and the executor retains the money for the purpose of paying that legacy. It strikes me that it comes within the 6th section. Then, when the executor pays the 600*l.* to the legatee, when the latter becomes entitled to payment, he will deduct the duty which he has paid on account of that legacy, which in this case will be 10 per cent. As soon as the amount of duty is ascertained the executor must pay it, but afterwards the person who receives the legacy repays it by having it deducted from the amount paid him by the executor.

Digitized by Google

Judgment for the Crown for payment of a duty of 10l. per cent. on the 2200l. and 600l. at once.

Attorneys for the appellant, the executor, Wright and Venn, 2, Paper-buildings, Temple, E.C., agents for W. Morris, Liverpool.

Attorney for the Crown, The Solicitor of Inland Revenue, Somerset House.

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT—IN ADMIRALTY.

Reported by R. D. BENEDICT, Proctor and Advocate.

SOUTHERN DISTRICT OF NEW YORK.

THE SHIP STRATTON AUDLEY AND HER CARGO.

Salvage—Corporations for wrecking purposes—Costs.

Where a vessel and her cargo, worth 250,000 dollars, was towed off the Romer shoal at the entrance to the harbour of New York, on which she had touched, the service occupying six hours, and being performed by two tugs which were owned by a corporation, incorporated for wrecking purposes, the masters and crews of the tugs being hired on regular monthly wages, with an agreement that they should not share in any salvage awarded for services rendered by the tugs, and a suit was brought against the ship and her cargo in the names of the masters of the two tugs and the corporation which owned them, for themselves and the crews of the tugs, claiming to recover 25,000 dollars salvage:

Held, that under the agreement by which the masters and crews were hired, they must be left out of the case altogether.

That the corporation could not claim, as assignee in advance, of what might otherwise be the claims of the masters and crews for salvage, and as the latter had cut themselves off by their contract with the company from making any claim for salvage, such claim never had any existence, so as to be capable of assignment after the fact.

That the corporation itself could not be a salvor.

That the corporation was entitled to a proper compensation for the use of the two steamers and the appliances on board them for the service rendered, and that the case was to be considered as one of contract for work and labour, without reference to the value of the ship and her cargo.

That the hazard to the tugs was also to be taken into consideration, but not the expense to the corporation of keeping the tugs in readiness to perform such work and labour.

That on the evidence, 1500 dollars was a sufficient compensation, and as an offer of 2000 dollars had been made as a compromise before suit, no costs were allowed.

BLATCHFORD, J.—This is a libel filed by Thomas F. Marshall, master of the steamer Yankee, and David A. Wolcott, master of the steamer Rescue, and the Atlantic Submarine Wrecking Company, a corporation created by the State of New York, and authorised to engage in the business of wrecking and of assisting vessels in danger and distress, and who were the owners of the said steamers. The libel is filed by the libellants for themselves and the crews of the said steamers, and claims the sum of 25,000 dols. as a reasonable compensation, by way of salvage or otherwise, for the services of the libellants and of the said crews, in removing the British ship, Stratton Audley, and her cargo, from off the Romer Shoal, near the entrance to the lower bay of the harbour of New York, where she was aground, on the 23rd March 1869. The answer gives substantially a correct version of the facts of the case, as they appear in evidence. The ship was bound from Calcutta to New York. She took a pilot off Barnegat light, about half-past six o'clock in the evening of March 22. At a quarter before eleven o'clock at night, whilst running for the bar at the entrance to the lower bay, she encountered a snow squall, which obscured the coast lights. Her port anchor was then let go, but the chain parted. Her starboard anchor was then dropped. She dragged some distance with this, until she brought up in 27ft. of water. She drew 17¾ft. forward; and 19¼ft. aft. The tide, which was very high, being driven in by an easterly wind, so that low water was as high as ordinary high water, fell while the vessel lay in this position, so that there came to be but 21 feet of water under her aft, and as there was considerable sea on, she struck bottom occasionally near her stern, and when she struck she thumped heavily. About six o'clock in the morning, the steamtug Yankee came within hail of the ship, and was asked by her master what the charge would be for towing the vessel off? Marshall, the master of the Yankee, asked, in reply, how much water the ship drew. The answer from the ship was, "about 20 feet." Marshall asked how much water there was alongside of the ship. The answer was "about 21 feet." Marshall asked if she was not striking. The reply was, "once in a while." Marshall then said he would tow the ship off for 1000 dols. The master of the ship said that was too much, and offered 500*l.* The Yankee then drifted out of hailing distance. She soon came up again to the ship. The master of the ship then asked Marshall, "How much did you say?" Marshall replied "2000*l.*" The master said "I understood you dollars." "No," said Marshall, "I said pounds." It was then agreed that the Yankee should render her assistance, and that the amount of compensation should be left to arbitration. The Yankee then got a hawser to the ship about half-past six a.m. The Rescue soon came up and aided the Yankee in pulling, there being a hawser from the stern of the Rescue to the bow of the Yankee, and another hawser from the stern of the Yankee to the ship. The latter hawser, which belonged to the Yankee and was a new one, 8in. in circumference, parted, and was put in place again with another hawser which belonged to the ship. The two were then pulled with until the ship's hawser broke. The pulling with the hawser was continued, the ship being moved as the sea lifted her, until that hawser parted again. The hawser from the Rescue to the Yankee parted two or three times. The result was that, by the use of hawsers, and hawsers alone, and the power of the two tugs, the ship was hauled off into deep water about noon, a space of six hours from the time the Yankee reached her. She was towed by the tugs to New York, arriving there about four p.m. She was an iron vessel, and, so far as appears, was not injured or strained. When the Yankee reached her, it was the beginning of the ebb tide and the wind had shifted from the eastward and had come out right from the south and west, but the sea did not abate. It was low water about ten a.m., and about that time the wind got around to the west or north-west. The answer avers a willingness and readiness on the part of the claimaints, at all times, to submit to arbitration the question of the amount to be allowed to the libellants for the service as one of towage, but alleges that the libellants have at all times insisted on submitting their claim to arbitration as one of salvage. The claim is pressed upon the court by the libellants as one of salvage. The value of the ship and her cargo was 250,000 dols. The value of the two steamers at the time was about 80,000 dols., and the value of the wrecking apparatus and material on board of them was about 50,000 dols. more. I think, on the evideuce, that the peril to the ship at and after the time when the Yankee reached her has been very much exaggerated by the libellants. So, too, the danger to the steamers has been inordinately magnified, in order to enhance the value of the service. But substantial service was rendered to the ship by the two steamers, and for that service a liberal, but at the same time reasonable, compensation must be awarded. The ship was undoubtedly in a condition to be the subject of a salvage service, but on the principles settled in the case of The Coast Wrecking Company v. The Morning Star, 14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 420 (a), no salvage compensation for the service rendered can be awarded to any of the libellants. The masters and crews of the steamers were hired on wages by the corporation, which owned the steamers and all the apparatus and material on board of them. They received those wages steadily, whether the steamers were employed or not. Their compensation for the services they rendered to this ship, and for the time occupied in rendering those services, was not at all dependent on the success of those services. They did not render them directly to the ship, but incidentally in the discharge of and as a part of their duty to their employers. When they were hired they were given to understand by the corporation that they should receive wages, and that they should have no share otherwise in any earnings of the vessels or of the corporation; and none of them will have any share in anything that may be awarded to the libellants in this case. The masters and crews of the steamers must therefore be wholly left out of the case. The corporation cannot claim as assignee in advance of what might otherwise be the claims of its hired servants for salvage; and those servants, having cut themselves off by their contract with the corporation, from setting up any claim for salvage in this case, such claim never had any existence, so as to be capable of assignment, after the fact. Nor can the corporation itself be a salvor. It cannot hire persons on wages, and claim salvage for services rendered by those persons. If such a principle were to be admitted, it would have to be extended to individuals; and yet it was never heard that one person could hire another on wages to perform a salvage service to a vessel in distress, and to have no share otherwise in the compensation therefor, and that after such service had been rendered by the latter, the former, who had taken no personal part in it, could claim salvage compensation therefore as such. Yet that is precisely the claim which the libellant corporation in this case is urging, when it asks to be paid as if it had been an individual salvor. The main element, which the law recognises and requires as an element in a salvage service, is wholly wanting in the case of a corporation. That element is the impulse and stimulus, which spurs the individual salvor to manifest boldness and heroism, and incur risk and peril, by the expectation of the large compensation which the law awards in cases of success. That element was wholly wanting in this case. The ship and her cargo, as a consideration for their liability to pay a salvage compensation, were entitled to the exercise of all the energies which individual salvors could put forth, impelled by all the hopes of salvage reward which could operate to stimulate those energies. There were no such hopes of salvage reward in this case on the part of the officers and crew of the steamers; and it is at least doubtful, in view of the fact that the Yankee failed, through timidity, to reach the ship until on the third attempt to do so, while a pilot boat and her yawl boat seem to have had no difficulty in navigating safely in a no less boisterous sea, whether the same energies were put forth by those on board the Yankee to reach the ship promptly that would have been manifested if they had been working for themselves and not merely for their employers. The master of the Yankee says that he turned back on his first attempt to reach the ship, because he considered the risk too great, and that he abandoned the second attempt because he would not run the risk till daylight. It is very questionable whether wrecking corporations for salvage business, with their employés placed on the footing occupied by those of this corporation, are, on the whole, of advantage to commerce. There is, on the one hand, the benefit of associated capital of large amount, with well-fitted appliances for the business. But this has the effect to drive individual salvors out of the business; and the daring, and courage, and insensibility to danger, nerved by the prospect of large reward, which are manifested continually by individual salvors, are replaced by the poor substitute of hired labour, which has nothing to gain by taking risks, and is, therefore, likely to fail to use promptly at critical moments the ample means placed at its disposal. This corporation is entitled to a proper compensation for the use of its two steamers, and of such of its appliances on board of them as were used in the service rendered to their ship. The case must be viewed as one of contract for work and labour, without reference to the value of the ship and her cargo as an element in the measure of compensation. Marshall, the master of the Yankee, placed it in that position, by what passed between him and the master of the ship. It is manifest that the latter, by regarding 1000 dollars as a large charge, and offering 500*l.*, had no idea that he was subjecting his vessel and cargo to a salvage charge. It is entirely clear, on the evidence, that if he had been told that if he allowed himself to be towed off from where where he was by the Yankee he would in the end be obliged to pay her owners a compensation of 25,000 dollars for the service, he would have assumed the risk of remaining there, the wind having already changed to a favourable quarter, until a vessel more moderate in her demands should come to his aid. The hazard to the steamers and the property on board of them, whatever it was, is to be taken into view as making the service worth more than if there had been no hazard to them. But the idea that a proportion of the cost of maintaining the steamers and property for occasional service, and of the current expenses of the corporation, while such steamers and property were not employed in the service of this ship, is to be paid by this ship, is wholly inadmissible. In this case the corporation would have had a claim for compensation for the time and services of the steamers in endeavouring to pull the vessel off, even if they had failed. Their compensation must, of course, be greater because of their success. I wholly reject the testimony of the so-called expert witnesses on both sides, who give evidence as to their opinion of the value in money of the services rendered. They proceed on grounds which are unsound, and not in consonance with views, which as above stated must govern this case. On the whole evidence, I think 1500 dols. is ample compensation in this case. And as the claimants, before suit was brought, offered to pay 2000 dols. by way of compromise, I allow no costs to the libellants.

(a) This case was affirmed on appeal.

For libellants, E. W. Stoughton and J. E. Parsons.

For claimants, E. C. Benedict, T. Scudder, and Martin and Smith.

Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

Reported by DOUGLAS KINGSFORD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

February, 4, 5, and 19.

Present: The Right Hon. Lord CHELMSFORD, Sir JAMES W. COLVILE, Sir JOSEPH NAPIER.

RODGER AND OTHERS v. THE COMPTOIR D'ESCOMPTE DE PARIS AND OTHERS.

Hong Kong — Stoppage in transitu — Continuance of transitus—Assignment by insolvent consignees to secure antecedent debt before arrival of bills of lading—Indorsement in performance of agreement in assignment —Special stipulation as to remittances.

A mercantile firm carried on business at London and Hong Kong. The London firm purchased goods of merchants in Manchester for the firm at Hong Kong. The goods were forwarded to London to the shipping agents of the firm there, and were shipped for Hong Kong on the latter's instructions. The bills of lading were in the ordinary form, but the invoices relating to the greater part of the goods contained the stipulation that the Hong Kong firm should remit the proceeds of Sales to the London firm to meet acceptances given to the vendors of the latter.

The Hong Kong partner and consignee of the goods had had bill transactions with banking firms there, resulting in a large unsecured debt.

Being pressed for payment, the consignee on behalf of the firm executed to the banks an assignment of various other property and all goods and bills of lading to arrive within a certain period. This assignment included the goods mentioned above.

Afterwards, on the arrival of the goods, the consignee indorsed and handed over the bills of lading, in performance of the agreement in the assignment.

The Hong Kong branch of the firm was at this time insolvent, and had been so at the date of the assignment :

The owners of the vessel in which the goods were shipped, refused to deliver the goods to the indorsees of the bills of lading, in consequence of notices to stop given them by the unpaid vendors, and the indorsees thereupon brought an action for conversion against the ship owners :

On appeal to the judicial committee :—

Held, first, that the transitus did not terminate till the arrival of the goods at Hong Kong, for the general rule is that where goods are sold to be sent to a particular destination, named by the vendor, the right of the unpaid vendor continues until they arrive and are delivered there according to the bills of lading ; and second, that, as the assignors had not, at the date of the assignment, possession of the bills of lading, and, as nothing was advanced on the faith of them, the effect of the assignment could only be to transfer the interest that the assignors had in the goods expected ; this interest being subject to special stipulations as to remittances in the case of part of the goods, and in all to the lien of the unpaid vendors :

The general rule is that the assignee of any security stands in the same position as the assignor as to the equities arising upon it. An exception, founded on the negotiable quality of the document, is made in the case of the holder of an indorsed bill of lading, who may, in the course of commercial dealing, transfer a greater right than he himself has. But this exception is confined to the case where the transferor is himself in actual and authorised possession of the bill of lading, and the transferee gives value on the faith of it, without having notice of any circumstance which would render the transaction neither fair nor honest.

This was an action of trover brought by the respondents against the appellants in the Supreme Court of Hong Kong for 305 bales of merchandise which were shipped at London for Hong Kong on board a vessel called the Min, by the direction of George Lyall and Charles Frederick Still, of London, deliverable to Lyall, Still, and Co., or their assigns, according to the bills of lading, of which the respondents became the transferees. The appellants were the owners of the Min.

They pleaded a denial of the conversion, and also a denial that the goods were the goods of the plaintiffs (the respondents) as alleged.

The case was tried at Hong Kong before the Chief Justice, and a special jury, and a verdict was found for the plaintiffs, for the amount of the value of the goods.

A motion was afterwards made to have this verdict set aside and a nonsuit entered, pursuant to leave reserved at the trial on the ground that the plaintiffs had not proved that they were indorsees of the bills of lading for valuable consideration without notice so as to pass property, or that a new trial should be directed on this and other grounds of objection. An order was made that the motion be refused with costs.

This appeal was brought for the purpose of having this order and the verdict found for the plaintiffs set aside, and judgment of nonsuit entered or a new trial directed.

It appeared that the goods in question were purchased from merchants at Manchester in the autumn of 1866 by George Lyall and Charles Frederick Still, of London, for their firm at Hong Kong, which traded there under the style of Lyall, Still, and Co. Mr. George Frederick Maclean was the resident partner and manager at Hong Kong.

One parcel of these goods was purchased from B. Liebert and Co., on a ten months' credit, which was the usual course in such transactions as between Manchester and Hong Kong merchants.

It was part of the contract that remittances of proceeds of sales should be made from Hong Kong to meet the acceptances of George Lyall and Charles Frederick Still, given for the price of the goods, on receipt of the bills of lading.

The second parcel was purchased from Samuel Mendel on a nine months' credit, with a stipulation of a similar character as to remittances.

The third parcel was purchased from Calvert and Co. on a six months' credit, without any special stipulation.

The object of the long credit was to give ample time for realising proceeds, so as to make remittances according to agreement.

When the time arrived for forwarding the goods from Manchester, Lyall and Still, of London, employed Killick, Martin, and Co., as shipping agents there, to secure tonnage in the Min, which was then in the berth for Hong Kong. When this was secured, Lyall and Still directed the vendors at Manchester to forward the goods to Killick, Martin, and Co. for shipment in the Min : and they also directed Killick

Martin, and Co. to receive the goods so to be forwarded to them simply for the purpose of the shipment. In accordance with these instructions the goods were packed and marked at Manchester ready for shipment, and were sent up to Killick, Martin, and Co., with whom Lyall and Still had contracted for the carriage from Manchester to Hong Kong. All the charges were included in one through freight.

The goods were shipped on board the Min; bills of lading for them, deliverable to Lyall, Still, and Co., or their assigns, were signed by the master, and were handed over to Lyall and Still, who accepted the draft of the vendors for the price in each case.

Before this period the firm at Hong Kong was in a failing condition; their deficit was about 4 lacs of dollars, and, in November,, their condition had not improved. At the end of November and beginning of December, Maclean had bill transactions with the respondents (two banking firms at Hong Kong), by which he got large advances on the undertaking to furnish shipping documents for silk cargoes, to be ready for the mail of the 15th Dec. from Hong Kong.

On the 13th Dec. the transactions of the firm were at a stand; they had ceased to make purchases or shipments of tea or silk as theretofore; they were under the necessity of returning bills of their correspondents, and had refused payment of their acceptances to the amount of 150,000 dollars. This was well known at the time in Hong Kong.

On the 14th Dec. Mr. Kaiser, the manager of one of the two banks, addressed a letter to Lyall, Still, and Co, requiring them to furnish, in the course of the day, the shipping documents according to their undertaking; to which Mr. Maclean replied, that they were unfortunately unable to comply with this request.

On the 17th, Mr Kaiser wrote another letter, insisting on getting the documents or a return of the advance made on the faith of the undertaking to furnish them, and he concluded his letter in these words: "I must ask your immediate attention to this matter, and beg to warn you that my now offering to receive back the money obtained by you must not be looked upon as in any way binding me to treat the matter as one of debt, as I shall hold myself perfectly at liberty to deal with the matter as one of a mnch more serious character than a mere debt, if it be not at once satisfactorily arranged."

Mr. Kaye, the resident manager of the other bank, had had a conversation with Mr. Maclean in reference to the refusal of Lyall, Still, and Co. to pay their acceptances. He also became impatient and urgent for an arrangement, on account of the advance made by his bank. The two banks then combined, and Maclean was pressed; as he could not give them the documents he promised to give them all he had.

He made out a memorandum which he handed to Mr. Pollard, the counsel for the banks, in order that he might prepare a formal assignment. This was prepared, and was executed on the 22nd Dec. by Mr. Maclean in the name of the firm, which was at this time insolvent with liabilities uncovered to the amount of 8 lacs of dollars.

The assignment stated the consideration of it to be, first, a debt of 85,714 dollars 28 cents owing by Lyall, Still, and Co. to one of the banks, and of 50,000 dollars to the other; next, the agreement to furnish bills and shipping documents, upon the faith of which the advances were made, which constituted the debts to the banks and the release of all claim upon the part of the banks in respect of this agreement. It then proceeds to make over to the banks, "the whole of the property, premises, and chattels specified in the schedule at the foot, with all the estate, right, title, interest, claim or demand of Lyall, Still, and Co. therein or thereto, or arising thereout or therefrom." It further provides for doing all acts that might be required to give full and formal effect for securing and perfecting the assignment.

In the schedule, the first item is a share in the Hong Kong Club. There are other items of shares in various insurance companies; an equity of redemption, and two items in these words: "All goods and bills of lading or other documents for all goods now on the way hither to arrive in Dec. 1866, or Jan. 1867." "All goods or documents for goods alluded to in a telegram dated 9th Nov. 1866, from London partners to Hong Kong firm, received by steamer Clan Alpine, viâ Calcutta, in the words, 'are shipping more goods; shirtings thirteen six, shipment remitted;' and all goods or documents for goods purchased and shipped and now on the way hither."

The documents arrived on the 27th Dec. 1866, and 1st Jan. 1867, including the bills of lading for the goods shipped in the Min. These were indorsed, and handed over by Mr. Maclean (together with the policies on the goods) to Mr. Kaiser, in performance of the agreement in the assignment.

After the arrival of the Min at Hong Kong, a demand was made on the part of the unpaid vendors, by persons authorised on their behalf, to claim possession of the goods, and this demand was acceded to on behalf of the owners of the Min. Subsequently the respondents, as transferees and holders of the bills of lading, made a like demand which was refused.

Sir Roundell Palmer, Q.C., and Manisty, Q.C. (Baylis with them), for the appellants.—The right of the unpaid vendors to stop these goods in transitu was not defeated by the indorsement of the bills of lading by Maclean to the respondents; for the indorsement was neither bonâ fide nor for valuable consideration. The indorsement was merely in pursuance of the contract contained in the assignment of Dec. 22, 1866. The only consideration that can be suggested must be that which supports the assignment; but there was no consideration for the indorsement. But the respondents should have shown that there was money advanced specifically as consideration for the indorsement of the bills of lading—(see Spalding v. Ruding, 6 Beav. 381.) This assignment was a most sweeping and general security, and applied to various property other than the goods the subject of these bills of lading. Such an assignment could only transfer the interest that the assignors had. In the assignment there is an agreement to hand over all documents, &c., connected with the property transferred, and to make all transfers, &c.. of the property "and of our estate and interest therein legal or equitable." In the construction of such general words the maxim given in Sheppard's Touchstone (p. 88) must be applied—"That if the words have double intendment, and the one standeth with law and the other is against law, it be taken in that sense which is agreeable to law . . . . (For) the law prefers a less estate by right to a larger estate by wrong." Applying this rule of construction it must be held that, as to Liebert and Mendel's goods, the effect of the indorsement was only to create a trust in the indorsees to sell the goods and to apply the proceeds to meet the acceptances by Lyall and Still of the bills drawn by the vendors. This was the understanding as to these goods, as is shown by the terms of the invoices. There could not have been in this assignment a contract to make the bills of lading a security for the antecedent debt. The principal of the observation of Wigram, V.C., in Whitworth v. Gaugain

Digitized by Google

(3 Hare, 428) that "there is no principle upon which a court of justice can be required to imply that a general contract to give a judgment is a contract to give that which does not belong to the debtor," applies to the construction of the assignment here. The respondents as indorsees of these bills of lading are (by 18 and 19 Vict. c. 111, s. 1) "subject to the same liabilities . . . . as if the contract contained in the bills of lading had been made with themselves," and the special appropriation of the proceeds mentioned above; was a part of such liability. In the judgment in the case of Cuming v. Brown (9 East, 514), it is observed, "If the plaintiff (the indorsee of a bill of lading) had known all the circumstances of the case as they stood between consignor and consignee, he would have known nothing which should have made it unfair in the consignee to assign or in himself to accept the assignment of the bill of lading. If he had assisted in contravening the actual terms of the sale on the part of the consignor or his reasonable expectations arising out of them, or his rights connected therewith, it would have been otherwise, and he would in that case have stood in the same position as the consignee. If, for instance, he had known that the consignee had been in insolvent circumstances, and that no bill had been accepted by him for the price of the goods, or that being accepted it was not likely to be paid—in that case the interposition of himself between the consignor and consignee in order to assist the latter to disappoint the just rights and expectations of the former, would have been an act done in fraud of the consignor's right to stop in transitu, and would, therefore, have been unavoidable to the party taking an assignment of the bill of lading under such circumstances and for such purposes:" (See, too, Barrow v. Coles, 3 Camp. 92.) And in Virtue v. Jewell, 4 Camp. 31, it was held that the right of the unpaid vendor to stop in transitu is not taken away by the indorsement of the bill of lading to a third party, who had notice of the consignee's insolvency. These two decisions exactly apply here, the respondents must be considered to have had, at the time of assignment or indorsement, constructive, if not actual notice of the terms of the sale, of the consequent rights of the vendors, and of the insolvency of the respondents. There was misdirection by the judge below in directing the jury that the bills of lading only could be looked to for the purpose of affecting third parties with notice of private arrangements incident to a sale. Here there was implied notice of the special stipulation as to remittances, in the case of Liebert and Mendel's goods. For the words in the bills of lading refer to the goods only as so many bales of "merchandise," and to ascertain the description of the goods the invoices containing the stipulation would necessarily be looked to. And with regard to notice by the respondents of the insolvency of Lyall and Still, the judge directed the jury only to consider whether there was actual notice, but did not properly explain the doctrine of constructive notice. It was not enough that the respondents did not actually know of the insolvency, if they abstained from inquiry with the design of escaping knowledge. This was what they in fact did, and the design of this sweeping assignment was to collect all that could be had of the property of those whose insolvency was suspected. Lyall, Still, and Co. at Hong Kong, were entrusted with Liebert and Mendel's bills of lading only as agents within the Factors Acts, and the transfer of them to secure an ante advent debt was invalid under those acts. As to Calvert's goods, though there was stipulation as to remittances, yet the right of the vendor to stop was not defeated by the assignment nor indorsement. The following cases were also cited:

Haille v. Smith, 1 Bos. & Pull. 563;
Evans v. Trueman, 1 M. & Rob. 10;
Gobind Chunder Sein v. Ryan, 9 Moo. J. A. 140;
Gurney v. Behrend, 3 E. & B. 622;
Pease v. Gloahec, 3 Moo. P. C. N. S. 556; 1 L. R. P. C. 219; 15 L. T. Rep. N. S. 6.

Mellish, Q C., Kay, Q.C. (Holl with them) for the respondents.—Lyall, Still, and Co., were not factors but owners of the goods. As to Liebert's goods, the terms of the letter of Sept. 9, 1861, and subseqent letters, the facts that he drew and George Lyall and Frederick Still accepted bills for the price of these goods, including interest during their currency, and commission, that the insurance and freight were paid by them, and the goods re-invoiced by them to the Hong Kong branch of the firm, show that they took and dealt with the goods as owners, and that the goods were assigned to Lyall, Still, and Co. at their own risk and not as factors. And as to Mendel's and Calvert's goods, the invoices thereof stating that they were "bought on account and for the risk of George Lyall and Frederick Still, of London," and the facts that they were paid for by drafts drawn by the vendors on and accepted by the above firm, including interest and commission, as in Liebert's case, shows that these goods also were consigned to Lyall, Still, and Co. at their own risk as purchasers and not as factors. [Lord CHELMSFORD intimated that argument on this point was unnecessary, as the relation of principal and agent could not be established.] There was no misdirection by the judge below. He directed the jury that the transitus continued till the ship's arrival at Hong Kong, and that meanwhile it was competent to the vendors to stop; that the relation was not that of principal and agent; and that the transfer was for valuable consideration. The question left to the jury was as to the bona fides of the transfer. The judge, too, was right in directing the jury to look at the bills of lading as guiding them to the nature of the transaction. This was right, for the bill of lading contains the contract and not the invoice, which simply contains the amount and description of the goods; and it is not the custom of trade that the invoice should contain any stipulation limiting the effect of the bill of lading, so that here it cannot be contended that the respondents were affected with constructive notice of the special terms contained in the invoices of Liebert and Mendel's goods. When the attempt was made by the vendors to stop the goods, they were not in transitu, for the goods were delivered in London to the agents of the London branch of the firm, and they were shipped under their orders and the bills of lading were made out after their direction, so that there was, in fact, an actual or constructive delivery to the purchasers, by which the right to stop would be determined. And as to the goods bought of Mendel and Calvert, there is the conclusive fact that the goods are shown by the invoices to have been bought "on account of George Lyall and Charles Frederick Still," and were invoiced to them only. The cases of Jones v. Jones, 8 M. & W. 431; Wentworth v. Outhwaite, 10 M. & W. 436, show that under these circumstances there was an end to the transitus at London. The respondents were transferees for valuable consideration, bonâ fide and without notice, of the bills of lading. There is not evidence that the respondents knew of the insolvency at the date of the assignment, and if they did, this would not make the assignment improper, unless there was also notice that the vendors were unpaid. And that notice that vendors were unpaid would not be sufficient to affect the indorsement, without notice of the insolvency is shown by Cuming v. Brown, 9 East, 506. The right to stop is not a security or lien on goods, it is only a right to invest the property in the goods. The proper principle in these cases is well expressed by Buller, J., in the case of Lickbarrow v. Mason, 6 East, 34 note: 1 Sm. L. C. 6th edit. 744, who observes, "After these authorities, taking also into consideration that there is no case whatever in which it has been held that goods can be stopped in transitu, after they have been sold and paid for, or money advanced upon them bonâ fide and without notice, I do not conceive that the case is open to any arguments of policy or convenience; but if it should be thought so, I beg leave to say that in all mercantile transactions, one great point to be kept uniformerly in view is to make the circulation and negotiation of property as quick, as easy, and as certain as possible. [Lord CHELMSFORD asked whether any case had decided that a bill of lading could be transferred as a security for antecedent debt, so as to defeat the right of the unpaid vendors to stop in transitu. Mellish, Q.C., referred to Pease v. Gloahec, the Marie Joseph, L. Rep. 1 P. C. 219; 15 L. T. Rep. N. S. 6. Lord CHELMSFORD read the note to Lickbarrow v. Mason, 1 Sm. L. C. 6th edit. 766, where Re Westzinthus 5 B. & Ad. 817 is cited as showing that "where a bill of lading may be and has been pledged by the consignee of the goods as a security for his own debt, the legal right to the possession of the goods passes to the pledgee; but the right to stop them in transitu, in case the consignee should become insolvent is not absolutely defeated, as it is in the case of the sale of a bill of lading by the consignee; for the vendor may still resume his interest in them, subject to the rights of the pledgee, and will have a right at least in equity to the residue which may remain after satisfying the pledgee's claim. And further if the goods comprised within the bill of lading be pledged along with other goods belonging to the pledger himself, the vendor will have a right to have all the pledger's own goods appropriated to the discharge of the pledgee's claim before any of the goods comprised within the bill of lading are so. . . . And Spalding v. Ruding, 6 Beav. 376, confirms Westzinthus's case, and shows that the goods cannot be retained as security for a general balance of account, but only for the specific advance made upon the security of the bill of lading."] The observation in Virtue v. Jewell, 4 Camp. 31, that the right to stop is not taken away by an assignment of a bill of lading for valuable consideration with notice of the consignee's insolvency was a mere obiter dictum; Cuming v. Brown was not cited, and the case stands alone. The argument that there was no consideration for the indorsement of the bill of lading is not good, for the indorsement was in pursuance of the contract contained in the assignment. With respect to the trusts to which Liebert and Mendel's goods are alleged to have been subject, the stipulation as to the remission of the proceeds of the goods to meet the drafts accepted for the price thereof, was a mere term of the contracts for those goods, but did not under the circumstances affect the goods with any trust or equitable lien. And in any case, the respondents had no notice of such lien, and so could not be affected by it. They, as transferees of the bills of lading, saw nothing on the face of them to guide them to any such stipulation. The doctrine of constructive notice does not apply here. It was laid down in Jones v. Smith, 1 Hare 43, that that doctrine applies in two cases; first, where the party charged knew that the property in dispute was encumbered or in some way affected, in which case he is deemed to have notice of the facts and instruments, to a knowledge of which he would have been led by due inquiry after the fact which he actually knew; and, secondly, where the conduct of the party charged evinces that he had a suspicion of the truth, but wilfully or fraudulently determined to avoid receiving actual notice of it. The respondents had no knowledge that there was any limitation on the bills of lading, they were not put on inquiry, and their conduct evinced no suspicion nor wilful avoidance of knowledge. See, too, Bill v. Cubitt, 3 B. & C. 466. It was contended for the appellants that respondents neglected to look at the invoices which contained the stipulation as to remittance, but such neglect would not of itself affect the title of the respondents. In Raphael v. Bank of England, 17 C. B. 161, it was held that one who takes a bank-note or other negotiable security bona fide—i. e., giving value for it, and having no notice at the time that the party from whom he took it had no title—is entitled to recover on it, even though he had at the time the means of knowledge, of which means he had neglected to avail himself. Willes, J., in that case (quoting Parke, B., in May v. Chapman, 16 M. & W. 355), says (at p. 174), "Notice or knowledge means not merely express notice, but knowledge, or the means of knowledge, to which the party wilfully shuts his eyes, a suspicion in the mind of the party, and the means of knowledge in his power wilfully disregarded." So that it is clear that the mere omission to look at the invoices does not affect the bona fides of the respondents. And as to Calvert's goods, there was no special stipulation as to remittances, and there is not, therefore, any ground for alleging that those goods were consigned to the Hong Kong branch of the firm as factors, or that they are affected by any trust whatever. Lyall, Steel, and Co. paid the freight and insurance of the goods from Manchester to Hong Kong, and to the extent of the amount so paid they had at any rate a first charge or interest in the goods which they were in a position to, and did in fact, assign to the respondents.

Sir Roundell Palmer, Q. C., replied.

Judgment was delivered by Sir JOSEPH NAPIER, which, after stating the facts as above set forth, proceeded:—In order to decide between the rival claimants, two questions have to be answered—First. Did the transitus terminate before the demand was made on behalf of the appellants? Secondly. Was the transfer of the bills of lading made to the respondents for valuable consideration, and without notice of such circumstances as rendered them not fairly and honestly assignable, and so as to transfer to the respondents a property in the goods freed and discharged from the proprietary lien of the unpaid vendors. The general rule is, that where goods are sold to be sent to a particular destination named by the vendee, the right of the unpaid vendor to stop them continues until they arrive and are delivered there according to the bills of lading. The transitus continues whilst they are in charge of some third party contracted with as carrier for the purpose of forwarding them, and who has them in charge simply for this purpose. It may suffice to refer to the recent case of Berndtson v. Strang (L. Rep. 4 Eq. 481; 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 583). The documents in evidence as well as the oral testimony in the present case, establish beyond doubt that Hong Kong was the destination agreed upon between vendors and vendee; and the other parties who intervened, for the purpose of having the goods forwarded to their destination, had them in charge for this purpose only. Their Lordships, therefore, entertain no doubt that the transitus had not ended before the arrival at Hong Kong. The second is the real question in the case. The respondents contended that they gave value for the bills of lading: that they had no notice of any special terms of agreement between the vendors and vendees of which they say that they were not informed, and as to which they also say that they were not bound to make inquiry. The managers of the banks (Messrs. Kaiser and Kaye), were not examined as witnesses at the trial; but it plainly appears on the evidence adduced by the plaintiffs (the respondents) that the insolvency of Lyall, Still, and Co. was known to the banks at the time of the assignment, and it is but reasonable to suppose that they were quite familiar with what also, on the same evidence, appears to be the usage of trade as between Manchester and Hong Kong: (See Newsome v. Thornton, 6 East, 19.) At the time the bills of lading were handed over to them, no money was advanced, no benefit was conferred or promised on the faith of these securities. They were transferred simply (as stated in the evidence of the plaintiffs) in performance of the agreement in the assignment. We have, therefore, to refer to the assignment itself to see what was the interest in these bills of lading that was agreed to be transferred, as part of what was assigned for the consideration expressed. The general rule so clearly stated and explained by Lord St. Leonards in the case of Mangles v. Dixon, 3 H. of L. Cas. 702, is that the assignee of any security stands in the same position as the assignor as to the equities arising upon it. This, as a general rule was not disputed, but it was contended that the case of a bill of lading is exceptional, and must be dealt with on special grounds.

Doubtless, the holder of an indorsed bill of lading may in the course of commercial dealing transfer a greater right than he himself has; the exception is founded on the negotiable quality of the document. It is confined to the case where the person who transfers the right is himself in actual and authorised possession of the document, and the transferee gives value on the faith of it, without having notice of any circumstance which would render the transaction neither fair nor honest. In such a case, if the vendor is unpaid, one of two innocent parties must suffer by the act of a third: and it is reasonable that he who by misplaced confidence has enabled such third person to occasion the loss should sustain it: Lickbarrow v. Mason, 2 T. R. 70. But in this case, at the time of the assignment, Maclean had not possession of the documents; nothing was advanced on the faith of them. There is merely a general description of documents expected to arrive, without knowing their contents or how far they might be limited or qualified. The property of the firm in the goods expected, was not only subject to special stipulations in the contracts of sale in the case of two of the three parcels, but was also subject in all the three to the lien of the unpaid vendors. And can it be contended that before Maclean got possession of the documents when his firm was in a condition of undoubted insolvency, and the terms of the documents were not disclosed, there was conveyed to the respondents by this assignment the benefit of a prospective breach of trust and violation of contract? There is not a word in the instrument that could be held to convey a greater interest than the assignors had. The power they might afterwards acquire of committing a fraud upon the vendors is not "property, estate, interest, claim, or demand, legal or equitable." "It is," says Sir Edward Coke, "a general rule that whensoever the words of a deed or of the parties without deed may have a double intendment, and the one standeth with law and right, and the other is wrongful and against law, the intendment that standeth with law shall be taken." (Co. Litt. 42a.) Constructio legis non facit injuriam; as it is pithily said in the passage from the Touchstone referred to by Sir Roundell Palmer in his able argument: "The law in its genuine construction prefers a less estate by right to a larger estate by wrong." The rule that words shall be construed most strongly against him who uses them gives place to a higher rule; higher because it has a moral element, that the construction shall not be such as to work a wrong. The lien of the unpaid vendor is allowed by law for the very purpose of protecting him against the insolvency of the vendee; and the assignment in this case, which left the assignors in insolvency, even if it could be said that it did not find them so, would be sufficient to originate the very right, which according to the argument for the respondents, it is also sufficient to extinguish. In the case of Spalding v. Ruding, 6 Beav. 376, the vendor's right was asserted as against property which had so far passed into the hands of the consignee that he was enabled by mortgage of the bills of lading to pass the interest in the goods to the extent of that mortgage; the right of stoppage in transitu was upheld as against the surplus, in preference to a claim of the mortgagee to apply it to liquidate the balance of a general account. This (as Vice-Chancellor Wood observes in the case already referred to—Berndtson v. Strang, L. Rep. 4 Eq. 486; 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 584.—on the question of transitus) was in some degree an extension of what was supposed to be the right of the consignor, and it shows the desire to give this right a full and equitable protection. Doubtless the vendor's claim cannot prevail against the claim of a transferee for value given on the faith of a negotiable security fairly and honestly taken; to the extent to which he has so given value, he has a prior claim. But the rule is founded on the reason of it, as already explained; cessante ratione, cessat ipsa lex. Where there is no advance made or value given upon the faith of the documents; where the object is simply by a sweeping clause to gather in whatever may be got to recoup the creditor of a debtor who had become insolvent, for an improvident advance made upon the faith of a totally different security; where, upon the true construction of the assignment, no interest passed that would place the assignee in a better position than the assignor, and the bills of lading which subsequently came to hand were transferred expressly in performance of the agreement in this assignment and without other consideration whatsoever, it appears to their Lordships that such a transfer so made, and under such circumstances, cannot be held sufficient to defeat the vendor's claim.

Their Lordships therefore are of opinion that the Chief Justice ought to have nonsuited the plaintiffs, inasmuch as, upon their evidence, it did not appear that they had acquired a property in the goods sufficient to sustain an action of trover for the conversion alleged, which took place after the assertion of the right of stoppage. They will therefore recommend Her Majesty that the order appealed against should be set aside, together with the verdict found for the respondents, and that a judgment of nonsuit should be entered.

The appellants to have their costs of this appeal.

Order reversed.

Solicitors for appellants, Reed, Phelps, and Sidgwick.

Solicitor for respondents, Ambrose Parsons.

Digitized by Google

June 14, and July 5.

(Present: The Right Hon. Lord ROMILLY, M. R.; Sir WILLIAM ERLE; Sir JAMES W. COLVILE; and Sir JOSEPH NAPIER.)

THOMAS STEPHENS (app.) v. JOHN BROOMFIELD AND ANOTHER. (resp.)

THE GREAT PACIFIC.

Bottomry—Damaged ship sold—Proceeds of sale—Utter loss—Constructive total loss—Loss—Salvage—Construction.

Money was borrowed on bottomry of a ship and freight. Afterwards the ship put into an intermediate port in a damaged state, and was then sold as unworthy of repairs.

The condition of the bond was, that it should be void if the obligors should pay the sum lent, with interest, &c., "or in case of loss of the ship or vessel such an average as by custom shall have become due on the salvage, or if on the said voyage the ship or vessel should be utterly lost, &c.," in consequence of perils of the seas. On a suit by the bondholders against the proceeds of the sale:

Held (affirming the judgment of the Admiralty Court), that the bondholders were entitled to the whole proceeds of the sale; for, first, the ship was not "utterly lost," the doctrine of constructive total loss having no application to bottomry; secondly, there was no "loss" of the vessel within the meaning of the bond; and, thirdly, there was no special provision in the bond qualifying the general rule, that the lender on bottomry is entitled to the whole of the property saved, if included in his security:

Semble, that the clause "in case of loss of the ship, such an average as shall have become due on the salvage" must be construed as intended to secure the payment to the bondholders of something which the shipowners might become entitled to receive from third parties in respect of the ship, and not a division of what might by saved from a wreck, or the proceeds of a necessary sale of the ship, between the bondholders and the shipowners.

This was an appeal from an order of the judge of the High Court of Admiralty.

The cause was one of bottomry, promoted by the respondents (the plaintiffs in the court below), as the legal holders of a bottomry bond against the proceeds of the sale of the ship.

The appellant (the defendant in the court below) was mortgagee of the ship, and intervened in the cause for the purpose of defending his interest in the proceeds of the sale against the claim of the bondholders.

The facts of the case are stated in the judgment.

The question arose on the terms of the bottomry bond, which being otherwise in the usual form, contained the following condition:

Now, the condition of the above written bond is such that if the said ship or vessel shall with all reasonable speed sail from the port of Sydney aforesaid and duly prosecute and complete the said intended voyage or voyages, and that without deviation except as aforesaid, and the perils, damages, casualties, and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation excepted; and if the above bounden William Baillie, his executors or administrators, or some or one of them, or the owners of the said ship or vessel do and shall well and truly pay or cause to be paid unto the said John Broomfield and Reginald Whitaker or either of them, their or either of their administrators or assigns, or to their or either of their attorney or attorneys' agent or agents thereto lawfully constituted the full and just sum of 7301*l.* 15*s.* 9*d.* of sterling British money, being the principal money secured by this bond, together with the interest or premium of 45*l.* per cent. for the voyage before the expiration of twelve hours after the safe arrival of the said ship or vessel at her port of discharge in the United Kingdom, or, in the case she shall proceed to Cork, in Ireland, then before the expiration of twelve hours after the safe arrival, or in case of loss of the ship or vessel such an average as by custom shall have become due on the salvage, or if on the said voyage the said ship or vessel should be utterly lost, cast away, or destroyed in consequence of fire, enemies, men of war, pirates, storms, or other unavoidable perils, damages, or casualties of the seas, rivers, and navigation to be sufficiently shown and proved by the said William Baillie, his executors or administrators, or some or one of them or by the owners of the said ship or vessel, then this bond or obligation to be void and of no effect, or otherwise to remain in full force and virtue.

The appellant, in his answer, set out the bond with its condition, and contended that, on the terms of the bond, and under the circumstances of the case, the bond had never become payable, that nothing was due thereon, and that in any case the respondents were not entitled to the whole of the proceeds of the sale, but to such an average only as by custom should have become due on the salvage.

The respondents, on this answer being filed, gave notice of their intention, to move the judge in court to reject so much of the answer as set up (1) that nothing was due on the bond; and (2) that the respondents were only entitled to an average on the sum of 3628*l.* 8*s.* the amount of the proceeds of the sale paid into court. This motion, which was in the nature of a demurrer, was heard on Nov. 10 and 11, 1868, and on the hearing all facts stated in the answer were taken to be true.

Sir Robert Phillimore, on Nov. 17, 1868, gave judgment holding that the bond became due and payable on the sale of the ship; that there was not such an absolute total loss as could discharge the borrower on bottomry from liability, the ship existing in specie at the time of the sale; that the words of the condition must be construed as contemplating an event that had not happened—viz., the ship's ceasing to exist, but débris of wreck only remaining. The learned judge, therefore, made an order, pronouncing for the prayer of the respondent, and directing the articles in question to be struck out of the answer, with costs of the motion against the appellant: (20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 44.)

From that order the present appeal was brought.

Sir George Honyman, Q. C. (Clarkson with him) for the appellant.—We contend that on the terms of the bond and under the circumstances of this case, the respondents cannot recover the whole proceeds of the sale, but only "such an average as by custom shall have become due." The proceeds of the sale here are, in fact, salvage. The bond contemplated two events—(1) a loss with salvage, in which case a customary average on the salvage was to be due; and (2) an utter loss in which case the bond was to be void. We admit that the latter event has not, but contend that that the former event, has happened. There was here a constructive "loss," for the ship was so damaged that the requisite repairs would have exceeded in amount the value of the ship when repaired. Repairs in such a case were, commercially speaking, impossible, for as observed by Maule, J. in Moss v. Smith, 9 C. B. 103," in matters of business a thing is said to be impossible when it is not practicable, and a thing is impracticable when it can only be done at an excessive or unreasonable cost. A man may be said to have lost a shilling when he has dropped it into deep water, though it might be possible by some very expensive contrivance to recover it. So, if a ship sustains such extensive damage that it would not be reasonably practicable to repair her—seeing that the expense of repairs would be such that no man of common sense would incur the outlay—the ship is said to be totally lost." The above case, however, was one of insurance, and we admit that circumstances which would constitute a constructive total loss within the meaning of a policy of insurance would not do so so as to discharge the borrower on bottomry. But all that we can contend is, that there was a "loss" within the terms of this bond. The above remarks of Maule, J. have been often quoted, and were approved by Jervis, C. J. in Rosetto v. Gurney, 11 C. B. 186, and by Williams, J. in Adams v. Mackenzie, 13 C. B., N. S., 444; 7 L. T. Rep. N. S. 711. "Salvage" in the bond must mean property saved on a loss, and here the proceeds of the sale would be within the term. And of these proceeds we say that the respondents are entitled to such a portion as by custom may be due. Thomson v. The Royal Exchange Assurance Company, 1 Mau. & Sel. 30, may have determined that "in the case of bottomry nothing short of a total destruction of the ship will constitute an utter loss." But the report of that case does not state the form of the bond. It probably contained only a condition avoiding the bond on an utter loss, but no clause, as in the present, providing for a partial loss with salvage. The same comment may be made on the cases of the Catherine and the Elephanta, 15 Jur. 231, 1185, and the Dante, 4 No. Ca. 408; 2 W. Rob. 427, which went no further than that of Thomson v. The Royal Exchange Assurance Company. And, further, in the Elephanta, it did not appear that the ship could not be repaired: (Parsons on Maritime Law, vol. 1, p. 422 note) There was no wrongful act on the part of the master in selling the ship. The evidence shows that that act was a prudent one. As to the mode of calculation of the "average" that would be due to the respondents, this must depend on the custom. Probably the right way would be for the respondents to share the proceeds of the sale with the appellant in the proportion of the amount of the loan to the value of the property on which the loan was made, i.e., the ship and freight. This is suggested by Boulay-Paty (Cours de Droit Commercial Maritime, vol. 3, tit. 9, s. 15, "De la Responsabilité du prêteur, en cas de naufrage et perte partielle"). The question there discussed is this:—Whether, when money has been advanced on a cargo of greater value than the loan, and the cargo has been partially lost by shipwreck or other accident, the lender may take the whole of the cargo saved (supposing it not to exceed the loan), or whether he must come to a contribution with the borrower. And he takes the following example:—The value of a cargo 20,000f., the loan on the cargo 15,000f., the value of the cargo saved 4000f.; shall the lender take the whole of the 4000f., or only 3000f., viz., three-quarters of the value of the cargo saved, as the loan was three-quarters of the value of the cargo when the advance was made? And he says (p. 183) that Valin considers that the lender ought to take 3000f. only, because "le contrat à la grosse doit être réduit à la valeur, non du total des effets sauvés, mais de la portion desdits effets, qui soit en même raison avec le total desdits effets, qu'était la somme prêtée avec le total en chargement." On the whole then our contention is that the event, as to which the bond made a special provision, has arrived, that there has been a partial loss with salvage (the proceeds of the sale being so considered), that thereupon the bondholders are entitled to a certain proportion of the proceeds of the sale such as may be determined according to custom, or the rule suggested by the French authorities, and we therefore now ask that the order of the court below may be varied by rejecting only such part of the answer as alleges nothing to be due on the bond, and by admitting the part alleging that the respondents are entitled to an average only.

Digitized by Google

Cohen (Butt, Q. C., with him), for the respondents. The cases cited on the other side with reference to constructive loss do not apply here. A policy of insurance, and a bottomry bond are different things, and the liabilities to which they give rise must be determined on different principles. In Barr v. Gibson, 3 M. & W. 390, a ship sold and assigned by deed was at time lying stranded and so damaged as to be unworthy of repairs, and a question arose as to whether the vendor's covenant that he had power to transfer her as a ship had been broken. Parke, B., says (p. 400), "The question whether the subject of the transfer bears the character of a ship or not may, in some extreme cases suggested in argument, be one of great nicety and difficulty. In the present case we do not think that any such difficulty exists. We are of opinion, that upon the evidence given on the trial, the ship did continue to be capable of being transferred as such at the time of the conveyance, though she might be totally lost within the meaning of a contract of insurance (Thomson v. Royal Exchange Assurance Company, 1 Mau. & Sel. 31), which proceeds upon a different principle, and may take place with less of damage to the ship itself than occurred in this case. It proceeds upon the loss of the subject insured for beneficial purposes." The doctrine of constructive total loss is one applied only to contracts of insurance, and is merely a convenient mode of adjusting the acknowledged rights of insurer and insured. The law as stated by Story, J., in the Draco (2 Sumn. 193), is clear that, "if after the risk on a bottomry-bond has commenced the voyage is voluntarily broken up by the borrower in any manner whatsoever . . . . the bond becomes presently payable." Again, the sale was in direct violation of the clause in the bond providing that the ship should "be delivered to no other purpose whatsoever until payment of this bond is first made." As was said in the Draco (ubi. sup., p. 195), "The sale constitutes per se a violation of the contract in its substance." (See, too, Parsons on Shipping, vol. 1, p. 137.) The loss of a ship within the meaning of a bottomry-bond means an actual total loss. Nothing short of the extinction of the subject hypothecated will discharge the borrower. And if there be a partial loss, what is saved belongs absolutely to the lender. This is the principle settled by the authorities. See

Thomson v. Royal Exchange Assurance Company, 1 Mau. & Sel. 30;
The Catharine, 15 Jur. 231;
The Elephanta, 15 Jur. 1185;
Abbott on Shipping (11th edit.), 126;
3 Kent's Commentaries (11th edit.) 454.

The rights of the respondents here, then, being so extensive, it is most unlikely that by the condition of the bond they could have intended to limit those rights, and to admit the shipowners to share property saved. And there is, in fact, nothing special in this clause, "in case of loss such an average as shall have become due on the salvage." These very words occur in the form of a bottomry bond, given in Abbott on Shipping (11th edit.), append. cccxcv. (And see Weskett, Digest of the Laws of Marine Insurance, edit. 1781, pp. 46, 48, 57, 58.) We therefore contend that the respondents are entitled to the whole proceeds of the sale, and that the judgment of the court below ought to be affirmed.

Sir G. Honyman, Q. C., in reply, commented on Adams v. Mackenzie, 13 C. B., N. S., 446; 7 L. T. Rep. N. S. 711; and Pringle v. Hartley, 3 Atk. 195.

July 5.—Judgment was delivered by Sir J. W. COLVILE:—There is no contest concerning the facts out of which this appeal has arisen. The Great Pacific having taken an outward cargo from Liverpool to Brisbane, was, after its discharge, chartered from the latter port by the Guano Consignment Company of Great Britain to sail to Callao, and thence to the Chinchas, where she was to load a cargo of guano, and return therewith via Callao to such port or place within the United Kingdom as the charterers might select. Between Brisbane and Callao she was compelled to put into Sydney for repairs; and to defray the cost of these repairs the master raised the sum of 5037*l.* 13*s.* 5*d.* on bottomry; and on the 29th March 1867, executed a bottomry bond, hypothecating the ship and freight for that sum with maritime interest at 45 per cent. The vessel then proceeded on her voyage, reached the Chinchas, took in her cargo there; but on her homeward voyage was obliged to put into Valparaiso in a damaged state, and was then sold for 3628*l.* 8*s.*, under circumstances which it is admitted would, as between assurers and assured, constitute a constructive total loss. The money was paid into the Admiralty Court, and the holders of the bottomry bond (the respondents on this appeal), brought their suit to enforce their claim against it. The suit was defended only by the appellant, who, claiming to be a mortgagee of the vessel, has intervened to protect his interest; and the sole question between the parties is, whether the respondents as bondholders are entitled to the whole, or to any, and what part of this sum of 3628*l.* 8*s.* The appellant, in his answer, set forth the bond, with its condition, which, amongst other things, provided that the obligation should be void if the obligors should pay, "in case of loss of the ship or vessel such an average as by custom should have become due on the salvage; or if, on the said voyage, the said ship or vessel should be utterly lost, cast away, and destroyed," in consequence of the perils of the sea. And the appellant insisted, that under these provisions, and upon the facts above stated, the bond had never become payable, and that nothing was due thereon; or that if it had become payable, the respondents were not entitled to the whole of the sum of 3628*l.* 8*s.*, but only to such an average as by custom should have become due thereon, and to no more. To these defences the respondents took a proceeding in the nature of a demurrer by moving that so much of the answer as set them up should be rejected. The learned judge of the Admiralty Court granted that application, and this appeal is brought against his decision. It is obvious that if either defence is to prevail, the constructive total loss involved in the sale of the vessel at Valparaiso must be treated as a "loss" within the meaning of that stipulation, in the condition of the bond upon which the defence is founded. It was admitted at the Bar, and could not have been disputed with effect, that the vessel cannot be said, by reason of what occurred at Valparaiso, to have been utterly lost, cast away, or destroyed; and consequently that the appeal cannot be supported in so far as it impugns so much of the learned judge's order as rejected the averment that nothing was due upon the bond. Therefore, the only question now to be decided is whether, on the true construction of the words "in case of loss of the ship or vessel such an average as by custom shall have become due on the salvage," and upon the admitted facts of the case, the respondents are entitled, not to the whole, but only to some undefined portion of the sum in court. The general law is succinctly stated in Kent's Commentaries, vol. 3, p. 359. Speaking of a loan on bottomry he says, "There is not, in respect to the contract, any constructive total loss. Nothing but an utter annihilation of the subject hypothecated will discharge the borrower on bottomry. The property saved, whatever it may be in amount, continues subject to the hypothecation." In support of this he cites Thompson v. The Royal Exchange Assurance Company, 1 Marr. & Sel. 30; and the doctrine is supported by the modern Admiralty cases of the Catherine and the Elephanta, 15 Jur. 231, 1185; the Dante, 2 W. Rob. 427; the American case, before Story, J., of the Draco. 2 Sum. 157, and by other authorities. The first proposition is, moreover, admitted in this case by that abandonment of the principal ground of appeal which has already been mentioned. The learned counsel for the appellant have, however, argued on the authority of a passage in Valin, which is cited at page 188 of the 3rd volume of Boulay-Paty's Cours de Droit Commercial Maritime, that when the vessel is lost, the lender on bottomry is entitled only to such a proportion of the value of the property salved as the sum lent bore to the value of the whole property hypothecated. Valin, it is to be remarked, is speaking of the hypothecation of a cargo; and it is not clear that his doctrine, if true, would apply to the proceeds arising from the sale of a ship or the débris of a ship. Boulay-Paty, however, goes on to show that this opinion of Valin was contested by both Pothier and Emérigon; that it was not received in France under the old law, and is certainly not recognised by the codes as part of the maritime law. The general rule undoubtedly is, that if the vessel is lost, the lender on bottomry, though his remedy is limited to the value of the property salved, is entitled to the whole of what is saved, provided it was included in his security. Therefore, that the bondholders in this case are as between themselves and the shipowners, or a mortgagee of the ship (whose rights are as much bound in bottomry as those of the owner of a ship not mortgaged) entitled to the whole of the proceeds of the sale of the vessel, then existing as a vessel in specie, unless there be some special provision in this particular contract which qualifies that right, is a proposition which, in their Lordships' opinion, does not admit of reasonable doubt. It has, however, been argued that such a provision is to be found in the words now to be considered. It is contended that the "loss" of the vessel there spoken of, when contrasted with the words in the following sentence, which import its utter loss and destruction, must be taken to mean something short of such utter loss, and to include a constructive total loss; that the proceeds of the sale may be properly described as salvage; and consequently that the effect of this clause is to make those proceeds divisible between the bondholders and the shipowners in proportions to be ascertained according to some custom of the existence and nature whereof nothing in the shape of proof has been suggested. It does not, however, follow that because the words, "the loss of the vessel," mean something short of utter loss and destruction, they, therefore, include "a constructive total loss," which, as has already been shown, they would not include upon the construction of ordinary bottomry bonds. It is obvious that a vessel may be so wrecked as to be no longer a vessel in specie, and so as to become a mere congeries of planks, and yet that there may be salvage of its materials to a considerable amount." In the case of the Catherine, 15 Jur. 232, Dr. Lushington says, "If a ship was once bottomried, the bond attached to the very last plank, and the holder might have that sold for his benefit." The clause under consideration may have been intended to secure that right by making it a condition for the avoidance of the bond that the obligors should account for such salvage. Again, it seems to be a forced and unnecessary construction of the clause to hold that it necessarily implies any division or apportionment between the bondholders and shipowners. That the former, who were entitled to the security of the whole ship when in a seaworthy condition, should contract that in the event of the deterioration of their security, by a constructive total loss or otherwise, they should share the proceeds with their debtors is so improbable an hypothesis, that the construction is only to be admitted if there is no escape from it. The clause, as Mr. Cohen showed, is not a special one, it is to be found in the form of a bottomry bond given in the appendix of Abbott on Shipping. Whatever it means, their Lordships believe that it was intended to secure the payment to the bondholders of something which the obligors might become entitled to receive from third parties in respect of the ship, and not a division of the proceeds of the sale of the vessel between the bondholders and the shipowners. It would meet the case suggested at the Bar in which the vessel having been voluntarily stranded with a view to the preservation of the cargo, general average upon the cargo salved might become due from the owners of that cargo to the owners of the ship. That such average would become due if the ship, failing to get off, is totally lost, seems to be a question upon which jurists are not agreed (see Abbott on Shipping, 10th edit, pp. 373 to 375, and 2 Phillips on Insurance, 1315); but the clause may, nevertheless, have been designed to cover such average, if the right to it existed. Their Lordships, however, think that they are not called upon to determine upon what particular subject the clause might operate, because it can have no operation in the present case unless there has been a loss of the vessel within the meaning of it. For the reasons above given, they are of opinion that there has been no such loss; and, being of that opinion, they will humbly advise Her Majesty to affirm the order of the Admiralty Court, and to dismiss this appeal with costs.

Digitized by Google

Order affirmed

Proctors for the appellant, Cotterill and Sons.

Proctors for the respondents, Westall and Roberts.

June 16 and 18; July 15.

(Present: The Right Hon. Lord ROMILLY, M. R., Sir WM. ERLE, Sir JAMES W. COLVILE, and Sir JOSEPH NAPIER.)

THE OWNERS OF THE STEAMSHIP LION (apps.) v. THE OWNERS OF THE VESSEL YORK TOWN (resps.)

THE LION.

Damage—Passengers—Compulsory pilot—Construction—17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, ss. 379, 388—6 Geo. 4. c. 125, s. 55.

A collision having occurred between two vessels in the Thames, the owners of the vessel in fault claimed exemption from liability for the damage on the gronnd that the vessel was in charge of a duly licensed and compulsory pilot at the time of the collision:

Held (affirming the judgment of the court below) that the captain's wife and her father, who were on board without the privity of the owners, and who had not agreed to pay any fares when they came on board, though such fares were paid after the collision, were not "passengers" within the meaning of the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, s. 379, so as to make the employment of a pilot compulsory. The owners of a ship, in charge of a pilot voluntarily taken on board, are responsible for his default whilst so acting, since 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, by sect. 388, requires that the pilot should be compulsorily employed within the district where the injury occurred in order to exempt the owners from liability.

The case of Lucey v. Ingram, 6 M. & W. 302, does not conflict with that of the Stettin, Bro. & Lush. 199, the former case having been decided on 6 Geo. 4, c. 125, s. 55, and the latter on 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, s. 388, and the provisions of the two sections being distinguishable.

The meaning of particular words in a statute, in the absence of express definition, "is to be found not so much in a strict etymological propriety of language, nor even in popular use, as in the subject or occasion on which they are used." Per Abbott, C. J. in 1 B. & C. 136, approved.

This was an appeal from an interlocutory decree of the High Court of Admiralty, in a cause of damage brought by the owners of the York Town (the respondents) against the steamship Lion, of which the appellants are the owners, to recover compensation for damages sustained in a collision between the two vessels.

The collision occurred on Dec. 8, 1867, in Blackwall Reach on the Thames.

The Lion was in ballast, and was proceeding from London to Hull. She was in charge of Richard West, a duly licensed pilot for the district within which the collision occurred. In the trial below it was admitted that the collision was wholly occasioned by the default of the said pilot, and the question then arose whether the appellants were excused from liability for the consequences of the collision, on the ground that they were compelled by law to have a pilot. By the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, the answer to this question depended on whether the Lion was, or was not carrying passengers at the time of the collision, pilotage being compulsory in the former case, but not in the latter.

It appeared by the evidence that the master of the Lion had, before starting from London, taken on board for conveyance to Hull his wife and her father, and that they were on board at the time of the collision. It further appeared that the master of the Lion had instructions not to carry anyone other than the crew, without payment of fare, except by the special permission of the owners; that no such permission had been given to him to carry his wife and her father, and that they did not pay any fares until after the arrival of the Lion at Hull, subsequently to the collision.

Other material facts will be found stated in the present judgment, and in that of the court below: (18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 803.)

Sir Robert Phillimore, on June 12, 1868, decided that the payment of fare was necessary to constitute the class of passenger whose presence on board imposes the obligation of taking a pilot; that these persons were not passengers at the time of the collision; that the subsequent payment of fares, with the object of exempting the owners of the Lion from liability, could not give them that character, and that the employment of a pilot not being compulsory, the damage must be pronounced for.

This judgment was the subject of the present appeal.

The statutory provisions on which the case turns, and which were referred to in the arguments of counsel, are chiefly, 6 Geo. 4, c. 125, s. 55:

No owner or master of any ship or vessel shall be answerable for any loss or damage which shall happen to any person or persons whomsoever from or by reason of, or by means of any neglect, default, incompetency, or incapacity of any licensed pilot acting in the charge of any such ship or vessel, under or in pursuance of any of the provisions of this Act, where and so long as such pilot shall be duly qualified to have the charge of such ship or vessel, or where and so long as no duly qualified pilot shall have offered to take charge thereof.

Sect. 303:

For the purpose of the enactments herein contained with respect to surveys and certificates of passenger steamships, the word "passengers" shall be held to include any persons carried in a steamship other than the master and crew, and the owner, his family, and servants, &c.

The Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104) s. 354:

The master of every ship carrying passengers between any place situate in the United Kingdom . . . . and any other place so situate, when navigating upon any waters situate within the limits of any district for which pilots are licensed by any pilotage authority under the provisions of this or any other Act . . . . shall, unless he or his mate has a pilotage certificate enabling such master or mate to pilot the said ship within such district . . . . employ a qualified pilot to pilot his ship; and if he fails to do so, he shall for every offence incur a penalty not exceeding 100*l.*

Sect. 379:

The following ships, when not carrying passengers, shall be exempted from compulsory pilotage in the London district, and in the Trinity House outport districts, that is to say:—(1) Ships employed in the coasting trade of the United Kingdom, &c., &c. (5) Ships navigating within the limits of the port to which they belong, &c.

Sect. 388:

No owner or master of any ship shall be answerable to any person whatever for any loss or damage occasioned by the fault or incapacity of any qualified pilot acting in charge of any ship within any district where the employment of such pilot is compulsory by law.

Milward, Q. C. and Clarkson, were for the appellants. They referred to

The Passengers' Act 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 119);
Lucey v. Ingram, 6 M. & W. 302;
Milligan v. Wedge, 12 Ad. & Ell. 737;
The General Steam Navigation Company v. The British and Colonial Steam Navigation Company, L. Rep. 3 Ex. 330; 4 Id. 238; 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 357; 20 Id. 581.

Dr. Deane, Q. C. (the Admiralty Advocate) and Butt, Q.C. were for the respondents. They referred to

The Stettin, Bro. & Lush. 196; 6 L. T. Rep. N. S. 613;
The Agricola, 2 W. Rob. 13;
The Eden, 2 W. Rob. 442;
The Annapolis, Lush. 301; 4 L. T. Rep. N. S. 417.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 15.—Judgment was delivered by Lord ROMILLY, M. R.—In this case the Lion, a screw steamer, proceeding from London to Hull, ran into the York Town, in broad daylight, at eleven a.m., on the 8th Dec. 1867, at Blackwall Reach. The York Town was being towed by two steam tugs down the river, when the Lion, without any excuse of following, ran into her stern and did her considerable damage. The question is, are the owners liable for this damage? In order to determine this, it is necessary to decide, first, whether the Lion was under the charge of a duly licensed pilot at that time; and secondly, whether it was compulsory on the Lion to take a duly licensed pilot. If these questions are answered in the affirmative, then the owners are exonerated. If in the negative, they are liable. But if the first question be answered in the affirmative, and the second question in the negative, then it becomes necessary to ascertain whether a decision made as to the meaning and effect of the statute of 6 Geo. 4, c. 125, s. 55, is applicable to cases which come within the scope of the 388th section of the Merchant Shipping Act (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104). As to the first question, West, the pilot, had two licences, one a waterman's licence, which would be of no avail, and the second a regular licence from the Trinity House authorising him to act as pilot for home trade passenger ships within the limits in which the collision occurred; the consequence is, that he is a duly licensed pilot having charge of the vessel at that time. As to the second question, whether it was compulsory on the Lion to take a pilot, the answer depends on whether this was a passenger ship at the time of the collision; and this their Lordships are of opinion depends upon whether there were any passengers on board the Lion at the time of the collision. The facts cannot be more correctly set forth than as in the judgment of the learned judge in the court below (18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 803): "Having been seven days in London, the captain wrote to his wife and to his father-in-law to come to London and go with him to Hull; he did not write to the owners, or tell their agents in London, or anybody that he was going to take those persons with him; they paid nothing for their living on board the ship, but they paid for their fare, in the circumstances about to be mentioned, 7*s.* 6*d.* each, which he swore positively was the proper second class fare, though Malcolm, the agent for the owners of the Lion, as positively swore afterwards that it was the first-class fare. For this money no receipt was produced, though the captain swore that he had paid it, and Malcolm that he received it. The captain admitted that he had said nothing to either of these persons, previously to their coming on board, as to their payment of fare; that, he said, he arranged during the passage, but after the collision had happened; the father-in-law swore that the first time he ever spoke about his paying was when in Hull, and the ship alongside the quay. The captain admitted, on cross-examination and in answer to the court, that he was aware that he was bound to pay light dues, unless he went in in ballast without passengers on board; that he ought to have told the lighthouse authorities that he had passengers on board, and that he had not done so. He said that he paid the fares to his owners on his arrival in Hull; but Mr. Malcolm said that 'the settlement,' as he called it, was made about the middle of January, and after the correspondence with the Trinity House or the Board of Trade, to which reference was made, and, therefore, to be presumed, after he knew that the pilot had reported that there were no passengers on board. The captain also swore, and in this was confirmed by Malcolm, that his instructions were never to take persons on board without payment as passengers, except with special permission." In this state of things, were the captain's wife and her father passengers? They were on board on the invitation of the captain without the privity of the owners, who had not contracted any obligation to have them carried in the vessel, and no duty was imposed on the owners in relation to these two persons. The meaning of particular words in an Act of Parliament (to use the words of Abbott, C. J., 1 B. & C. 136) "is to be found not so much in a strict etymological propriety of language, nor even in popular use, as in the subject or occasion on which they are used." It is in this sense that the meaning of the word "passengers" is to be here considered, and, so considered, their Lordships are of opinion that the captain's wife and her father were not passengers within the meaning of the clause, as to the employment of pilots, in the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, and the exoneration of owners of ships. If the ship was not carrying passengers she was exempted from the compulsory pilotage by the 379th section of the Merchant Shipping Act. It becomes necessary, therefore, to decide what the position of the owners is when the vessel was in the charge of a duly-licensed pilot whom it was not incumbent on them to employ. The pilot must therefore be considered as having been voluntarily selected by the owners, who are responsible for his default whilst acting as pilot in charge of their ship, unless they can bring their case within the exoneration clause, sect. 388, which enacts that: "No owner or master of any ship shall be answerable to any person whatever for any loss or damage occasioned by the fault or incapacity of any qualified pilot acting in charge of such ship within any district where the employment of such pilot is compulsory by law." In the opinion of their Lordships this case is governed by the decision of the Stettin, Bro. & Lush. 199; 6 L. T. Rep. N. S. 613, the authority of which is recognised by Kelly, C. B. in the case of the General Steam Navigation Company v. British Colonial Steam Navigation Company, 37 L. J. 206, Ex.; 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 357, the ground of which decision is explained by Byles, J., in delivering the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber, 38 L. J. 99, Ex.; 20 L. T. Rep.

Digitized by Google

N. S. 581. The learned judge expounds the 388th section as requiring "that the pilot should be compulsorily employed within the district where the injury occurred," in order to exempt the owners from responsibility for his default. "This," he says, "obviates all the mischief which might be apprehended from captains of ships unnecessarily and improperly employing pilots to escape the responsibilities of navigation, and preserves the sole responsibility of the pilot in the whole district for which he was employed." He adds that their decision does not conflict with the case of the Stettin, where the pilot was taken on board, where and when by law there was no necessity to take him." This explanation will be found to be strictly applicable to the present case. In answer to this it is strongly objected on the other side that the case of Lucey v. Ingram, 6 M. & W. 302, is directly at variance with the case of the Stettin, and that as it was not cited in the case of the Stettin, the authority of that case is consequently thereby weakened. Their Lordships are of opinion that there are two answers to this. In the first place it is to be observed that as the case of Lucey v. Ingram had been under the notice and consideration of Dr. Lushington in several cases before he decided the case of the Stettin, it must be taken to have been present to his mind at that time; but, secondly (and which is more material, as it explains why Dr. Lushington did not think it necessary to refer to that case), upon a close examination it does not appear to have any conclusive bearing upon the case of the Stettin, and, if so, it has not upon the present case. The case of Lucey v. Ingram was decided upon the 6 Geo. 4, c. 125, ss. 55 and 72, and though it was contended in argument that the sections are equivalent, or nearly so, to the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, s. 388, it does not so appear upon a minute examination. The 72nd section of 6 Geo. 4 made it incumbent on the pilot to act, if he were required so to do by the master or owner of any ship wanting a pilot, and the former section, sect. 55, exonerates the owners from responsibility "for any damage which should happen by reason of the neglect, default, or incapacity of any licensed pilot acting in the charge of such ship under or in pursuance of any of the provisions of this Act." This was held to include two cases, first the case where the pilot was bound to act when required; and, secondly, the case where the owners were bound to employ a pilot; and Parke, B., in delivering the judgment, refers to its comprehensive terms as an "extended exemption," and he suggests the probable policy from which this extended exemption arose (see 6 M. & W. 316). That this decision is to be considered as properly to be referred to the special and extended exoneration enacted by the 6 Geo. 4, c. 125, is manifest as well from the judgment delivered by Parke, B. as from the observations of Dr. Lushington in the case of the Agricola (2 W. Rob. 20), and the case of the Eden (2 W. Rob. 446), and per Kelly, C.B. (37 L. J. 205, Ex.; 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 363). It was cited in argument in the case of the Annapolis (Lush Rep. 301 and 304; 4 L. T. Rep. N. S. 417, 419), where Dr. Lushington refers to the ordinary principle of exemption as explained by him in the case of the Maria, 1 W. Rob. 106, and in the Annapolis, and he states this principle to be in strict accordance with that of the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, s. 388 (see Lush. 311, 312; 4 L. T. Rep. N. S. 423, 424). The distinction between the sections in the two statutes when compared is obvious:—"6 Geo. 4, c. 125, s. 55. It is further enacted that no owner or master of any ship or vessel shall be answerable for any loss or damage which shall happen to any person or persons whomsoever from or by reason or means of any neglect, default, incompetency, or incapacity of any licensed pilot acting in the charge of any such ship or vessel under or in pursuance of any of the provisions of this Act, where and so long as such pilot shall be duly qualified to have the charge of such ship or vessel, or where and so long as no duly qualified pilot shall have offered to take charge thereof." "The stat. 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, s. 388, enacts that no owner or master of any ship shall be answerable to any person whatever for any loss or damage occasioned by the fault or incapacity of any qualified pilot acting in charge of such ship within any district where the employment of such pilot is compulsory by law." It is plain, therefore, that the first clause gives immunity to the owner whenever the vessel is in charge of any licensed pilot, where he is qualified to have charge of the vessel, or where no duly qualified pilot has been appointed to take charge thereof; while the second clause, sect. 388, of the Merchant Shipping Act only applies to the case where the employment of the pilot is compulsory by law. Accordingly, contrasting the extended exoneration in 6 Geo. 4, c. 125, s. 55, with the more limited exoneration in 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, s. 388, and the policy suggested by Parke, B., as the ground of the former with that suggested by Byles, J., with reference to the latter, their Lordships are of opinion that the true interpretation of the enactment by which the present case is governed depends on this, whether the employment of the pilot was compulsory, and that it cannot be affected by anything decided in Lucey v. Ingram, and that the authority or soundness of the decision in the case of the Stettin is not in any way prejudiced by the omission to notice the case of Lucey v. Ingram. The 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, s. 388, has been acted on in the case of the Stettin, and has also been clearly expounded in the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber in the case of The General Steam Navigation Company v. British Colonial Steam Navigation Company, and according to the principle of these decisions the owners are not exonerated from responsibility for the default of the pilot whom they have selected and placed in charge of their ship when by law there was no obligation imposed on them to take such pilot and put him in charge. Having come to the conclusion that there were no passengers on board the Lion at the time of the collision, their Lordships are of opinion that the master was not under any compulsion to take a pilot; and, secondly, that having taken a pilot, even assuming that the pilot was bound to act, this does not in such circumstances exonerate the owner from responsibility for the errors committed by the pilot in a case where they were not compellable to take a pilot and put him in charge of the vessel. In the observations their Lordships have made, they have acted on the assumption that West was a duly licensed pilot, and that he had charge of the vessel; but it would be improper to part with this case without calling attention to the fact that West himself swears that he took charge of the ship as a waterman, and not as a pilot. He was not engaged by the captain, but was sent by Charles Roots, another pilot; whether sent by the owners or not does not appear. Their Lordships therefore concur with the learned judge of the Court of Admiralty in opinion that the presence of the captain's wife and her father in the Lion, in the circumstances of the case as detailed in the evidence, did not constitute them passengers; that no act done after the collision could convert them into the character of passengers if they did not previously fill that character; and also that the Lion had not on board of her at the time of the collision a pilot employed by them under compulsion of law; and that the owners of the Lion are liable to pay to the owners of the York Town the damage done to her by the inexcusable collision of the Lion; and their Lordships will therefore humbly advise Her Majesty that the decision of the learned judge of the Court of Admiralty be affirmed, with costs.

Judgment affirmed.

Proctor for the appellants, Thomas Cooper.

Proctor for the respondents, Ellis, Parker, and Clarke.

June 21 and July 5.

(Present: The Right Hon. Lord ROMILLY, M.R., Sir WILLIAM ERLE, and Sir JOSEPH NAPIER.)

The OWNERS of the ship PAULINE CONSTANCE ELEONORE, the OWNERS of the Cargo, and the Master and Crew (apps.) v. The HAMBURGH AMERICAN STEAM PACKET COMPANY, the OWNERS of the steam-vessel GERMANIA (resps.)

THE GERMANIA.

Damage—Collision—Lights, invisible from vessel coming end-on—Proper rate for steamer in the channel—Duty of mutual assistance after a collision—Inspection, as to sufficiency of lights—Look-outs—24 Vict. c. 10, s. 18—25 & 26 Vict. c. 63, ss. 29, 33, sched. table (C.) art. 3, 15.

A collision occurred at night in the English Channel between two foreign vessels, a steamship and a barque, by which the former was slightly and the latter badly damaged. At the time the barque was carrying lights, but these were not seen on board the steamship till after the collision, because, being placed in the mizzen rigging, from their position and the peculiar form and rig of the barque, a vessel coming end-on was unable to see them. In a cause of damage instituted by the owners of the barque against the owners of the steamship:

Held (varying the judgment of the court below), that the damages, losses, and costs, must be borne equally between the two vessels, for; first, the barque was in fault in carrying lights not so placed as to comply with the regulations; and, secondly, the steamship was in fault in going at an improper rate (eleven knots an hour) on a hazy night in a crowded channel; and, after the collision, in pursuing her course without affording or tendering any help to the barque.

An inspection, under the provisions of sect. 18 of the Admiralty Court Act 1861, to ascertain whether the lights carried by a ship were such as the regulations require, ought to be made at night.

There ought to be two look-outs at the bowsprit.

A steamship proceeding at an improper rate in a channel crowded with ships, incurs the responsibility of damage occasioned by her being unable to obey the direction that, on risk of a collision, it is the duty of the steamship to keep out of the way of the sailing vessel.

The first duty of any vessel that by collision injures another, is to wait to ascertain the extent of that injury, and to tender what assistance it may be able to protect life and property.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the High Court of Admiralty, in a cause of damage instituted against the steamship Germania on behalf of the owners of the Dutch barque Pauline Constance Eleonore, of the owners of the cargo laden therein at the time of the collision, and of the master and crew for their private effects, to obtain compensation for the damages sustained in a collision between the two vessels that occurred in the English Channel, off Dungeness, about ten p.m. on the night of April 16, 1868. The Pauline Constance Eleonore was a barque of the burthen of 579 tons register, and was on a voyage from Java to Amsterdam, laden with a cargo of coffee, sugar, and other merchandise.

The Germania was a screw steamship of about 2800 tons register, and was on a voyage from Hamburgh to New York, with cargo, mails, and passengers.

The two vessels were meeting each other on opposite courses. Those on board the barque saw the lights of the Germania at a distance of from two to three miles. Those on board the Germania saw no lights on the barque before the collision. Other material facts are stated in the present judgment.

There was much contradictory evidence as to whether the Pauline Constance Eleonore carried lights at all, and, if she did carry them, whether they were so placed as to be visible to those on board the Germania. In the trial in the court below, a model was put in evidence to show the position of the lamps, the lower sails, the relative breadths of the barque, and the height of the lamps from the poop, and the visibility of the lights depending in a great measure on the accuracy of the model and measurements and the actual position of the lamps, the learned judge for the first time put in force the provisions of sect. 18 of the Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10), and made an order for the inspection of the barque, then lying in Dover Harbour, by the Trinity Masters, accompanied by a viewer and proctor on each side. The Trinity Masters did not see the lamps lighted, having made the survey in the daytime.

Their report gave particulars of measurements and position of the lights, and added that "at a distance of more than 350ft. with masts in line, from a window elevated at least 40ft, although side lights were in their places, they were not visible."

Subsequently the learned judge put further questions to the Trinity Masters, in reply to which they stated that they were "clearly of opinion that the lights so shown on board the barque did not comply with the regulations (b) and (c) of Article 3 (Schedule C to 25 & 26 Vict. c. 63), inasmuch that they did not show an uniform and unbroken light over an arc of the horizon of ten points of the compass, and that they could not show that unbroken light from right ahead to two points abaft the beam. . . . We desire to call attention to the ingenious argument of the Queen's Advocate, that although the side lights of the barque were fixed at a narrow part of the vessel, nevertheless, from a loftier vessel they would have been visible over the broadest part of her. We do not think this to have been an unbroken light from right ahead as required by the regulations, seeing both courses were set, lower rigging and a labyrinth of running gear must intercept the lights, if they could have been seen at all, which we think impossible."

Sir Robert Phillimore, on 15th July 1868, gave judgment determining that proper lights were burning on the barque at the time of the collision, but that (on the report and opinion of the Trinity Masters) these lights were not so placed as to comply with the regulations, and that, therefore, in accordance with the provisions of 25 & 26 Vict. c. 63, s. 29, the barque must be declared to be alone to blame for the collision: (See 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 20.) From this judgment the present appeal was brought.

The provisions of statutes, to which reference was made, are the following:—Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10) s. 18:

Any party in a cause in the High Court of Admiralty shall be at liberty to apply to the said court for an order for the inspection by the Trinity masters, or others appointed for the trial of the said cause, or by the party himself or his witnesses, of any ship, or other personal or real property, the inspection of which may be material to the issue of the cause, and the court may make such an order in respect of the costs arising thereout as to it shall seem fit.

The Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63) s. 29:

If in any case of collision it appears to the court before which the case is tried that such collision was occasioned by the non-observance of any regulation made by or in pursuance of that Act, the ship by which such regulation has been infringed shall be deemed to be in fault, unless it is shown to the satisfaction of the court that the circumstances of the case made a departure from the regulation necessary.

Sect. 33:

In every case of collision between two ships it shall be the duty of the person in charge of each ship, if and so far as he can do so without danger to his own ship and crew, to render to the other ship, her master, crew and passengers (if any), such assistance as may be practicable and as may be necessary in order to save them from any danger caused by the collision. In case he fails so to do, and no reasonable cause for such failure is shown, the collision shall, in the absence of proof to the contrary, be deemed to have been caused by his wrongful act, neglect, or default; and such failure shall also, if proved upon any investigation held under the third or the eighth part of the principal Act, be deemed to be an act of misconduct, or a default for which his certificate, if any, may be cancelled or suspended.

Sects. 57 & 58 as to when foreign ships are subject to regulations in Table (C.) in the schedule to the Act.

Schedule, Table (C.), articles 3 and 15.

The Solicitor-General (Sir J. D. Coleridge, Q. C.), Sir J. B. Karslake, Q. C., the Queen's Advocate (Sir Travers Twiss, Q. C.), and Dr. Spinks, Q. C., were for the appellants.

Dr. Deane, Q. C., Butt, Q. C., and Pritchard were for the respondents.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 5.—Judgment was delivered by Lord ROMILLY, M.R.—This is an appeal from the High Court of Admiralty on behalf of the owner, master, and crew of the barque Pauline Constance Eleonore, and of the owner of the cargo and private effects contained therein, for the loss sustained by a collision with the steamship Germania, off Dungeness, at ten o'clock on the night of the 16th April 1868. The Court of Admiralty has determined that the barque was wholly in the wrong, dismissed the defendants from the case, and condemned the plaintiffs in costs. The barque was a Dutch vessel, 579 tons register, proceeding from Java to Amsterdam; she was steering east by north, making about six knots an hour; the wind was moderate from north-north-west. The Germania was a screw steamer of 2800 tons. She was not under sail, and was proceeding from Hamburgh, bound to New York. She had a crew of 135 persons, with a large number of passengers. The Germania sighted the barque about two minutes before the collision. She ported her helm, and the barque struck her on the port side midships obliquely, with her stem and and port bow. The damage done to the Germania was very slight, that done to the barque was very great. The barque obtained assistance from a steam-tug and two boats' crews, and was only saved from sinking by being run ashore at Hythe. The Germania neither afforded nor tendered any assistance, but pursued her course without once abating her speed. In the court below it was held that the barque was wholly in the wrong, by reason of her lights being placed in such a situation that they were not seen on board the steamship. The appellants insist that there could have been no sufficient lookout on board the Germania, and that if there had been, the lights of the barque must have been visible before the collision. The evidence is distinct that the lights on board the barque were burning bright, and were visible to vessels passing her; this is distinctly proved by Laming, the master of the lugger Alma, who spoke her at half-past nine, p.m., before the collision, as well as by Middleton and the crew on board the vessel; we agree with the judge of the Admiralty Court that this fact is clearly proved. The lamps, however, were placed in the mizzen-rigging, but from their position and the peculiar form of the barque, a vessel coming end on would be unable to see them; this is established by the report of the Trinity Masters, who went down to the dock where she was lying to examine her, and who reported that at a distance of more than 350 feet, with masts in line from a window elevated at least 40 feet, although the side lights were in their places, they were not visible. Their Lordships are not quite satisfied with this report; they think that the examination, in order to be perfectly fair, ought to have been at night: and they regret that the Trinity Masters did not also, by going one or two points to one side, have ascertained whether the light on that side was visible. This is the more material because the two vessels were not coming end-on—the Germania was steering due west, the barque was steering east-by-north. It is quite certain that, assuming the lights to be burning, they would, even as placed, be visible from a vessel steering four or five points on either side of the exactly opposite course which the barque was taking. The exact deviation at which the lights would be visible is not to be ascertained from the report of the Trinity Masters. Their Lordships consider this an omission which is to be regretted; they, however concur with the learned judge in the opinion expressed by him, that the lights of the barque, though burning, were not so placed as they ought to have been, to have enabled a vessel coming end on to see them, and that consequently the barque must be considered to have by this defect to some extent occasioned the collision. The evidence of what occurred on board the Germania, so far as their Lordships consider it necessary to refer to it, is to this effect:—The look-out on board the Germania consisted of this, viz: "one on the look-out at the bowsprit, another one on the look-out on the bridge." The chief officer, and also the pilot, but who had not charge of the vessel, were also on the bridge. Their Lordships are informed by the naval assessors who assist them that it is the usual practice in king's ships to have never less than two look-outs at the bowsprit, and their Lordships are not satisfied with the sufficiency of the reason alleged for having only one of these look-outs in the present case. The evidence of the chief officer is to this effect. The first report was from the look-out man, who reported ship right a-head, the officer of the watch saw something a-head, and ported the helm directly. He says that the time taken was about a minute from the time when he first saw her to the time when the collision took place. The evidence of the pilot, who was on the bridge at the time, is to be taken with great allowance, as it appears that he had on the previous day met with an accident which had affected his head, and had evidently for the time to some extent impaired his memory; accordingly, his evidence is contradictory, and by no means so distinct as to these matters as that of the chief officer. In the first place, he had not noticed anyone on the bridge besides the chief officer and himself. In the next place, he states that the Germania was steering west-by-north, or west-half-north, which, if correct, would make a greater deviation from coming end on. He fixes the time at two minutes, or a minute and a-half from the time when the vessel was first seen at the time of the collision. He states that he saw the barque before anyone else, and then contradicts that statement. In fact their Lordships are of opinion that, under the circumstances of this case, his evidence must be, when it contradicts the evidence of the chief officer, to a great extent disregarded.

Digitized by Google

The evidence of Jenson, the look-out man, does not entirely agree with that of the chief officer. The chief officer states, that the look-out man cried, "a ship right ahead;" he is cross-examined as to whether he did not say "a light right ahead;" he does not remember to have heard it. The lookout man says, he cried out after, "the ship right ahead, she shows no light." Gilling, who was on the bridge at the time of the collision, on the port side, heard the look-out man twice report the barque as "a sail right ahead," but says nothing about the word "lights" being used. Lohse, the sailmaker, confirms the look-out man that he said "she shows no light." It is not necessary to go through the rest of the evidence on the part of the Germania, which all goes to the question of whether the barque did or did not carry lights, because their Lordships consider that question quite settled; that the barque did carry lights, and that they were not seen on board the Germania till after the collision, when the red light was seen. This the witnesses on board the Germania state they saw moving, but which their Lordships believe to have been an error on the part of the witnesses, and that what they saw was the red light of the barque on port side. The night was dark and hazy, and the Germania in a channel crowded with vessels was proceeding at eleven knots an hour, the vessels were approaching at the rate of about twenty miles an hour, that is a mile in every three minutes. Their Lordships are of opinion that if a steamship proceeds at such a rate at such a time, and in such a place, she incurs the responsibility of the damage which is necessarily occasioned by her being unable to obey the direction, which is her first duty viz., that it is for the steamboat to get out of the way of the sailing vessel: (see 25 & 26 Vict. c. 63, sched. C. art. 15.) How far the lights on board the barque could have been discerned on a dark hazy night, when the fog was clearing off, their Lordships have not the means of ascertaining; but according to the evidence on board the barque, the lights of the Germania were not discerned before she was as near as two miles or two miles and a half. The Germania seems to have treated the whole matter with the most perfect indifference; she neither slackened her speed, nor took any other step in the matter, except to port her helm. She made no inquiry as to the state of the other vessel, but ran on her course without affording the slightest assistance to a vessel obviously very seriously injured by the collision which had just taken place. With respect to English vessels it is established by the regulations (see 25 & 26 Vict. c. 63, s. 33) that a vessel pursuing this course is liable to all the damage produced by the collision, and their Lordships cannot but consider that it is a matter to be gravely reprehended in any case. Whether the persons in charge of the Germania supposed that by proceeding at once on their voyage they could escape all consequences, it is impossible to surmise; but the first duty of any vessel that by collision injures another is to wait to ascertain the extent of that injury, and to tender what assistance it may be able to protect life and property. Their Lordships, therefore, find it impossible to exonerate the Germania from all participation in the cause of the collision, and shall humbly advise Her Majesty that the damages, and losses, and costs ought to be borne equally between the two vessels.

Judgment varied.

Proctors for the appellants, Dykes and Stokes.

Proctors for the respondents, J. R. and G. Burchett.

Equity Courts.

COURT OF APPEAL IN CHANCERY.

Reported by THOMAS BROOKSBANK and E. STEWART ROCKE, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Friday, July 9.

(Before Lord Justice GIFFARD.)

Re THE UNION CEMENT AND BRICK COMPANY (LIMITED.)

Company—Winding-up—Discharge of solicitor—Costs unpaid—Lien—Order 11th Nov. 1862, Rule 58.

Where an official liquidator is appointed by the Court in a winding-up, the 58th rule of the General Order of the 11th Nov. 1862, which requires that the file of proceedings "shall be kept by him, or otherwise as the judge may, from time to time, direct," must be considered part of his appointment, and a solicitor acting for him must be taken to know the extent of his powers over such file. And no official liquidator can by contract or otherwise give any lien upon documents which come within that rule.

Where, therefore, a solicitor was discharged by the official liquidator, he was ordered to deliver up all the documents mentioned in the 58th rule, notwithstanding that there was due to him a considerable amount of costs incurred in the winding-up.

This was an appeal by Mr. Pulbrook who from the commencement of the winding-up until February last, had acted as the solicitor for the official liquidator, but had been at the last-mentioned date discharged by him, against an order of Stuart V.C. directing him to deliver up to the official liquidator all the documents constituting the file of proceedings in the winding-up, notwithstanding that there was due to Mr. Pulbrook, for his costs in the winding-up, a sum of nearly 200*l*, in respect of which his bill had been some time back delivered.

The hearing before the Vice-Chancellor and his Honour's judgment are reported in 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 649, and it is unnecessary here to restate the facts.

Greene, Q. C., and Brooksbank, for the appeal, contended that the relationship of solicitor and client existed between the parties, and that the solicitor was therefore entitled to the ordinary lien. The Companies Act 1862, in no way interfered with that right, and the only sections having any reference to delivery or production of papers and documents were the 100th and 115th. They referred to

Paine and Leyton's case, L. Rep. 4 Ch. App. 215;
In re Cameron's Coalbrook &c., Railway Company, 25 Beav. 1;
Potter's case, De. G. & Sm. 728; Weymouth v. Knipe, 3 Bing. N. C. 387; and in the analogous right of the solicitor of an assignee in bankruptcy;
Ex parte Underwood, 1 De. G. Cas. in Bank. 199;
Lambert v. Buckmaster, 2 Barn. & Cr. 616;

The papers were claimed under the 58th Rule of the General Order of 11th Nov. 1862, but that order was made under the powers given by the 170th section of the Act, and if it destroyed the solicitor's lien it was an order ultra vires.

Dickinson, Q. C. and Everitt, for the official liquidator, were not called on.

Lord Justice GIFFARD said: The only question I have to determine on this appeal is, whether the order of the Vice-Chancellor is, upon the face of it, right or not. Well now, that order was obtained by the official liquidator of this company, who was appointed by the court, and it was obtained by him against Mr. Pulbrook, he having discharged Mr.

Digitized by Google

Pulbrook from being the solicitor in the winding-up, and the order was in these terms: "That the said Anthony Pulbrook do, within four days after service on him of a copy of this order, deliver upon oath to the said official liquidator the file of proceedings in this matter, and all orders, exhibits, admissions, memorandums, and office copies of affidavits, examinations, depositions, and certificates, and all other documents relating to the winding-up of the above-named company, in the possession, custody, or control of him, the said Anthony Pulbrook, and which are required by the rules and orders of this honourable court to be kept on the said file of proceedings." It is manifest, therefore, that the production is confined to the documents included in the 58th rule, and that the production does not extend beyond those documents. Well, whatever the 170th section of the Act may or may not authorise, I am clearly of opinion that, where an official liquidator is appointed by the court, this 58th rule must be considered part and parcel of his appointment. Well, the 58th rule is this: "All orders, exhibits, admissions, memorandums, and office copies of affidavits, examinations, depositions, and certificates, and all other documents relating to the winding-up of any company, shall be filed by the official liquidator as far as may be in one continuous file, and such file shall be kept by him or otherwise, as the judge may from time to time direct." Therefore, any solicitor who acts for an official liquidator, must know what the extent of his powers is with reference to these documents; that his powers do not at all exceed his duties, and that he shall deal with these documents simply as the judge shall direct. Then when we come to the solicitor's lien, it is this: He can have no greater right than the client for whom he acts; and if a client for whom he acts has no lien, he can have no lien. On these grounds, I am clearly of opinion that no official liquidator can, by contract or otherwise, give any lien on documents coming within the 58th rule, because the 58th rule says "You are to keep them or as the judge may direct." That being so, I am of opinion that Mr. Pulbrook has no lien on those documents, any more than a solicitor for an ordinary client from whom he might have happened to have obtained deeds which that client had no right to give to him. On these grounds, I am clearly of opinion that the order of the Vice-Chancellor was right, and that this appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Solicitor for the appellant, Pulbrook in person.

Solicitor for the official liquidator, Seale.

V. C. MALINS' COURT.

Reported by G. T. EDWARDS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

April 24 and May 31.

Re THE CORK AND YOUGHAL RAILWAY COMPANY, ex parte OVEREND, GURNEY, AND COMPANY, AND THE LONDON AND HAMBURGH AND CONTINENTAL EXCHANGE BANK.

Railway company—Exhaustion of capital and borrowing powers—Money advanced on bonds, and used for the undertaking.

A railway company having expended its whole capital and exhausted its borrowing powers, and given bills of exchange to contractors and tradesmen, issued bonds to a director and shareholder, who advanced money, whereby the railway was completed. A special Act was passed to wind-up the company, and sell it to another company; and that arrangement having been carried out, land owners settled with, and every liability discharged except that on the bonds, the balance of the purchase-money was brought into court in the winding-up. Claims being made by the bondholders:

Held, that the bonds were recoverable in equity, and the shareholders being cognizant of the whole transaction, and standing by, the claims must be allowed.

These were claims in the winding-up of this company (under a Special Act passed for that purpose), the first of which was by those representing the old firm of Overend, Gurney, and Company in respect of 191,000*l.* and interest secured by certain bonds issued by the railway company to David Leopold Lewis (now deceased), who was a director and shareholder in the company, and by him transferred to trustees for Overend, Gurney, and Company. The company was formed under four Acts of Parliament, being empowered to raise 365,000*l.* by shares and 131,000*l.* on mortgage and by debentures. The whole of these sums were raised and borrowed, and further powers were obtained, but were still insufficient to complete the railway, and in 1858 every source of means was exhausted, and the railway was still incomplete, in which condition it was useless. Under these circumstances application was made to David Leopold Lewis to assist the company, who were in the habit of giving bills of exchange to contractors, which they were now unable to pay, and David Leopold Lewis raised money on the bills, and other bills were given to tradesmen and others, and old ones retired. So matters continued until 1862, when the transaction occurred on which these claims were founded. A balance-sheet was then made out, showing the excess expenditure of 109,520*l.* 14*s.* 10*d.*, and this, with an account of the plant, materials, &c., was sent round to the shareholders prior to the meeting in August, by which it appeared that the company was indebted to David Leopold Lewis in certain sums expended on rolling stock for construction of the line, &c., and which, it was stated, had been applied for that purpose, and on the 18th Sept. a resolution was passed to issue bonds, some of which were now represented by those on which the claims were made.

On the first issue the amount was 165,000*l.*, made up of 120,000*l.*, 15,000*l.*, and 30,000*l.*, the whole of which were returned by the obligee, and were renewed by others from time to time. The bonds were all in this form, the following being a copy of one:

No. 298. 1000*l.*

Know all men by these presents that we, the Cork and Youghal Railway Company, are held firmly bound unto David Leopold Lewis, in the sum of 1000*l.*, to be paid to the said David Leopold Lewis, or his certain attorney, executors, administrators, or assigns, on the 30th Oct. 1864, with lawful interest thereon at 5*l.* per cent. per annum from the date hereof, until payment; for which payment we hereby bind ourselves and our successors, this 13th Oct. 1863, whereas the above boundsn company is justly and truly indebted to the above named David Leopold Lewis in the sum of 1000*l.* for mortgage debts and goods and materials supplied to the said company for the purposes of the undertaking, by the means, procurement, and at the cost of the said David Leopold Lewis, and at the request of the said company, as they hereby acknowledge. And whereas the said David Leopold Lewis hath applied to the said company for payment of the said sum of money, but hath at the request of the said company agreed to forbear payment of that sum until the 13th Oct. 1864, on the said company becoming bound by this obligation for securing payment of the said principal sum on the day last aforesaid, and interest thereon as aforesaid. Now, therefore, the condition of this obligation is such that if the said Cork and Youghal Railway Company, their successors, or assigns, do and shall pay to the said David Leopold Lewis, his executors, administrators, or assigns, the said sum of 1000*l.* on or before the said 13th Oct. 1864, and do and shall pay interest thereon at the rate of 5*l.* per cent. per annum until payment, such interest to be paid half-yearly, the first payment to be made at the expiration of six calendar months from the date hereof, and for every fraction of a half year, to be paid on the day of payment of the said principal sum, then the above obligation to be void, otherwise to remain in full force and effect.

Given under the common seal of the said company this 13th Oct. 1863.

—Registered. CUSACK P. ROBEY, Chairman.

Digitized by Google

The circular sent to all the shareholders included a notice that the meeting was called to consider matters of finance, and the report of the directors was sent to each shareholder by post, and there was no contradiction of that fact, or attempt to show that it was not so. The resolution was adopted at the general meeting, the terms being, that "inasmuch as the board of directors had received moneys from the said David Leopold Lewis to enable them to pay for the land, rolling stock, construction of the line from Cork to Youghal and Queenstown, and that such sums had been applied for that purpose, it was resolved," &c. The Cork and Youghal Act passed in 1846, and the company obtained various other Acts subsequently varying the capital and extending the powers of the directors, the last Act in 1863 authorising a branch to Youghal and Queenstown, when the company became the Cork and Youghal Railway Company. The 109,520*l.* 14*s.* 10*d.* having been thus expended in excess, in 1866 an Act was obtained specially for the winding-up of the affairs, the dissolution of the company, and for other purposes. This Act recited the various former Acts of Parliament, and that by the Act of 1863 there was a provision for the conversion of perpetual into ordinary capital, and for the transfer of the railway to the Great Western and Southern Railway of Ireland. That whereas the company might have incurred debts beyond their mortgage debts, that they had not the means of paying, it would be extremely advantageous to the public that the undertaking should be sold to the Great Western and Southern Railway Company of Ireland, and that it was desirable that the affairs should be wound-up. That the purchase-money so to be paid was to be 310,000*l.*, and that the Great Western and Southern Railway Company were willing to purchase. The Act then specified the claims on the company of creditors, whose claims were alleged to be valid, and it was expedient that the question of their validity should be considered, and there was power given to sell the undertaking and works. Under this Act the railway was sold and the money received, landowners settled with, and the debenture holders paid, and every claim satisfied except that of the bondholders; and there was 180,000*l.* now in court. In this state of things the question was whether the shareholders could successfully refuse to recognise any obligation under the bonds, on the ground that the borrowing powers were exhausted, and that the giving the bonds was, under the circumstances, ultra vires?

The purchase-money, 310,000*l.*, was applicable under the Act, first to pay the costs of the Act; and secondly, to compound with creditors. The winding-up having been conducted under the direction of the court (by virtue of a clause in the Act which made all the provisions of the Companies Act 1862 applicable, except as to voluntary winding-up, and provided that the Court of Chancery in England should have full jurisdiction, and that the winding-up should commence in Jan. 1866) by orders in chambers, such application of the purchase-moneys had been sanctioned, and both landowners and other creditors settled with as above mentioned. The 12th section of the Act related to the application of the proceeds of the sale, and concluded in these words: "Subject to all the rights, equities, claims, and demands, whether of preference or ordinary shareholders and bondholders, to which the property of the company would be subject, in case this Act had not passed, and shall be applied accordingly." What took place in the inception was this: 365,000*l.* was raised by shares, and 131,000*l.* by borrowing, making 496,000*l.*; and in June 1862 the whole of that money was exhausted, being spent on that undertaking, the railway being unfinished; the money now partly represented by the present claims was obtained upon the bonds, and they had been discounted partly by Overend, Gurney, and Company, and were partly in the hands of the Hamburgh Bank, distinct claims being made on behalf of both firms.

Roxburgh, Q.C. and Lindley, for the representatives of Overend, Gurney, and Co.—Under the circumstances, every shareholder must have known or be taken to have known every part of this transaction; in fact, they did know it, and did not pretend that they did not, and could they now be heard to say that which they sanctioned and acquiesced in, and benefited by (inasmuch as the completion of the railway had enabled the company to sell, and the purchase-money had enabled them to pay), was ultra vires, and that the person who enabled the company to do all this should not be paid. The form of the resolution was alone sufficient, the language was that the board of directors should be authorised to issue bonds, and give them to David Leopold Lewis, "as security for the debt so due to him." There was no case which held such a security void. From 1862 until the sale of the railway Mr. Lewis drew cheques on his own bankers, and all the money to meet the liabilities of the company was found by him alone. The transfer of the bonds was simply from David Leopold Lewis to A. B. (stating the numbers of the bonds), the words being "for securing, &c., all my right and interest, &c.," and the interest was paid to the holder from time to time as it became due. Suppose there was no borrowing power, there is no authority for saying that a company cannot, under its seal, admit a debt to be due for work and labour done and goods or materials supplied, in the nature of an account stated, between the company and a creditor; and that amounted to an admission of the debt. It was, therefore, competent to give a bond, which, according to the decisions at law, if for present advance of money, is good, if it is a security for a debt due from the company at the time. In equity the holder is entitled to a claim on the bonds. But supposing it was not so, the claim was good in respect of this equity. The money which was in court was produced by the sale of an article for which the bondholder had paid, and to the extent of that payment such holder was entitled in equity and honesty to be repaid; otherwise there would be a right to keep the money and the article. This was consonant with the decisions. Re the German Mining Company, ex parte Chippendale, 4 De G. M. & G. 29, where there was no power to borrow, but the mine being in active operation, it was held at law that the directors could not recover money obtained for the mine; but in equity that they were entitled to stand as creditors. Re The Electric Telegraph Company of Ireland; Troop's case, 29 Beav. 353, where the other case was followed.

Hoare's case, 30 Beav. 225;
Re The Magdalena Steam Navigation Company Johns, 690.

Cotton, Q.C. and Graham Hastings, for the Hamburgh Bank, insisted that this was a parallel case to that of an infant or married woman who could contract: (Vaughan v. Vanderstegan, 2 Drew 165.) A bond or charge or mortgage on the undertaking to meet its liability was valid.

The Royal British Bank v. Turquand, 5 Ell. & Bl. 248, 259.
The South Essex Gas and Coke Company; Hewlett's case, 2 J. & H. 306, 313.

J. Pearson, Q.C. and Waller, for the official liquidator, representing creditors to the amount of 225,000*l.*—So far as the creditors are concerned, it must be assumed that the company has not exceeded its powers; but the directors, although having general powers, had no power to issue bonds, indeed they were actually forbidden so to do. There was also this important distinction between the creditors and bondholders, viz., that the latter could not recover at law, whereas of course the creditors could.

The Worcester Corn Exchange Company, 3 De G. M. & G. 180;
The German Mining Company (sup.);
Hoare's case (sup.);
Chambers v. The Manchester, &c., Railway Company, 5 B. & Sm. 588; 10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 715;
Bryon v. The Metropolitan Saloon Omnibus Company, 3 De G. & J. 123;
Royal British Bank v. Turquand (sup.)

Jessel, Q.C. and Higgins, for the preference shareholders, contended that in fact this money was raised by bills previously to the passing of the resolution, although the bonds might have been issued after. The question was whether under the Lands Clauses Act the general power of procuring advances on security applied to individuals as well as to a company under that statute. The request to pay was not valid; a railway company could not request a third person to pay its debts and so create a liability against the company, that person knowing that they could not do it. It would be repealing the whole of the Acts of Parliament if there was in this way an unlimited power of borrowing. If there was a power of borrowing no money could be borrowed beyond that without Act of Parliament. The German Mining Company's case was quite distinct from this, and there it was held at law that there was no such power. The Magdalena Steam Company's case (sup.) proceeded on acquiescence. It was clear that any of the shareholders could have said that no more money should be spent, and have filed a bill against the directors.

Hewlett's case, 2 J. &. H. 230;
Bateman v. The Mid-Wales Railway Company, L. Rep. 1 C. P. 499;
Caledonian and Dumbartonshire Railway Company v. The Helensburgh Harbour Trustees, 4 W. R. 671;
The Peruvian Railway Company, L. Rep. 2 Ch. App. 617; 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 315.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR (after stating the facts).—The question upon this summons is, whether the fund in court is to go to the shareholders or to the person who advanced money for the purpose of completing the railway and works. There is a recital in the Act of 1863, that "whereas the company might have incurred debts beyond their mortgage debts, that they had not the means of paying;" and that evidently contemplates that possibility, and the Legislature therefore contemplated that these debts should be beyond the amount of the capital and borrowing powers, and there is a recital of the advantage accruing to the public by the sale of the undertaking to the Great Western and Southern Railway Company of Ireland, and the desire to wind-up the affairs. The 12th section is that upon which the whole question mainly, if not entirely, depends. By orders in chambers, every demand has been satisfied except that now in question. The words of this clause are very important. They are these: "Subject to all the rights equities, claims, and demands, whether of preference or ordinary shareholders, bondholders, to which the property of the company would be subject, in case this Act had not been passed, and shall be applied accordingly." The result was that 365,000*l.* was raised by shares, and 131,000*l.* by borrowing, making 496,000*l.*, and it is the common case that in June 1862 the whole of that money was exhausted, being spent on the undertaking. There is no suggestion of any impropriety; the company was in possession of an unfinished railway, which everyone's experience knows to be one of the most useless and unprofitable things which can be imagined. No doubt, as Mr. Jessel and Mr. Higgins argued, the shareholders might have said: "We will have no more money spent, and rather than make the railway useful and profitable it shall remain useless and unprofitable;" and if they had filed a bill on that footing it might have succeeded. But, as every shareholder has paid up in full, the Legislature having constituted it a limited company, and no more could be called, no man could be found insane enough to institute such a suit, rather than acquiesce in obtaining some further capital, and so rendering that profitable which was otherwise a public nuisance. It is not surprising that no such attempt was made; but it is a matter of wonder that the principles of common sense were not applied to the case with at least the hope of profit. What sort of justice would it be to say that as between those whose money was supplied to complete the works, and was so applied, and those who acquiesced in the importance of that step when the question was who should take possession of the proceeds, that such proceeds shall go to the shareholders and not to the creditors? I am bound to assume that the shareholders knew something of their own affairs, and if they do not they are bound to do so; and I cannot listen to those who allow matters to go on, stand by and take no part or sufficient interest in the matter to inquire whether the capital is exhausted or not, if they say they are ignorant. I am, however, happy to find that not a single shareholder makes any affidavit saying he was not perfectly aware of what was going on. I assume, therefore, that every shareholder knew that the capital had been exhausted in 1862; and it appears by the evidence of the secretary that from 1859 to 1865 David Leopold Lewis, and the Hamburgh Bank, and others standing in the same position as Lewis, furnished funds to the company, which were applied by them to complete the undertaking, and paid to contractors, landowners, for rolling stock, debts, materials, and interest on the mortgages issued by the company, and for salaries and necessary expenses. When the case was opened I pressed counsel to tell me whether there was any contest as to the money being expended for the benefit of the company; and they very properly agreed to an admission that it was so expended. I was then strongly impressed in favour of the principle acted upon in The German Mining Company (sup.), that, although a company had no power to borrow further, and there was no remedy at law if they did, it was not the doctrine of a court of equity to allow shareholders to take possession of the property of the company without fulfilling their obligations. The question then being discussed on that admission of counsel, 191,000*l.* being claimed, and 180,000*l.* in court, it does not follow that the whole of that sum was so expended. Mr. Pearson for the general creditors treated their debts as 25,000*l.*; Mr. Roxburgh and Mr. Lindley, for Overend, Gurney, and Co., the transferees of some of the bonds, and Mr. Cotton and Mr. Graham Hastings for the Hamburgh Bank, representing other bondholders; if Mr. Pearson can exclude the bonds that will be sufficient for him. But the main contest is between the shareholders, the members of the company authorised by Act of Parliament to raise a capital of 496,000*l.* nearly exhausted in 1862; and the bondholders, it being said that there was no power to bind them (the shareholders) for anything more. In support of this contention, the case of Chambers v. The Manchester, &c., Railway Company, 10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 715, was cited. Before I refer to that case let me ask what sort of equity or justice would it be to say that shareholders who in 1862 knew that the capital was exhausted, and the railway being completed with money supplied somehow, and who stood by and saw the concern thus turned into a profit, and sold under an Act of Parliament, were entitled to come and take possession of the whole proceeds? A court of equity does, and I hope always will, support principles of honesty and integrity; but to hand this money over to the shareholders, and leave the creditors unpaid, is a proposition so repugnant to principles of propriety that, if no authority had been found on the subject, I should myself have come to the conclusion that such a proposition was wholly unsustainable. The shareholders must be taken to have had notice of what took place, and, therefore, in fact, to have authorised the issuing of the bonds, as much as if every shareholder was present at the meeting when the accounts were explained and stated, and, therefore, they cannot be allowed to stay away and ignore what took place. The object of the meeting was specially stated in the circular, and everything appeared at the meeting, namely, that the money was obtained from Mr. Lewis, what it was expended for, that the bonds were to be issued, settled by counsel, as a temporary loan of 165,000*l.*, and the liabilities also were stated. Subsequent meetings took place, the debt always increasing until it reached 195,000*l.*, and then came the act to wind up the affairs and sell; under these circumstances, the creditors must be paid in full. Now, there is a material difference between cases at law and in equity. In the German Mining Company money was supplied to the company after the capital was exhausted, and it was decided at law that the amount could not be recovered; but it was decided by this court that every part was recoverable in equity against the shareholders. But in the case of Chambers v. The Manchester and Milford Railway Company the question was as to the excess expenditure, and a court of law only considered the question of the borrowing powers, and those powers being exhausted, it was decided that the amount could not be recovered in an action; but even there, as in the German Mining case, and in Troop's and Hoare's cases before the common law judges and the Master of the Rolls, it must have been apparent how monstrous an injustice it was; and Blackburn, J. said, "If the plaintiff is dissatisfied he must go to a court of equity;" assuming, therefore, that although there was no remedy at law there was in equity. The only other case is the Worcester Corn Exchange case, 3 De G. M. & G., 160, which was the case of a limited company; and I agree with the observations of Mr. Roxburgh hat there is no difference between the cases of companies, considered with reference to a particular or this general Act, the provisions of which apply while they remain unaltered. In the Worcester Corn Exchange case there was a call of 5*l.*, and the master (it is an old case) authorised an additional one of 5*l.*; and it was ordered that the members of the limited company who were liable only for 5*l.* should be liable for the other 5*l.* also; and it was asked here that the shareholders should be made personally to pay the money. I should have thought them liable, although, no doubt, Lord Cranworth thought the call unsustainable, and discharged it. In favour of it, counsel very properly relied on the German Mining case, where Lord Justice Knight-Bruce (then V.C.) sent the case to law, where the claim failed, and the directors paid it themselves; but afterwards, claiming it against the shareholders, the result was that every farthing was allowed against the company, which, being unlimited, it was, in fact, against the shareholders, and a call was made upon them to pay personally. Some passages in the judgment are peculiarly applicable to this case. [The Vice-Chancellor read passages from the judgment.] His Lordship there said that they had the benefit of the expenditure. They have it here. That was followed by two cases relied upon, Troop's case and Hoare's case, which may be considered identical with the present. Mr. Jessel felt the pressure of Troop's case, and boldly said it was contrary to law. I have considered his argument, and I am of opinion that it is not only consonant with principles of justice, but with the law of this court. It was a case in which the company had exhausted its means, and borrowed money which was applied for the benefit of the company, and the question was whether the persons supplying the money were creditors. The Master of the Rolls held that being laid out bona fide for the benefit of the company, and so spent, the party advancing it was entitled to be paid. That is quite applicable to this case, Hoare's case was a mere repetition of it, and the Magdalena Steam Navigation Company's case, before Lord Hatherley (when Vice-Chancellor) was, if possible, a stronger case still (Johns, 690, 694.) [The Vice-Chancellor read portions of the judgment.] The expressions of his Lordship refer to the very argument here used, and I say that where the shareholders had an opportunity of ascertaining the facts, and have taken the benefit of an irregular loan (which no doubt this was) it would be contrary to public morality, and the doctrines of this court to turn round and insist on that irregularity to get possession of the money which ought to go to the creditors. I do not suppose that the shareholders mean to act dishonestly, and I feel sure, if personally present they would not sanction it, but I suppose it could not be given up without argument. One other case (Hewlett's case, sup.) was precisely the same, where Turner, L. J. held that no shareholder could take possession of the property of the company without discharging such an obligation. Without, therefore, going into the question as to a joint-stock company being competent to bind themselves to pay bills of exchange, I decide this case on far higher grounds of equity, and I am of opinion that David Leopold Lewis having advanced money which has been expended, as it is properly admitted, for the benefit of the company, he must be paid out of the fund in court before anything can be paid to the shareholders.

Solicitors for Overend, Gurney, and Co., Young, Jones, and Co.

Solicitors for the official liquidator, Stevens, Wilkinson, Harries, and Co.

Solicitor for the preference shareholders, A. Jones.

Solicitors for the Hamburgh Bank, Deane and Chubb.

June 29 and 30.

RAMSHIRE v. BOLTON.

Practice—Jurisdiction—Demurrer—Obtaining money on false representations.

B. told R. that he was going to advance money to two persons on the security of a bill at three months, and represented them to be perfectly solvent and the bill a good security, knowing at the time that they were insolvent, and that the bill would be dishonoured, which it was. R. having advanced money on the faith of such representations, filed a bill alleging that he was induced to advance it on representations made by B., which he knew to be untrue, the transaction being part of a scheme to apply, as he had applied, the money for purposes of his own. A general demurrer to this bill overruled, on the ground that, although there was a legal remedy, there was concurrent jurisdiction in equity.

This was a general demurrer for want of equity to a bill filed to recover a sum of 237*l.* alleged to have been obtained from the plaintiff under false representations. The bill stated that in July 1867 the plaintiff, who was secretary of the Union Club, was introduced to the defendant by a wine merchant, being previously unacquainted with him, but having been informed that he was formerly a serjeant in the marines, and then secretary and manager of the Alexandra Hotel. That he had a family and was of expensive habits, and having little or no means of his own, in fact advanced nothing upon the bill of exchange after mentioned; that early in 1868 he called upon and showed the plaintiff a cheque for 1000*l.* from which, and from his spending money freely, the plaintiff might reasonably infer that he was a man with money at his command. That in 1868 the defendant hinted at borrowing 200*l.* or 300*l.* of the plaintiff, which he avoided doing, doubting his means; but up to the transaction thereafter mentioned, he had not any reason to believe that he would mislead him by misrepresentations as the plaintiff charged he afterwards did. That the defendant often introduced himself to, and became the companion of, persons staying at the hotel, and in 1867 and 1868 General Ripley and the Honourable F. Lawley, who had been in the Confederate States during the war, were staying there; that the defendant made their acquaintance, they being quite unknown to the plaintiff, having only met General Ripley in the defendant's company; that the plaintiff knew nothing of them and was ignorant that (as he since discovered) they were men of no means, but he was induced by the defendant to believe the contrary, and under this belief advanced the money thereinafter mentioned.

Digitized by Google

The bill then stated that in Sept. 1868 the plaintiff and defendant were at Margate, and the defendant, representing that he was about to advance money to Ripley and Lawley on security of a bill for 500*l.* at three months, drawn by Ripley and accepted by Lawley, he asked the plaintiff to find half the money; that the plaintiff hesitated, but the defendant said he had had similar transactions with them, which turned out all right, and that they were safe and responsible persons of ample means, and stated that Ripley was possessed of considerable property, and Lawley had had a legacy of a large amount left him, and, showing him the death of a person in the Illustrated News, represented that such person had left the legacy. That the plaintiff believed the statements, and that it was a bonâ fide advance, and gave a cheque on the Union Bank for 237*l.* 10*s.* (being half 500*l.* less interest) to the defendant on his order, and the defendant represented that he would apply it to advance it to Ripley and Lawley, and showed the plaintiff a bill for 500*l.*, dated the 9th Sept. 1868, purporting to be drawn by Ripley and accepted by Lawley at three months, the plaintiff being unacquainted with the signatures of either, and the defendant gave the plaintiff the following memorandum:

Margate, 15th Sept. 1868.

I acknowledge to hold in my possession an acceptance of the Honourable F. Lawley, one half of which belongs to Mr. James Ramshire and the other half to myself.

GEO. BOLTON.

That the cheque was duly paid, and the plaintiff, knowing nothing of the circumstances under which the bill was given beyond what was represented to him by the defendant, had never seen it since. That on the 8th Dec. 1868, the defendant wrote to say that in order to be prepared for the bill not being met he had handed it to his solicitor to arrange for an innocent holder to sue, and so keep their names clear. That the plaintiff replied, "Take any steps you think proper to recover the money," relying on the defendant's good faith, and believing it better not to interfere. That on the 15th the defendant informed him that the bill was not paid, and again on the 17th, stating that notice of dishonour had been given, and unless the amount was paid or arrangements made a writ would issue. That the plaintiff had obtained no part of the 250*l.*, the defendant pretending that a writ was out against Ripley, Lawley being in Italy. That Ripley was adjudicated bankrupt in March 1869, and circumstances had occurred satisfying the plaintiff that he had been induced by the defendant by means of untrue statements and representations as to the position and solvency of Ripley and Lawley, and the real circumstances under which the bill came into the defendant's possession, to advance the money, such statements being not only untrue, but known to the defendant to be so when he made the same, and that in fact the defendant had received the money and applied it, or the greater part, to his own use. That the defendant was well aware that the bill would not be met, and that Ripley and Lawley were without means to meet the bill if liable on it. The bill then charged that the plaintiff advanced the money on the representation that it was to be advanced to Ripley and Lawley, the defendant never intending so to advance it to them, knowing that Ripley was hopelessly insolvent, and heavily indebted to another hotel, Lawley also being heavily indebted, and the representations that they were persons of means being untrue. The whole transaction being a scheme to pay off debts and liabilities of the defendant's own, and concocted between him, Ripley, and Lawley, or some of them, to raise money to pay off gambling debts due from them to the defendant, who applied the 237*l.* 10*s.* to his own use. The bill then charged that the bill of exchange was for little or no consideration, not recoverable, and asking discovery as to it, charging that it was given without consideration, and was to the defendant's knowledge worthless and void. And the bill prayed a declaration that the plaintiff was induced to advance the money on misrepresentations, and prayed for payment.

Glasse, Q. C. and Cottrell, in support of the demurrer, contended that this was a pure question of law, and if such a bill could be sustained, a suit could be instituted in every case of obtaining money under false pretences. A demurrer for want of equity involved one, ore tenus, for want of jurisdiction and parties.

Barker v. Barker, 4 Drew, 666;
Cooper v. Earl Powis, 3 De G. & Sm. 688.

Everitt, for the plaintiff, insisted that, being a question of fraud entirely admitted for the purpose of the demurrer, although no doubt there might be a legal remedy, this court had concurrent jurisdiction.

Colt v. Woolaston, 2 P. W. 156;
Cridland v. DeMorley, 1 De G. & M. 59:
Burrows v. Locke, 10 Ves. 470;
Green v. Barrett, 1 Sim. N. S. 45;
Storey's Eq. Juris. 185, Ch. 6, part 2;
Slim v. Croucher, 1 De G. F. & J. 518;
St. Aubyn v. Smart, 17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 439, and the cases there cited.

Glasse, Q. C. was heard in reply.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR (after stating the substance of the bill).—It is clear that the plaintiff, according to the statements in the bill, did advance 237*l.* to the defendant, he (the defendant) declaring himself trustee as to one-half of 500*l.*, and representing that he had got sufficient security for the money to entitle him to recover. That was a bill which was a dishonoured one, and the defendant was well aware of that at the time when the plaintiff advanced the money, and that under such circumstances the bill would not be paid; that Ripley and the Hon. F. Lawley were without property, and the defendant knew that they could not meet their engagements, and yet represented them to be solvent. Now, if the case stopped there it would amount to an allegation that the defendant having that knowledge committed a fraud on the plaintiff. But in the 13th paragraph of the bill it is more distinctly stated, namely in this way, that the defendant never did advance the money to Ripley and the Hon. F. Lawley, but the statement is that it was a part of a transaction whereby, on the representation that he was going to advance the money to them, he obtained it for his own purposes, and that it was part of a fraudulent scheme. [The Vice-Chancellor read passages from the bill.] It is then alleged that it was an untrue representation that Ripley and the Hon. F. Lawley were persons of property; and if there is an allegation that one party induces another to act on representations that are not true, that is a fraud of the grossest description, and of course the demurrer admits such allegation to be true. The charge is, that the whole transaction was a scheme of the defendant to obtain money for purposes of his own, and as between him and Ripley and Lawley to pay off the gambling debts of the defendant, the manager of a hotel. The 17th paragraph then charges that the bill was without consideration (the defendant having stated that it was for value), and to the knowledge of the defendant worthless and void, and could not be enforced against the drawer and acceptor. It therefore amounts to this, that the defendant, being desirous to obtain money from the plaintiff, made untrue representations, untrue to his knowledge, that a bill was given for value when he knew it was not; that the whole transaction was bonâ fide when he knew it was a concocted scheme; and the bill therefore alleges a case admitted by the demurrer to be true which entitles the plaintiff to recover from the defendant. It was argued, and I was at first under the impression that it was a case which must be carried to a court of law, for no one can say that the bill does not allege a case entitling the plaintiff to recover the money; but the question is, whether the remedy is not at law. No doubt the distinctions between the remedies at law and in this court are very refined, as to what cases can be sustained at law or in equity. If it were a simple case of borrowing money, although the borrower may say he shall be able to repay, that is still a fraud, because he knew that he could not do so. Yet the claim for that money is not sustainable in this court. But where he obtains money on a security which he knows to be bad, that is a different case. The leading authority on this subject is the case of Pasley v. Freeman, in which A. said to B., "I am about to deal with C., is he solvent?" and B. said that he was, and accordingly A. gave him credit; but it turned out that B. knew he could not be trusted, and that he would not have trusted him: that is, he made a representation which he knew to be untrue, and the Court of Queen's Bench held that he (A.) was entitled to recover the whole amount. Therefore it is clear that we have a case here in which the plaintiff, supposing his allegations to be true, is entitled to recover in a court of law; is he entitled to recover in equity also? Mr. Everitt cited a case of Colt v. Woolaston (sup.), in which a director of a company represented shares in the company to be good while he knew them to be bad, and it was decided that a court of equity had a concurrent jurisdiction. In Burrowes v. Lock (sup.), the remedy would have been at law, a trustee being asked as to the nature of incumbrances, and having answered that he had not incumbered, when in fact he had, but had forgotten it, that of course was not a simple fraud, but a misrepresentation, but it was held to be a constructive fraud, and Sir William Grant considered that there was concurrent jurisdiction, and he quotes the Lord Chancellor in Pasley v. Freeman (sup.), who says, "that if a representation is made to another person going to deal in a matter of interest upon the faith of that representation, the former shall make it good if he knows it is false." Can anything be more conclusive. Here the plaintiff was told that the bill was given for value when he knew that it was not, and if Pasley v. Freeman is law, the defendant must have a decree against him, and it is clear that it is a question which is cognisable in this court. Cridland v. DeMorley (sup.) came on upon a demurrer before Sir Richard Kindersley, but that case and the cases cited went, it was said, on distinct grounds, and were not in point, but I think they are, and in St. Aubyn v. Smart (sup.), I held an innocent partner liable, and that was affirmed on appeal. There, there was a fraud on the part of one partner, and the other having been held liable was obliged to pay. Slim v. Croucher (sup.) was a case in which all the other cases were fully considered, and I think it will be found that the very passage was read and relied on in argument from Burrowes v. Locke, which I have just read. There, there was a fraud, that is a misrepresentation, but by innocent mistake. There an advance of money was obtained upon a lease from the defendant, and the plaintiff asked him whether he had previously demised. He had forgotten it, and the security turned out therefore to be worthless, and the plaintiff was misled, and Stuart, V. C. made a decree for payment, being a money demand, and that was confirmed on appeal. That case is very analagous to this, except that there it was an innocent mistake, whereas here, according to the allegations in the bill, there was a gross misrepresentation. Mr. Glasse argued that if the plaintiff succeeded here every case where money was obtained under false pretences might be brought by bill before this court. No doubt a party may in such a case be amenable to the criminal jurisdiction, but that will not exonerate him from having a bill filed against him in this court. The bill is rested on the ordinary, valuable, and well-established jurisdiction of this court, that where on representations which a man knows to be false another is induced to advance money, or do some other act, that is a fraud which will be taken cognizance of as within the jurisdiction of a court of equity. On these grounds the demurrer must be overruled.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Fitch and Fitch.

Solicitors for the defendant, Messrs. Brandon.

V. C. JAMES'S COURT.

Reported by W. H. BENNET and R. T. BOULT, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

July 6 and 7.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. THE CORPORATION OF HALIFAX.

Pollution of stream—Nuisance—Time given to abate same.

A corporation had erected certain works so that the sewage of the town flowed into an ancient brook, which passed the mills of a manufactory, and thereby the brook or stream was so far polluted as to affect the health of the workmen and others in the manufactories residing in the neighbourhood of the stream, and also affected the property of the manufacturers. The balance of the scientific evidence proving that what had been done by the corporation caused a nuisance and was injurious to the public health:

Held, that the relators were entitled to an immediate injunction to restrain any further extension of the works by which the pollution of the stream had been caused, and a further injunction (to commence on the 1st June 1870, to allow time to the corporation to apply to Parliament for additional powers if so advised), against causing the sewage to pass by or through the present outfalls.

Digitized by Google

This was an information and bill filed by the Attorney-General on the relation of Messrs. Holdsworth, the proprietors of Shaw Lodge Mills, within the borough of Halifax, damask and worsted manufacturers, praying that the Corporation of Halifax might be restrained from causing the sewage of the borough to flow into a brook called the Hebble Brook, on the banks of which the mills of Messrs. Holdsworth are situated, so as to cause a nuisance and injury to the public health. It appeared by the evidence that prior to and for some years after the passing of the Halifax Improvement Act in 1853, the drainage of the borough of Halifax, then of comparatively small dimensions and of the neighbourhood, was effected partly by ash pits or dry cesspools, and partly by small sewers so constructed as to allow the liquid portion thereof to percolate through the sandstone rock upon which the town of Halifax is built, the solid portion being from time to time carted away by the corporation.

The Hebble Brook, the natural drain of Halifax, was a small stream, with a rough, rocky bed, which flowed through the trough-like valley on the steep western slope of which Halifax is built. At some remote period, possibly before the settlement of the Flemish traders in this valley and the acquisition of their privilege of summary justice on criminals on what was and is called "The Maiden or Gibbet Hill," the Hebble Brook may have been a clear unpolluted brook from the Yorkshire hills, but it has now become, and has so continued for some time past, a foul polluted watercourse, discoloured to the eye, and very offensive. This was admitted on all hands, and the issue raised in the cause between the plaintiffs and defendants and their witnesses was as to the cause of its present condition. The borough manufacturies of Halifax have for many years past been greatly on the increase, and after the passing of the Improvement Act in 1853, as before stated, the corporation caused plans to be prepared for making drains, and entering upon a general system of sewerage for the borough. This plan, which consisted in the construction of one main intercepting sewer, into which the branch sewers were led, was by degrees put into execution; and in 1858 the main sewer, which was termed outfall A., was completed. This sewer discharges itself into the Hebble Brook, at a point about 160 yards above the mills of Messrs. Holdsworth, and at what was then the boundary of the then borough. The information stated that, although there was a perceptible increase in the amount of sewage flowing down the Hebble Brook, there was for some time no reason to apprehend anything like a serious nuisance, as the dry cesspool system continued to prevail to a great extent, and the house drainage was only very gradually connected with outfall A. In the year 1865 "The Halifax Extension Improvement Act 1865" was passed, the effect of which had been to treble the size of the borough and the area to be drained by outfall sewer A. In the meantime, as new houses were built, the number of water-closets draining into outfall A. was increased, and in the older districts water-closets were by degrees substituted for the privies and cesspools. The proportion, however, was still small, as it appeared from the evidence that with a population in 1868 of about 62,500 persons (the population of the borough having then nearly doubled itself since 1861), there were only about 1700 water-closets, or a proportion, as stated by one of the witnesses, of about one to every twelve houses.

After the extension of the borough in 1865 the corporation had taken in hand the construction of another main sewer for the purpose of draining the outlying districts recenty added, and comparatively rural and unbuilt upon. This sewer, known as "outfall B," was opened in the course of last year, and empties itself into the Hebble at a point about eighty yards below the outfall A. In addition to this system of intercepting drains the corporation had put into force their Parliamentary powers for retaining and storing water, the effect of which the information stated had been to stop the periodical floodings of the Hebble, and reduce it frequently to the condition of a stagnant ditch, while from the rocky and irregular nature of its bed the filth was retained and exposed to the decomposing effects of the sun and air. The information furthur stated that by the end of 1867 the Hebble Brook below the outfalls had become constantly filled with foul and feculent matter, and was in fact nothing better than a common open sewer. The nuisance was also stated to be aggravated by the arrangements, of a very complicated character, of the Calder and Hebble navigation, the canal of which runs in immediate proximity to the Hebble, for damming up the brook and pumping the water into the canal, so that the same filthy water was again returned to the riparian inhabitants of the lower part of the valley. In Dec. 1867, Messrs. Holdsworths, who employ about 3000 hands in their mills, and are owners of several adjoining cottages overhanging the brook, wrote to the corporation to complain of the very serious nuisance occasioned by the discharge of the town sewage into the brook at a point so near to their works and cottages, and to protest against the increase of the nuisance and from the contemplated opening of outfall B, only about eighty yards above their mills. A correspondence followed, in which the corporation did not deny the existence of an evil, but urged the difficulties of the case, the exertions that had already been made, and the impossibility of partial local action in such a matter, insisting that time must be allowed for the adoption of some comprehensive scheme, based upon the expected report of the Rivers Pollution Commission, for dealing, not merely with the particular nuisance complained of, but for purifying the area of the Calder and Hebble basin generally above as well as below the outfalls.

The plaintiffs, on the other hand, finding, as they stated, that the nuisance had been steadily on the increase since their first complaint in Dec. 1867, and that the health of their workmen was seriously affected, and their cottages rendered almost uninhabitable by the stench and foul gases escaping from the brook, grew weary of waiting for the comprehensive scheme promised by the corporation, and in May last procured the signature of the Attorney-General to the information for the purpose in effect of trying the question whether the corporation were entitled to turn the Hebble Brook into a common sewer for the town of Halifax, and thereby injure the property of the plaintiffs, and the health of their workmen and the tenants of the cottages.

The evidence on both sides was very voluminous, and, as usual, showed a conflict of the scientific evidence given by the medical men and others. On the part of the corporation it was denied that the condition of the Hebble was foul, filthy, and poisonous; but it was asserted that this condition was—if it were so—occasioned by manufacturing refuse rather than by sewage pollution; that the present scheme had been adopted at a great expense, after long and anxious consideration, as the best means of dealing with the question of draining the borough, and not without success; that from the immense volumes of water poured down the outfalls—nearly 3,000,000 gallons per day—the sewage was so diluted as to be innocuous; and that the condition of the brook at and immediately below the outfalls was far better than higher up in the town, where it was polluted by manufacturing refuse, dyestuff, and filth from privies, or than lower down the stream at Messrs. Holdsworth's works, where the stream at its shallowest point was poisoned by the drainage from their cottages, and especially by the liquor that escaped from their grease-extracting works, where the soapsuds used in washing the wool are treated with sulphuric acid for the purpose of extracting the grease, and is afterwards used in making candles, and for other similar purposes.

Several witnesses had been also examined viva voce, and cross-examined on their depositions before a special examiner at Halifax.

The cause now came on for a hearing.

E. E. Kay, Q.C. and Ince, for the plaintiffs, shortly stated the facts of the case, and the Vice-Chancellor called upon the defendants' counsel to argue the question on their behalf.

Grove, Q.C., Amphlett, Q.C., H. Fox Bristowe, Q.C., and G. Williamson, for the defendants, contended that that portion of the stream which was the main ground of complaint charged in the information; that which flowed between outfall A. and the plaintiff's works, was precisely that part where there was the least pollution; that the outfalls, so far from increasing the nuisance complained of as it existed in the Hebble, did in fact mitigate it by the great quantities of water discharged down these outfalls; that no complaint had been made for ten years after the opening of the outfall A in 1858, until the time when the plaintiffs began to bestir themselves in 1867, by any of the inhabitants of the neighbourhood or persons working in the manufactories on the banks of the steam. On the contrary, persons engaged at the Atlas works, between the two outfalls, had given evidence, and had not been cross-examined, that they had not suffered in health or felt any evil effects from the discharge of the sewage water by the outfalls. That the plaintiffs themselves, by their processes carried on upon their property, and by the drainage from their cottages, had greatly increased the bad condition of the brook, and the plaintiffs, and especially Mr. W. F. Holdsworth, who had been a member of the corporation since 1860 and was mayor for two years, could not now be heard to complain, as they, the plaintiffs, had acquiesced in the state of things which had existed. That Mr. W. J. Holdsworth, as a member also of the corporation, knew of, and assented to, what had been done, and had allowed great expenses to be incurred. He had been a most active member of the corporation, and was cognisant of all that had taken place. That the evidence did not warrant the allegations as to the unhealthiness of the stream stated in the information. That vast expense had been gone to already by the corporation in their endeavours to alleviate the inconvenience complained of; and that the plaintiffs should be left to their remedy at law.

No reply.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR, after having recapitulated the main facts, and commenting on the conflicting state of the scientific evidence, held that the plaintiffs were entitled to an injunction against the corporation from making any additions or any new communications with the existing outfalls and also from and after the 1st June 1870, so as to give the corporation time to apply to Parliament, if they should think proper, against causing the sewage of the borough to flow through or pass by the outfalls A and B, or making any new outfall, unless and until the same should be sufficiently purified and deodorised. It certainly appeared to him that it was utterly impossible that a sewer of the extent stated could be discharged into a brook of small dimensions, as the Hebble was stated to be, without its creating a nuisance, and the evidence had satisfied him that a nuisance of a very offensive character had been caused by the proceedings which had been had. The evidence afforded by Dr. Letheby's tables, which had been relied on by the corporation, was practically irrelevant, or if it proved anything it rather strengthened the case against the defendants themselves. He could not accede to the argument that had been urged as to any acquiescence on the part of the corporation; or that because one of the Messrs. Holdsworths had been a member of the town council, and twice chosen mayor since 1860, and acting as such that he thereby gave up his property and that of his partners to be dealt with by the corporation as they pleased, so as to preclude him or them from ever complaining if the acts of the corporation, from which no nuisance had been originally contemplated, ultimately resulted in such being the case. But again, this gentleman was only one of several relators, all of whom were not members of the corporation. The particular evil had gone increasing gradually, and had only become insufferable at the end of 1866. It was immaterial that the persons most affected by the nuisance were cottagers of the plaintiffs. Upon the whole he had no hesitation in granting an order for an immediate injunction to restrain any further extension of the system adopted by the corporation, and an injunction to take effect and commence on the 1st June 1870 against causing the sewage to be poured out by the present outfalls A and B in an unpurified state. The plaintiffs were entitled to their costs of the suit and information. The Vice-Chancellor added that he was convinced that the corporation would be able in time to remedy the evils complained of, so as to prevent them from being practically a nuisance, and so deprive the Messrs. Holdsworths of any real ground of complaint.

Solicitors: Edwards, Layton, and Jaques, agents for Hobroyd and Co., Halifax; Williamson and Co., for Norris and Foster, for the corporation.

Friday, July 23.

POTTS v. SMITH AND OTHERS.

Administration—Insufficient estate—Abatement and apportionment of annuities.

Where there are contingent annuities given by a testator's will, and his estate turns out to be insufficient for the due payment of them, and some of the annuitants have died, the amount of the several annuities is to be estimated at the value of the respective annuities at the death of the testator, and the sums subsequently paid to the annuitants on account of the annuities to be deducted from that amount.

The rule as adopted in Todd v. Beilby, 27 Beav. 353, followed.

This cause came on for further consideration on the chief clerk's certificate.

It was an administration suit.

The testator, Ralph Henry Potts, by his will dated the 18th June 1855, after directing payment of his debts, devised and bequeathed certain real and personal estate to his trustees and executors to convert same and upon trust to stand possessed of the proceeds and out of the yearly income arising therefrom to pay the following annuities by half-yearly payments: unto Mary Potts an annuity of 1000*l.* for life, to his brother Radford Potts an annuity of 350*l.* for life, to his brother Benjamin Potts an annuity of 80*l.* for life, and to his sister Sarah an annuity of 50*l.* for life, and he bequeathed the residue of his property to the executors for the purposes therein mentioned, subject to the payment of the annuities.

By a codicil to his will the testator made certain alterations in the bequest as to the annuity to his brother Radford Potts, but did not alter his will so far as related to the question raised on the further consideration of the cause.

By the decree dated the 20th March 1868, the usual administration inquiries were directed.

The chief clerk, by his certificate, certified that the testator's estate was insufficient for the payment of the legacies and annuities, and the arrears given by his will. That some years had elapsed since the testator's death, and that the testator's brother Radford had died leaving a widow (the plaintiff in the cause) and some children surviving him.

The question now to be considered was, how the remaining fund of the testator's estate was to be apportioned amongst the legatees and annuitants.

Amphlett, Q. C. and Jason Smith, for the plaintiff, contended that in estimating the value of the annuities the court, being to be guided by the events which had happened, must decide that the fund could not be divisible in proportion to the value of the annuities at the death of the testator, as some of the annuitants had since died, but that the annuity to the brother Radford and wife must be considered as no longer reversionary, but as an annuity in possession. For this they cited

Todd v. Beilby, 27 Beav. 353;
Heath v. Nugent, 29 Beav. 226.

Kay, Q. C. and J. P. Morris, for the defendants, the executors, contended that the rule as applied in Todd v. Beilby did not govern the present case. They cited

Broughton v. Colquhoun, 1 De G. & Sm. 47;
Long v. Hughes, in note to ditto.

The Vice-Chancellor said he considered the case was governed by that of Todd v. Beilby, and that the apportionment must be made accordingly. The declaration of the court would therefore be: "That it appearing that the real and personal estate of the testator was insufficient to pay the annuities bequeathed by his will, declare that the values of the annuities of such annuitants as were now dead are respectively the amounts that actually became due to them respectively in their respective lifetimes in respect thereof, and that the values of the said annuities of such of the annuitants as are now living are respectively the amounts that have become due to them respectively in respect thereof, together with the present values of their respective annuities, such values to be verified by affidavit." The amount remaining of the testator's estate to be divided and paid to the surviving annuitants according to this principle.

Order accordingly.

Solicitors: Hicks and Son; Cualiffe and Beaumont.

In Parliament.

Reported by Frederick Clifford and Pembroke S. Stephens Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

THE COURT OF REFEREES ON PRIVATE BILLS.

Monday, April 12.

(Before Mr. Dodson, Chairman; Mr. Rickards, and Mr. Wynn.)

St. Helen's Borough Improvement Bill.

Objections to the locus standi: (1) of Sir R. T. Gerard, Bart.; (2) of Messrs. Robertson, Gladstone, and others; (3) of Thomas Dicconson, Esq.; (4) of The Rev. J. Abraham; (5) of The Marquis of Salisbury; (6) of the London and North-Western Railway Company; (7) Daniel Willis, Esq.; (8) Samuel Taylor, Esq.

Practice—Locus standi—Several petitions—Order of hearing.

Where petitions are numerous the court will by consent hear the arguments relating to them, some as a class, and some singly; and the right of reply will correspond to the order of hearing which is adopted.

Mundell, Q. C. (who appeared for Sir R. T. Gerard), asked the court to lay down some rule as to the order in which arguments as to these numerous petitions should be heard, the points raised in some of the petitions being practically identical, whilst others relying upon the same points introduced new matters, and others again were wholly distinct in their nature. The court, he presumed, would adopt the course which had been attended with convenience in other cases, that of dividing the petitions representing different interests into classes, and disposing of each class separately.

Cripps, Q.C. (who appeared for the Marquis of Salisbury) supported the application.

Pembroke Stephens, for the promoters, offered no objection, on the understanding that arguments against each class would also be heard separately, and that the promoters would not be confined to one general reply. He suggested that petitions 1 to 5 inclusive, emanating from landowners apprehensive of additional taxation under the Bill, should be treated as one class; and that these should be replied to and disposed of, before the remaining petitions, raising other and distinct questions, were entered upon.

Cripps, Q. C.—The petition of the Marquis of Salisbury raises other points besides that of the apprehended taxation on which we claim a locus standi. But I have no objection for the sake of convenience to its being included in that class.

Merewether, Q. C., Webster, Q. C., Round, and other counsel representing different petitioners, expressed their willingness to assent to the course proposed.

It was ultimately agreed that the first five petitions should be dealt with as a class, and that the other three petitions should be argued singly.

Mr. Rickards observed that the court did not bind themselves to give their decisions in any particular order, or, if necessary, till all the arguments had concluded.

Digitized by Google

Common Law Courts.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.

Reported by T. W. SAUNDERS and J. SHORTT, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Friday, June 4.

SIMPSON v. YEEND.

Municipal election—Voter—Bribery—22 Vict. c. 35, ss. 11, 12 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 102, s. 2.)

By sect. 2 of the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 102, which by sect. 12 of the 22 Vict. c. 35 is made applicable to municipal elections, a person is to be deemed guilty of bribery "who shall directly or indirectly, by himself or by any other person on his behalf, give, lend, or agree to give or lend, or shall offer, promise, or promise to procure, or to endeavour to procure, any money or valuable consideration to or for any voter; or to or for any other person, in order to induce any voter to vote or refrain from voting," &c.

On the morning of a municipal election for the city of L., the defendant went to one M., who was a voter, and solicited his vote for his party. M. told him he did not intend to vote; the defendant said he would be remunerated for loss of time.

Held, that these facts brought the defendant within the operation of the above-mentioned section.

This was an appeal from a decision in the County Court of Staffordshire, holden at Lichfield, entered on the 30th April 1868.

The particulars of demand were as follows:—Thomas Simpson sues William Yeend for 40*s.*, forfeited by him by reason of having been guilty of bribery at the election of councillors in the north ward in the city of Lichfield, held on the 1st Nov. 1867, for that he, the said William Yeend, on that day did directly offer a sum of money to George Marshall, of Gay-lane, Lichfield, one of the citizens of the said city, to induce him as a voter in the said ward to vote at the said election.

The cause was heard by the judge on the 8th June 1868, when it was proved that on the 1st Nov. an election of councillors in the north ward of the said city was held there, and that the said George Marshall was enrolled in the list of citizens in the said north ward. That the said defendant called upon him on the 1st Nov. and urged him to vote for his (the said defendant's) party candidates for the office of councillor in the north ward, and that Marshall did not vote at all.

Marshall and his wife gave evidence that the defendant had, on several occasions called and offered various sums of money which had been refused; but the evidence of both, especially of Marshall, was so hesitating and unsatisfactory that the judge did not think it deserving of credit. Marshall also admitted, on cross-examination, that he had received 1*l.* from the other party.

The defendant was then examined as a witness in his own behalf, and stated as follows: I saw Marshall's wife. I told her I called to solicit a vote. She told me he did not intend to vote. If he did he would offend Mr. Mickleton and Mr. Playfer. She also said he had been offered something very handsome on the other side, and I am sure he will not vote; he also said he would lose much time by going to vote. I said he would be remunerated for what loss of time might occur. Never mentioned money, 7*s.* 6*d.* I saw Marshall next morning. I again said, "I solicit your vote." He told me he did not intend to vote. I did not offer him money, I said he would be remunerated for loss of time; I did not offer him a sovereign.

The defendant also stated that by remuneration he meant 3*s.* or 4*s.* or thereabouts, and that he solicited the vote for his party.

Judgment was given for defendant.

At a subsequent court the plaintiff moved to set aside the verdict, and to have it entered up for the plaintiff, on the ground that the evidence of the defendant himself was in point of law an admission of bribery under the statute.

The judge decided that under the circumstances the verdict should stand, and at the same time considered it reasonable and proper that an appeal should be allowed, and he allowed the same to the plaintiff on the said question, whether the transaction as described by the defendant amounted to bribery under the statute 17 & 18 Vict. c. 102.

By sect. 11 of the 22 Vict. c. 35 (An Act to Amend the Law Relating to Municipal Elections), it is enacted that

If any person at any election of mayor, councillors, auditors, or assessors for any borough shall be guilty of bribery, he shall for every such offence forfeit the sum of 40*s.* to any person who shall sue for the same in the County Court, &c.

By sect. 12 it enacted that

The word "bribery" shall include anything committed or done before, at, after, or with respect to, the election of any mayor, councillors, auditors, or assessors, which if committed or done before, at, after, or with respect to any election of any member to serve in Parliament, would render the person committing or doing the same liable to any pains, penalties, forfeitures, or conviction for bribery, treating, undue influence, corrupt practices, or other offence under any Act or Acts for the time being in force with respect to the election of members to serve in Parliament for boroughs in England and Wales.

By sect. 2 of 17 & 18 Vict. c. 102 (An Act to Consolidate and Amend the laws relating to Bribery, Treating, and undue Influence at Elections of Members of Parliament) it is enacted that—

The following persons shall be deemed guilty of bribery, and shall be punished accordingly: Every person who shall, directly or indirectly, by himself, or by any other person on his behalf, give, lend, or agree to give or lend, or shall offer, promise, or promise to procure, or to endeavour to procure, any money or valuable consideration to or for any voter, or to or for any person on behalf of any voter, or to or for any other person, in order to induce any voter to vote or refrain from voting, or shall corruptly do any such act as aforesaid, on account of such voter having voted or refrained from voting at any election, &c.

Gray, Q. C. and R. H. Collins for the plaintiff.—The decision of the County Court judge was erroneous, for the defendant had brought himself within the terms of the 2nd section of 17 & 18 Vict. c. 102, which, by 22 Vict. c. 35, is applicable to municipal elections. The first part of the section, which is that applicable to the present case, does not require that the act should be done corruptly. It is a simple question whether or not, according to the evidence, the defendant offered the plaintiff money to induce him to vote. Cooper v. Slade, 7 H. of L. Cas. 746, is in point. [COCKBURN, C. J.—This would seem to be a much stronger case than that.]

Manisty, Q. C. and Bosanquet for the defendant.—There was no evidence in support of the only act of bribery alleged in the particulars, which states that "the said William Yeend on that day did directly offer a sum of money to George Marshall, of Grove-lane, Lichfield, one of the citizens of the said city, to induce him as a voter in the said ward to vote at the said election." There was in fact neither an "offer" nor a "promise" to pay money. [COCKBURN, C. J.—Suppose I say, "If you vote you will have a 10*l.* note," there would be no pledging of his own responsibility, but would not that be within the Act?] I should say not; it would be no more than a passing remark. [COCKBURN, C. J.—He was soliciting a vote for a particular individual. The person solicited says, "I shall lose my time;" the other says he will not, for he will be remunerated.] There was no contract or bargain, and the offer was never acted upon. [MELLOR, J.—Had he been a mere bystander, and had used the observation, it may have been otherwise, but here the conversation is with a voter, whose vote is solicited. COCKBURN, C. J.—What is the meaning intended to be conveyed when it is said the voter will lose a lot of time, and it is replied, "Oh, no, you will be remunerated?"] Still there must be some offer or promise, of which there is no evidence. [COCKBURN, C. J.—It can scarcely be said that there was not some evidence of a promise.] There was no offering of money, only a suggestion which was not accepted. [COCKBURN, C. J.—Then it would only be to alter the phraseology and so evade the penalty.] It is only a vague remark. No authority was shown for making any offer, nor was the offer accepted; it was merely a passing remark which had no effect. [COCKBURN, C. J.—Really if the statute does not embrace this case, it ought to be amended.] Had any actual promise been made, though it had not been accepted, it would have been sufficient. The election judges, I believe, have put a construction upon these words, though I cannot now refer to it. [COCKBURN, C. J.—We will consult the other judges.]

Cur. adv. vult.

COCKBURN, C. J.—This was a case stated by the judge of the County Court of Staffordshire by way of appeal from his own decision whereby judgment was given for the defendant. The plaintiff in the County Court, Thomas Simpson, sued the defendant, William Yeend, for 40*s.* forfeited by him by reason of having been guilty of bribery at the election of councillors in the north ward of the city of Lichfield held on the 1st Nov. 1867, "for that he the defendant did on that day directly offer a sum of money to one George Marshall, one of the citizens of the said city, to induce him as a voter in the said ward to vote at the said election." The evidence on which the plaint was tried is set out by the judge of the County Court, and the question proposed to us is, "whether the transaction as described by the defendant is bribery under the stat. 17 & 18 Vict. c. 102?" The evidence as stated by the judge of the County Court is as follows: "I saw Marshall's wife. I told her I had called to solicit a vote. She told me he did not intend to vote; if he did, he would offend Mr. Mickleton. She also said he had been offered something handsome on the other side, and I am sure he will not vote. She also said he would lose much time by going to vote, and I said he would be remunerated for what loss of time might occur. Never mentioned money—7*s.* 6*d.* I saw Marshall next morning. I again said, 'I solicit your vote.' He told me he did not intend to vote. I did not offer him money. I said he could be remunerated for loss of time. I did not offer him a sovereign." The statute referred to by the judge of the County Court, 17 & 18 Vict. c. 102, s. 2, makes it bribery "in every person who shall directly or indirectly by himself or by any other person in his behalf give, lend, or agree to give or lend, or shall offer, promise, or promise to procure or endeavour to procure any money or valuable consideration to or for any voter, or to or for any person on behalf of any voter in, to, or for any other person, in order to induce any voter to vote or refrain from voting, or shall corruptly, do any such act as aforesaid on account of such voter having voted or refrained from voting at any election." In answer to the question proposed to us by the judge of the County Court, we are of opinion that "the transaction as described by the defendant is bribery under the statute." We delayed giving our judgment at the close of the argument, not because of any doubt in our minds as to the answer we ought to return to the question put to us by the judge of the County Court, but because we were assured by the counsel for the defendant that the election judges had in their decision upon this section taken a view different from that which we were disposed to take. Had the fact been as suggested we should not have felt ourselves bound by the opinion of the election judges, unless upon consideration we had agreed with it; but we thought it desirable to ascertain what opinion had in fact been expressed by them with reference to a subject with which their duties had necessarily made them familiar. Upon inquiry we find, as we had anticipated, that those learned judges had expressed no opinion adverse to the conclusion at which we have arrived. In the present case we are relieved from considering the truth of the evidence, as it is the statement of the defendant himself, which is submitted to us for consideration. We cannot doubt the words admitted to have been used by the defendant, viz., that the voter would be remunerated for what loss of time might occur—did, under the circumstances, amount to an "offer" or "promise" to "procure" or "endeavour" to procure money or valuable consideration of a voter in order to induce him to vote at the election in question. The expression, "remuneration for loss of time," would necessarily convey to the apprehension of the voter that if he would vote for a particular candidate he should name, he would receive, either directly from the person offering or by his procurement, money or valuable consideration which he would not otherwise obtain; and any expression of that kind which can be so understood is calculated to operate upon the mind of the elector as a direct inducement to vote for such candidate. If any authority were required to induce us to adopt that view of the transaction in the present case it is supplied in that of Cooper v. Slade, 27 L. J. 449, Q. B., which upon this point is not distinguishable in principle from the present case. It is so important to the public interest that at elections voters should be left to vote without any disturbing influence of any kind that we feel ourselves bound, in construing the statute in question, to give full effect to the plain meaning of the words used, and to apply them to the substantial parts of the case without raising subtle refinements as to the precise word or expression in which the promise or offer may be conveyed. The case will be remitted to the judge of the County Court who will set aside the verdict for the defendant, and enter it for the plaintiff for 40*s.*, being the penalty provided by the Municipal Act for the offence in question.

Case to be remitted, and judgment to be entered for the plaintiff.

Attorney for the plaintiff, J. Cole.

Attorney for the defendant, W. Wilson.

MIDDLESEX SESSIONS.

Tuesday, Aug. 31,

(Before Mr. Serjt. COX, Deputy Assistant Judge.)

REG. v. HARRINGTON AND OTHERS.

Practice—Counsel.

Where two prisoners on the same indictment are separately defended by counsel, one of whom only has called witnesses, the convenient course of proceeding is for the prisoner's counsel who calls witnesses to open his defence and sum up; then for the counsel for the prosecution to reply upon the whole case, and then for the counsel for the prisoner who has called no witnesses to address the jury in his defence.

Prisoners were indicted for assaulting a police officer in the execution of his duty.

Cooper for the prosecution.

Brindley defended Harrington and another.

Moody defended O'Keefe.

Brindley called no witnesses.

Moody called witnesses, and opened the defence and summed up.

Brindley claimed to address the jury after Cooper had replied.

Cooper objected; he claimed the right to reply on the whole case after his learned friends had completed their defences.

Keble, amicus curiæ, said that at the last session of the Central Criminal Court a similar question had come before M. Smith, J., who adopted the course proposed by Mr. Brindley.

Mr. Serjeant Cox.—The counsel for the prosecution has the right of reply, but in practice it is not exercised unless witnesses are called for the defence. If there be an advantage in last addressing the jury, it is hard that one prisoner should be deprived of it because another prisoner calls witnesses. The course adopted by M. Smith, J., is obviously the fairest. I adopted it in a similar case last week. The question is new to me. I shall observe the practice until corrected by a higher authority.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

Reported by H. Leigh and E. Lumley, Esqrs., Barristers at-Law.

June 4 and 5, and July 2.

Re De Lancey's Succession.

Revenue—Succession Duty Act 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 51), sects. 2, 18, 30—Legacy Duty Act (36 Geo. 3, c. 52), sect. 19—Bequest of money in trust to be laid out in land—Equitable conversion—Duty payable thereon—Whether as succession or legacy duty—Amount of—Petition of appeal against assessment—Right to begin—Practice.

A testator by will in 1799 bequeathed 10,000*l. Consols to trustees upon trust, to lay out the principal and the interest moneys arising therefrom in the purchase of real estate, to be settled and assured to the use of his eldest son, Charles, for life, with remainder to the first and other sons of Charles successively in tail male; and, in default of such issue to the use of testator's son James for life, with remainder to the first and other sons of James successively in tail male; and in default of such issue, then to his own right heirs for ever.*

Testator died in 1800, leaving his two sons, Charles and James, Charles being the eldest and the heir-at-law. Charles died in 1840, and James in 1857, each of them dying a bachelor, and intestate. The 10,000*l. was never laid out in the purchase of real estate, but the dividends arising therefrom were paid to Charles and James successively during their respective lives. At James's death the testator's only lineal descendant was his daughter and only surviving child, Susan, who then became his heir-at-law, and died in* 1866, a spinster and intestate, having always refused to receive either dividends or principal of the 10,000*l. left under her father's (the testator's) will. Shortly after her death the principal and interest moneys representing the real estate fund were paid into the Court of Chancery, and a suit was instituted for administering the same, in which suit the following facts were found: That at testator's death his heir-at-law was his eldest son Charles; that the person now such heir-at-law, and entitled to any real estate of which the testator might have died intestate, was Edward F. De L., a grandson of the testator's brother. That at Charles's death his heir-at-law was his brother James; and that at James' death his heir-at-law was his sister Susan; and that at Susan's death her heir-at-law was the said Edward F. De L., who was the heir-at-law of the said Charles, James, and Susan respectively, and the person entitled to any real estate of which they respectively might have died intestate. It was also found that "none of the persons for the time being entitled to any real estate of which the testator had died intestate did, while so entitled, any act with reference to the money so directed to be laid out in the purchase of land amounting to or having the effect of an election to take it as money or land, or as might have the effect of constituting such person or persons a new root or roots of descent with regard to such money."*

The Commissioners of Inland Revenue having assessed the said Edward F. de L. in succession duty at the rate of 5 per cent. on the principal and interest moneys constituting the above mentioned real estate fund, on the ground of its being a "succession to him derived from Susan the predecessor (of a brother of the father of whom he was a descendant)", he appealed against such assessment on the grounds, first, that legacy duty and not succession duty was payable by him thereon as a descendant of a brother of the deceased testator at the rate of 2½ per cent. under 36 Geo. 3, c. 52; or, secondly, that if succession duty was payable thereon, it was payable by him as the descendant of a brother of the testator, under the Succession Duty Act, at the rate of 3 per cent. only as being a succession derived by him (not from the said Susan but) from the said testator the predecessor, and on a case stated for the opinion of the Court of Exchequer, it was Held by Kelly, C. B. and Channell, B., that the fund in question, not having been laid out in land, was liable to legacy duty under sect. 19 of the Legacy Duty Act (36 Geo. 3, c. 52), and therefore that succession duty did not attach.

And, per Kelly, C. B., the principle or equitable fiction on which courts of equity have so long held that money to be laid out on land is for certain purposes to be treated as land, is inapplicable to the interpretation of the statute imposing duties upon personal estate.

Also, per Kelly, C. B., that if the case were governed by the Succession Duty Act, the daughter Susan and not the testator must be deemed the "predecessor" of the petitioner.

But, contra, by Bramwell and Cleasby, BB., that duty was payable upon the fund under the Succession Duty Act (16 & 17 Vict. c. 51), at 5 per cent. as upon a succession from "Susan" as the "predecessor," and not under the Legacy Duty Act.

And, per Bramwell, B., that sect. 19 of 36 Geo. 3 was not applicable, and that whether under the one Act or the other, the duty payable on the fund was properly assessed at the rate of 5 per cent.

Held also, by Bramwell, Channell, and Cleasby, BB., that the practice laid down by the court in The Marquis of Chandos v. The Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 6 Ex. 461; 20 L. J. 269, Ex., and followed in subsequent cases, should be adhered to, and that the counsel for the appellant should begin. Kelly, C. B. expressing his opinion that the more convenient course would be that, in every case where the Crown desires or seeks to impose a tax, the counsel for the Crown should begin (a).

(a) But see Re Greenwood, ante p. 25.

Digitized by Google

This was an appeal under sect. 50 of the Succession Duty Act 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 51), against an assessment of succession duty, made by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue under the Act, upon Edward Floyd De Lancey, of New York, in the United States of America, Esq., a legatee of or successor to personal estate directed to be laid out in the purchase of real estate, under the will of James De Lancey, late of Alfred-street, Bath, Esq., deceased, which came before the court in the shape of a petition by the said E. F. De Lancey to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and to the Lord Chief Baron and the rest of the Barons of the Court of Exchequer, and which petition set forth the case as follows:

1. That the above-named James De Lancey, by his will dated the 15th Nov. 1799, gave and bequeathed unto trustees, and to the survivors and survivor of them his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, the capital sum of 10,000*l.* Three per cent. Consolidated Bank Annuities, and also all such several sum and sums of money which might be due to him at the time of his decease in exchequer bills, navy bills, India bonds, or any other public floating securities, upon trust that they his said trustees, and the survivors or survivor of them, his executors, administrators, or assigns, should lay out and invest both principal and interest moneys therefrom arising in the purchase of lands, tenements, and hereditaments situate, lying, and being in that part of Great Britain called England, the same to be of the nature of freehold or copyhold, convenient to be held therewith, and of no other estate or tenure whatsoever, and convey, settle, and assure the said lands, tenements, and hereditaments so to be purchased as aforesaid, or cause and procure the same to be conveyed, settled, and assured, to the uses and subject to the provisoes following, that is to say, to the use of his eldest son Charles Stephen De Lancey and his assigns for life, without impeachment of waste, remainder to his said trustees and their heirs, to preserve contingent remainders, remainder to the first and other sons of the said Charles Stephen De Lancey, and the heirs male of his and their body and bodies lawfully to be begotten, successively in tail male, and in default of such issue, to the use of testator's son James De Lancey, and his assigns for life, without impeachment of waste, remainder to his said trustees and their heirs, to preserve contingent remainders, remainder to the first and other sons of the said James De Lancey, and the heirs male of his and their body and bodies lawfully to be begotten, successively in tail male, and in default of such issue then to his own right heirs for ever.

2. That the said testator died on the 8th April 1800, without having revoked or altered his said will, and the same will was on the 7th May 1800 duly proved in the Prerogative Court of the Archbishop of Canterbury.

3. That the testator left two sons, of whom the said Charles Stephen De Lancey was the eldest, and he was the testator's heir-at-law.

4. That the said sum of 10,000*l.* Consols and the other securities directed to be laid out in the purchase of real estate (represented by 3047*l.* 8*s.* 1*d.* Consols) were never so laid out.

5. That the said Charles Stephen De Lancey died a bachelor and intestate on the 6th May 1840. The dividends on the two funds representing the real estate fund were paid to him during his life.

6. That he left his brother, the said James De Lancey, him surviving; and he the said James De Lancey died, also a bachelor and intestate, on the 26th May 1857. The dividends on the real estate funds were paid to him during his life.

7. That at the death of James De Lancey (the son), the only lineal descendant of the testator was Susan, otherwise called Susanna De Lancey, his only surviving child, and who then became his heir-at-law.

8. That she died on the 7th April 1866 a spinster and intestate.

9. That the said Susan, otherwise Susanna De Lancey, did not receive, but on the contrary refused to receive either dividends or principal of the money left under her father's will.

10. That shortly after her death the two sums representing the real estate fund and the dividends thereon from and including the July dividend in 1857 (the next dividend that accrued after the death of James De Lancey the son) were (with other property belonging to the testator) transferred and paid into the Court of Chancery, and two suits, Hammond v. Allen, 1867, H. No. 65, and De Lancey v. Hammond, 1867, D. No. 27, were instituted for the purpose of administering these funds.

11. That the Master of the Rolls made one decree in both suits, dated the 25th April 1867, and by this decree the usual inquiries and accounts were directed.

12. That the chief clerk of the Master of the Rolls to whom the suits were allotted found by his certificate, dated the 18th, and approved by the judge and filed the 25th March 1868, the following facts:—The heir-at-law of the testator at the time of his death was the said Charles Stephen De Lancey, his eldest son. The person now such heir-at-law, and entitled to any real estate of which the testator might have died intestate, was your petitioner, Edward Floyd de Lancey. The heir-at-law of the said Charles Stephen De Lancey at the time of his death was his brother, the said James De Lancey. The heir-at-law of the said James De Lancey at the time of his death was his sister, the said Susanna, otherwise called Susan De Lancey. The heir-at-law of the said Susanna, otherwise called Susan De Lancey, at the time of her death, was and is your petitioner, Edward Floyd De Lancey. The person now entitled to any real estate of which the said Charles Stephen De Lancey, James De Lancey (the son), and Susanna, otherwise Susan De Lancey, respectively might have died intestate, and the heir-at-law of them respectively was your petitioner, the said Edward Floyd De Lancey, a grandson of John Peter De Lancey, a brother of the testator. The chief clerk also found that "none of the persons who would for the time being have been entitled to any real estate of which the testator had died intestate did, while so entitled, any act with reference to the 10,000*l.* Consols, or any other money by the testator's will directed to be laid out in the purchase of land, which might amount to or have the effect of an election to take that sum or any such other money as money or as land, or might have the effect of constituting such person or persons a new root or new roots of descent with regard to that sum or any such other money." The chief clerk then certified that the dividends which accrued on the said 10,000*l.* Consols from the death of the said James De Lancey (the son), including July 1857 to and including Jan. 1866, amounting to 2617*l.* 10*s.* were payable to the legal personal representative of the said Susan De Lancey, and that the said 10,000*l.* Consols, with the dividends thereon, from and including July 1866, amounting to 588*l.* 15*s.*, were transferable and payable to your petitioner, the said Edward Floyd De Lancey. The chief clerk found that the 3047*l.* 8*s.* 1*d.* Consols were no part of the fund directed to be laid out in the purchase of real estate; but this finding was reversed and altered on appeal to the Lords Justices of Appeal, as after mentioned.

13. That by the order on further consideration dated the 2nd June 1868, the said 2617*l.* 10*s.* were directed to be paid to the legal personal representative of the said Susan De Lancey, and (subject to duty) the 10,000*l.* Consols and the said 588*l.* 15*s.* cash were ordered to be transferred and paid to your petitioner, the said Edward Floyd De Lancey, and the 3047*l.* 8*s.* 1*d.* Consols were directed to be dealt with as part of Charles Stephen De Lancey's personal estate; but this direction was reversed and altered by the order of the Lords Justices of Appeal hereinafter mentioned.

14. That by an order of the Right Honourable the Lords Justices of Appeal, dated the 23rd July 1868, the said 3047*l.* 8*s.* 1*d.* Consols were declared to form part of the real estate fund, and it was ordered that they (subject to duty) should be transferred to your petitioner, the said Edward Floyd De Lancey, and the dividends thereon, from and including July 1857 to and including Jan. 1866, were (subject to duty) directed to be paid to the legal personal representative of the said Susan De Lancy, and the dividends thereon from and including July 1866 were (subject to duty) directed to be paid to your petitioner, the said Edward Floyd De Lancey.

15. That the commissioners of Inland Revenue, on the 3rd Aug. 1868, made an assessment against your petitioner, the said Edward Floyd De Lancey, whereby he was required to pay succession duty on the said aggregate sum of 13,047*l.* 8*s.* 1*d.* Consols, and certain dividends thereon at the rate of 5 per cent., on the ground of the same being a succession to him derived from the said Susan De Lancy, the predecessor (of a brother of the father of whom he was a descendant.)

16. That your petitioner, by his solicitors, delivered to the said commissioners, within twenty-one days after the date of the said assessment, notice in writing of his intention to appeal against such assessment, and afterwards your petitioner, by his solicitors, duly delivered a statement of the grounds of such appeal to the said commissioners.

That the grounds of appeal contained in the said statement are; first, that legacy duty and not succession duty was payable by him in respect of the aforesaid 13,047*l.* 8*s.* 1*d.* Consols, and the dividends thereon, and that such legacy duty was properly payable by him as being a descendant of a brother of the deceased (the said James De Lancey the testator), at the rate of 2½ per cent., under or by virtue of the Act 36 Geo. 3, c. 52; or secondly, that if succession duty, and not legacy duty, was payable by your petitioner, the said Edward Floyd De Lancey, in respect of the said 13,047*l.* 8*s.* 1*d.* Consols and dividends, such succession duty was payable by him as being the descendant of a brother of the said James De Lancey, the testator, under the Succession Duty Act 1853, at the rate of 3 per cent. only (and not at the rate of 5 per cent.) in respect of the same sum of Consols and the dividends thereon, as being a succession derived by him (not from the said Susan De Lancey, but) from the said James De Lancey (the testator) the predecessor.

That your petitioner is dissatisfied with the assessment of the said commissioners, and aggrieved thereby, and submits to your Lordships that the same ought to be altered or varied; and he therefore humbly prays your Lordships that the assessment of the said commissioners may be altered or varied so far as the same makes your petitioner liable to a duty of 5 per cent.; or that your Lordships will be pleased to make such other order in the premises as to your Lordships shall seem fit.

The following Acts of Parliament, and the several sections thereof respectively, were referred to and relied on by counsel in the argument, and by the court as material to the case:—

The Legacy Duty Act (36 Geo. 3, c. 52), sect. 19, enacts that—

Any sum of money, or personal estate, directed to be applied in the purchase of real estate, shall be charged with and pay duty as personal estate, unless the same shall be so given as to be enjoyed by different persons in succession, and then each person entitled in succession shall pay duty for the same in the same manner as if the same had not been directed to be applied in the purchase of real estate, unless the same shall have been actually applied in the purchase of real estate before such duty accrued; but no duty shall accrue in respect thereof after the same shall have been actually applied in the purchase of real estate for so much thereof as shall have been so applied, provided, nevertheless, that in case before the same, or some part thereof, shall be actually so applied, any person or persons shall become entitled to an estate of inheritance in possession in the real estate to be purchased therewith, or with so much thereof as shall not have been applied in the purchase of real estate, the duty which ought to be paid by such person or persons if absolutely entitled thereto as personal estate, by virtue of any bequest thereof as such, shall be charged on such person or persons, and raised and paid out of the fund remaining to be applied in such purchase.

The Succession Duty Act 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 51), by the several sections which are material, enacts as follows:—

Sect. 2:

Every past or future disposition of property, by reason whereof any person has or shall become beneficially entitled to any property, or the income thereof, upon the death of any person dying after the time appointed for the commencement of this Act, either immediately or after any interval, either certainly or contingently, and either originally or by any substitutive limitation; and every devolution by law of any beneficial interest in property, or the income thereof, upon the death of any person dying after the time appointed for the commencement of this Act, to any other person in possession, or in expectancy, shall be deemed to have conferred, or to confer, on the person entitled by reason of any such disposition or devolution a "succession," and the term "successor" shall denote the person so entitled; and the term "predecessor" shall denote the settlor, disponer, testator, obligor, ancestor, or other person from whom the interest of the "successor" is or shall be derived.

Sect. 10 enacts that,

There shall be levied and paid to Her Majesty, in respect of every such succession as aforesaid, according to the value thereof, the following duties, that is to say,

The several rates of duty, according to consanguinity are then set forth, and are shortly as follows:

Parents and lineal issue	1	per cent.
Brothers or sisters, and their descendants	3	"
Uncles or aunts, and their descendants	5	"
Granduncles or grandaunts, and their descendants	6	"
More remote relations, and strangers in blood	10	"

Sect. 30 enacts that,

The interest of any successor in personal property, subject to any trusts for the investment thereof in the purchase of real property to which the successor would be absolutely entitled, shall, so far as the same shall not be chargeable with duty under the Legacy Duty Acts, be chargeable with duty under this Act as personal property; and personal property subject to any trust for the investment thereof in the purchase of real property, to which the successor would not be absolutely entitled, shall, so far as the same shall not be chargeable with duty under the Legacy Duty Acts, be chargeable with duty under this Act, as real property; and for the purpose of this Act each successor's interest therein shall be considered to be of the value of an annuity payable during his life, or for any less period during which he shall be entitled, equal in amount to the annual produce of the actual trust property at the time of his becoming entitled in possession, whether the same shall be the real property directed to be purchased, or any intermediate investment of the personal property directed to be invested in such purchase.

By sect. 50 the right of appeal against the assessment of duty is given to the accountable party.

Sir J. B. Karslake, Q. C. (with him was Townsend of the Chancery Bar) appeared to argue the case on the part of the appellant, and claimed the right to begin. The only question, he said, here was, as to the amount of duty payable, and it lay on the petitioner to show that it was less than the Crown demanded. The practice in this court in such cases as the present was for the appellant to begin; counsel for the Crown were then heard, after which the appellant replied, and the Crown had the right of general final reply. That was so laid down and settled in The Marquis of Chandos v. The Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 6 Ex. 464; 20 L. J. 269, Ex., which was a case stated under sect. 15 of 13 & 14 Vict. c. 97, to enable the marquis to appeal from the decision of the commissioners assessing the stamp duty payable on a certain deed, wherein the majority of the Court of Exchequer, Parke, Platt, and Martin, BB. were of opinion (Pollock, C.B. dissentiente) that the appellant had the right to begin; and the court were unanimous that the Crown had the right to a general reply. This course has been followed in several subsequent cases, amongst others in the case of Re Stamp Duty on Gills' Conveyance, 8 Ex. 376 (reported also nom, The Plymouth Great Western Dock Company v. The Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 22 L. J. 188, Ex.;) Re Micklethwaite and The Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 11 Ex. 452, which was a petition against the decision of the commissioners under the Succession Duty Act 1853, in which the Crown claimed the right to begin as supporting the argument for the assessment, but this court, then consisting of Parke, Alderson, and Platt, BB., held that the petitioner was entitled to begin; and in the recent case, under the Stamp Act, of Lord Foley and others v. The Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 725; L. Rep. 3 Ex. 263; 37 L. J. 109 Ex. The same course also was followed in the case of Re Earl Cowley's Succession, 14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 663; 35 L. J. 177, Ex; L. Rep. 1, Ex. 288, and the petitioner was first heard in accordance with the practice as settled in Micklethwaite's case.

KELLY, C.B.—I own that it appears to me that in every case where the Crown claims a tax, or seeks to impose a tax upon the subject, it would be convenient that the Crown should begin.

BRAMWELL, B.—Is not this case in the nature of an appeal from a decision?

KELLY, C.B. (their Lordships having consulted together.)—My learned brothers are of opinion that in this case the course of practice which was laid down by the court in The Marquis of Chandos case, in the 6th Exchequer, and has been followed in Re Micklethwaite and the subsequent cases, had better be adhered to; although I confess that I individually am still of opinion that the contrary course would be more convenient. We will therefore hear you, Sir John, for the appellant in the first instance. (a)

Sir J. B. Karslake, Q.C. then proceeded to argue for the appellant.—Two propositions will be contended for on the appellant's behalf as far as the question of duty is concerned under this will: First, that legacy duty, and not succession duty, is payable by the appellant; and, secondly, that if succession duty is payable it is payable as upon a succession, not from the testator, but as heir of Susan De Lancy, who was the last person entitled. The question turns on sect. 10 of the Succession Duty Act 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 51). If Susan were the "predecessor," the duty would be 5 per cent., but if the testator were such, then only 3 per cent. No application of any part of this money has ever been made in the purchase of land, and there has been no election on the part of anyone entitled to it to take it as personal estate. Under the trusts of the will it became land in equity, and so remained until such application or election. Any person becoming entitled to it might have declared an intention to take it as money, but nobody did so. Susan became entitled under the terms of the will to an estate in fee as heir to the testator, and having made no election the money at her death remained in the trustees' hands as money to be laid out in land. That being so, then by sects. 18 and 30 of the Succession Duty Act, legacy duty and not succession duty is payable upon it, and being money not laid out in land it is liable under sect. 19 of the Legacy Duty Act (36 Geo. 3, c. 52) to a duty of 2½ per cent. Then comes the question, who was the predecessor of the appellant? (He here read sects. 1 and 2 of the Succession Duty Act.) On the testator's death his son Charles took an estate as right heir, and might have disposed of the fee of the whole property. It was the same also with the second son James, and so also with the daughter Susan. Upon her death, inasmuch as she took not by purchase, the last purchaser must be found. The law of inheritance or the mode of tracing descent having been altered by the 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 106, the person now to be traced back to is not the person who was last seised, but the one who was the last purchaser. Susan de Lancey, took by descent or inheritance and not by purchase, and therefore as the petitioner must take as heir to the last purchaser, it is needful to go back behind Susan, James, and Charles, to the testator for that purpose: (sects. 2 and 11 of the 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 106.) Though the two characters of heir to Susan and heir also to the last purchaser, may co-exist in the person of the appellant, he must nevertheless take in the latter character. True it is he takes a succession on Susan's death, but he takes no interest from her. Were he only heir to her and not the last purchaser, he would not be entitled to this property at all. The Crown say that Susan is the predecessor. The appellant, on the contrary, contends that the only person who can possibly answer the description of "predecessor" to this "successor," is the testator, who by his will made this sum of money what may be called "money land," and imposed on the trustees the obligation to lay it out in land. But for the limitations of that will, the appellant could not take at all, or have any right to call on the trustees to invest the money. If that be so, then he is entitled, if succession duty be payable, to be assessed at the lower rate of 3 per cent. as on a succession from the testator. But it is submitted that, under sect. 30 of the Succession Duty Act, he is not liable to such duty at all; but that a legacy duty of 2½ per cent under sect. 19 of the Legacy Duty Act is the proper duty.

The Attorney-General (Sir R. P. Collier, Q.C., with him the Solicitor-General, Sir J. D. Coleridge, Q.C., and Crompton Hutton) contra, for the Crown.—This was not a legacy but a succession, and the predecessor was Susan or her elder brother, it was immaterial, as regarded the duty, which. It could not be a legacy except it were taken under a will, and here the whole operation of the will was completed before it came to view. On the testator's death the elder brother, Charles, took an immediate vested life interest in the whole property, with a remainder in fee, and the will at that moment had complete operation, the ultimate remainder vesting in the elder son with an interest in the second son, James; and upon Charles's death James took. [KELLY, C. B.—You say that Charles took a remainder in fee under the will; then why did not Susan?] I agree with Sir John Karslake, that Susan took by descent. All the provisions of the will were exhausted in the two sons. The cases and authorities show that the ultimate devise took complete effect on the testator's death: (2 Jarm. Wills. 77, 3rd edit., and the several cases there cited.) One of these cases, Wrightson v. Macaulay, 14 M. & W. 214; 15 L. J., N. S., 121 Ex., is much in point, and very similar to the present case.

(a) See the case of Re the Estate and Effects of Greenwood, deceased, ante p. 25, argued on the same day, in which the counsel for the Crown was directed by the court to begin.

Digitized by Google

Both the sons took as purchasers, and whether one of them or Susan be the "predecessor" is immaterial. The appellant relies on sect. 19 of 36 Geo. 3, c. 52, but that statute cannot extend the operation of a will of which the provisions are already exhausted. [KELLY, C. B.—My difficulty is to see how you get out of the 19th section.] I do not feel pressed by it. This is no legacy. The succession was at an end on the death of the second son. The words in sect. 19, "so given as to be enjoyed by different persons in succession," mean persons named in a will. [BRAMWELL, B.—Then, but for the Succession Duty Act you say there would be no duty payable here at all.] None. It falls within the latter part of sect. 2 of the Succession Duty Act: (Lord Saltoun v. The Advocate-General of Scotland, in the House of Lords, 3 Macq. H. of L. Cas. 659. [BRAMWELL, B.—Is it possible that legacy duty may be due from Charles under sect. 19, and also succession duty from the petitioner?] Susan did not take under the will at all, and the appellant put himself out of court when he said she took by descent, for clearly she cannot take in both ways. [CHANNELL, B.—Would she not have taken precisely the same interest if there had been no will? If so, that would seem to show that she did not take under the will.] The estate in tail never came into operation at all. James, the second son, took a life estate and a remainder in fee, subject to the possibility of his having issue, who would have taken in estate tail. He had no issue, and so had the whole fee, which on his death, passed to Susan by descent as his heir. The effect of the will was to impress on this personal property the character of land, so that it became land for the purposes of the will as well as for the purposes of inheritance, and though the operation of the will was at an end, and exhausted it would go on ad infinitum as land. It went to Susan by succession, and to the claimant by "devolution," and so it would go on in secula seculorum. [BRAMWELL, B.—It is clear to me that the appellant has no title under this will, and for this reason: it appears doubtful whether Charles or James or Susan took under the will, but if either of them did, he or she might have devised away the whole fee. Why then did this claimant take? Because the others did not dispose of the estate in fee, and so he takes not under the will, but by descent from them.] The effect of the argument on the other side would be to impose legacy duty for ever on this fund, and sect. 30 of the Succession Duty Act would be needless. The object of the Act of Parliament was to treat certain dispositions as legacies which otherwise would not be such; but it would be beyond the scope and object of the Act to tax them as land. [CHANNELL, B.—You have argued that the trusts of the will were exhausted on the death of the second brother, and so far I am inclined to agree with you. CLEASBY, B. refers to East v. Twyford, 9 Ha. 713. BRAMWELL, B.—I cannot but think that Susan is liable to pay duty upon the latter part of sect. 19; and though, as Sir John Karslake contends, she is not liable to pay legacy duty as a daughter, it shows that the appellant is not that person. It seems to me there is an inevitable dilemma for the appellant in this first point; either the will was operative or it was not, and if it was then either Charles or James or Susan was the person pointed out by the latter part of sect 19.] And now as to the second point, I contend, first, that Susan was the "predecessor," and, secondly, if not, then that James was, and either is sufficient for the Crown's purpose. Sir J. Karslake has confounded together two Acts, which were passed diverso intuitu, and has treated the Inheritance Act (3 & 4 Will 4, c. 106), as governing this question which I contend arises solely on the Succession Duty Act. In Lord Saltoun v. The Advocate-General, in the House of Lords (ubi sup.), the point decided was as to the distinction between property taken by disposition and devolution, and between what lawyers call taking by purchase and by descent. Here it is admitted by the appellant even, that Susan was the last possessor. But sect. 2 of the Inheritance Act, relied on contra, does not apply to the Succession Duty Act. But assuming that we must show claimant's descent from the last purchaser, then either Susan or James was such I say that James was, and that Susan took, not as devisee, but as his heir, and took therefore from the last purchaser, and was the person last in possession. I say that Charles was a purchaser, but it is enough to say that James was, and that Susan took by inheritance from him.

Sir J. Karslake, Q. C., in reply.—The authorities at Somerset House treat Susan as the predecessor, but the Attorney-General sets up a different case, and says it was Charles or James. If this money-land went as personalty, then cadit questio; but if the Lords Justices are right, there was clearly an estate of inheritance in it. Let it once be taken to be land, then it is immaterial what the will says if it gets into the hands of the heir. The proposition of the exhaustion of the will is denied altogether. It is solely in consequence of the will being in existence and treating the money as land that the appellant now takes. Had this been land simply at the date of the will there might possibly have been no legacy duty. Sect. 19 of the 36 Geo. 3 was passed to prevent the frauds on the revenue which might otherwise have been perpetrated by a testator leaving money with a direction to lay it out in land, and the parties entitled discharging the trustees from the obligation. There are distinct words of charge in the section, and anybody taking that money pays the duty, and considering what the doctrine of equity is, and that anyone taking this property may elect to take it as money, it is only reasonable that he should pay the duty. Neither of the two sons nor the daughter here did aught to alter the state of things, and it went not as money to the next of kin, but as land or money-land to the heir. [BRAMWELL, B.—Suppose Susan had been liable and had paid duty under sect. 19, would the appellant also be?] Certainly. [BRAMWELL, B.—I say certainly not. I have no doubt about it.] Had this been money, every person to whom it came would have had to pay, and the Legislature says you shall not escape duty by making it land in equity. [CLEASBY, B.—The Act applies only to personal estate, and only gives duties on personal estate. BRAMWELL, B. — Probably enough the Legislature may have intended to guard against the fraud you have alluded to, and so made provision for the duty being paid once for all, as upon any other legacy. It might also, had it so chosen to do, have guarded against it for a series of years; but what is the language of the Act? His Lordship read the section.] With submission, if that argument is correct, would not the Act have gone on to say, and from and after the time when duty had been paid on the whole or on any such part, &c., all further duty shall cease? But we find no such words. Then as to the other point. The 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 106, is not immaterial:

> Hayford and others v. Benlows and another, 2 Ambl. 580;
>
> Tregonwell v. Sydenham and another, 3 Dow. H. L. Cas. 210.

The doctrine of equity is that money directed to be laid out in land is land at the testator's death, and if there be no disposition of it, the heir takes by inheritance; and it can make no difference that there are specific uses declared in the land. If it be given to A. and B., and afterwards to the right heirs, there must be some person who, ex concessus, must be treated as the last purchaser. Lord Saltoun's case, as cited contra, does not apply, but there are parts of the judgment, pp. 672–673, which do. Then as to the exhaustion of the will. This is money-land, with the character of land impressed on it by the terms of the testator's will. The moment anyone elects to alter its character, the title of the right heir to it would cease, and it is only because its character remains that the present claimant takes, and not the next of kin. He takes by virtue of the will and by that alone. If he takes by disposition, he takes from the testator, and if by descent, he takes from the heir of the testator. [Cleasby, B., refers to sect. 5 of the 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 106, enacting that every descent from a brother or sister shall be traced through the parent.]

The Attorney-General replied generally on the whole case.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 2.—The court being divided in opinion, their Lordships now delivered judgment, seriatim, as follows:—

Cleasby, B.—I have to deliver the judgment of my brother Bramwell and myself. In this case the petitioner Edward Floyd De Lancey succeeded as heir-at-law of one Susan De Lancey to a large sum of money, which had by the will of one James De Lancey, dated 15th Nov. 1799, been directed to be laid out in land, and to which the said Susan De Lancey had, under the provisions of that will, become absolutely entitled. The question is, with what succession duty, if any, the petitioner is chargeable under the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 51. In the view which I take of the case, the particular limitations of the will are not of importance. It is sufficient to say that the testator bequeathed 10,000*l.* Consols, and all moneys due to him at his death upon certain securities, to trustees upon trust to lay out the same, and interest thereupon, in the purchase of lands, and directed the lands to be conveyed and settled to the use of his eldest son Charles Stephen for life, with remainder to the first and other sons of Charles Stephen successively in tail male; and in default of issue to his son James for life, with remainder to the first and other sons of James successively in tail male; and in default of such issue then to his own right heirs. The money was not in fact laid out in land by the trustees, and Charles Stephen De Lancey died a bachelor and intestate in 1840, having received the dividends during his life. James De Lancey survived, and also received the dividends during his life, and died a bachelor intestate in 1857. Susan De Lancey was the only surviving lineal descendant of the testator, and upon the death of James became absolutely entitled to the fund, but she refused to receive any part of the principal or interest. No act was done at any time to prevent the fund from being impressed with the character of land given to it by the will, and there is no question that, upon the death of Susan, it descended, as land would descend, to the petitioner, her heir-at-law. If this fund had been really land then, as Susan was absolutely entitled or seised in fee, it would not matter how she became so, and the succession to the petitioner would be by devolution, and not by disposition. That being so I adopt the rule laid down by Lord Campbell in the case of Lord Saltoun v. The Advocate-General, 3 McQ. App. Cas. 659. His words at page 673 are, "This object, I think, will be best obtained by holding that, when the succession is by disposition, the settlor is the 'predecessor,' and when by devolution the last possessor is the 'predecessor.'" So that, in the present case, Susan would be the predecessor, and the duty, as upon a succession from her would be 5 per cent. But it was strongly urged at the bar, on behalf of the petitioner, that though this might have been the case if the fund had been actually land, yet as it was actually money and only land by the operation and effect of the will of the testator, the above rule cannot properly be applied. The concluding words of sect. 2 of the Succession Duty Act were referred to, by which the "predecessor" is to denote "the settlor, disponer, testator, obligor, ancestor, or other person from whom the interest of the successor is or shall be derived," and it was said that the interest of the successor, as heir-at-law to the fund in question, was necessarily derived from the testator, who had impressed the fund with the character of land, and so made it go to the petitioner as heir-at-law. This argument, though well deserving of attention, is not sufficient to satisfy me that the interest of the petitioner is derived from any other person but Susan, who was absolutely entitled to the fund, and whom the petitioner succeeded as heir-at-law, and when well examined is open to the objection that it confounds together two things which are properly distinct, viz., the person from whom the interest is immediately derived, and the person who remotely caused it to be so derived. In the present case the whole interest is derived from Susan, no one would say it was partly derived from her and partly from the testator; still less that it was wholly derived from the testator, since Susan might have at any time changed its character and prevented it from descending as it did, or have disposed of it in any manner she thought proper. Supposing, then, that the succession duty is payable, I am of opinion that it is payable as upon a succession from Susan, that is at the rate of 5 per cent. But it was also argued on behalf of the petitioner that he was not liable to succession duty at all, because he was properly liable for legacy duty in respect of the property which he had succeeded to as heir of Susan; and by the 18th section of the Succession Duty Act 1853, there was no liability for succession duty when there was a liability under the Legacy Duty Acts. I should have thought it a sufficient answer to this argument that the succession of the petitioner was a succession to real estate as heir at law, and not to personal estate through the executors or administrators; that Susan died entitled to real estate and not personal estate; that the fund in question is, throughout the case, called real estate and not personal estate, and that the Legacy Duty Acts only apply in terms, and can only apply to personal estate. But, as I understand that two of my learned brothers are of a different opinion, I am probably mistaken in supposing the above reasons to be sufficient. It is necessary, therefore, to examine the matter a little more fully. The testator, by his will, disposed of personal estate, and that personal estate ought, of course, to pay legacy duty through all the limitations. Charles Stephen was, therefore, liable to legacy duty in respect of his life estate, as what he took was part of the personal estate of the testator; and in the same manner James, and afterwards Susan, who then became absolutely entitled. But as soon as she became absolutely entitled, it became her real estate absolutely, and the will, of course would operate no further. Ever since the case of Fletcher v. Ashburner, reported in 1 Brown's Ch. Cas. 497, it has been considered that after a direction in a will to trustees to apply money in the purchase of land, the money in the hands of the trustees is for all purposes regarded as land. It was said there by Sir Thomas Sewell, Master of the Rolls, that the cases established universally that a man may in this and the converse case, "make land money, and money land," and this, as a correct statement of the law, has been repeatedly upheld: (See Wheldale v. Partridge, 5 Ves. 774.) The money becomes impressed with the character of land so completely that it becomes subject to tenancy by the courtesy. Sweetapple v. Bindon, 2 Ver. 536, and was not, until the passing of 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 104, liable to simple contract debts of the devisor though it would be bound as real assets by a judgment: (Frederick v. Aynsomb, 1 Atk. 792.) That being so, the fund being stamped with the character of realty, descends to the heir without the intervention of an executor or administrator, and there can hardly, as it appears to me, be a question that but for the 19th section of the 36 Geo. 3, c. 52, no legacy duty would be payable. But it is contended that under that section the fund is also liable to legacy duty until it is actually laid out in land. If, however, that section is examined, it will, I think, appear that it can have no such effect. That fixed the legacy duty payable in respect of the personal estate of a testator, who directs it to be laid out in land. It provides that so long as the fund is administered and distributed as the personal estate of the testator it shall pay legacy duty. The persons who take successive interests in it would, therefore, have to pay legacy duty, and the ultimate devisee who became absolutely entitled would pay legacy duty, but as soon as it has vested in him the will of the testator has no longer any operation, and it becomes his real estate, and descends to his heir, at heir-at-law, or devisee. There is, in fact, no executor or administrator to make any return of the person or persons entitled to this real estate, or of the scale upon which legacy duty would be payable, except under the Succession Duty Act. It must be borne in mind that, although the effect of the will is to convert the money into land, and so to make it in the hands of the devisee real estate, yet it was, at the death of the testator, his personal estate, and so continued until the will was fully administered; although the clause in question, after the money or any part of it has actually been laid out in land, exempts it pro tanto from the payment of legacy duty so far as regards the devisees subsequently taking it under the will. One argument resorted to on behalf of the petitioner was, that unless the fund continued always liable to legacy duty, until actually laid out in land, a testator would have the power, by such a direction, to exempt his estate for all time from legacy duty. But we have seen that, so far as the limitations of his will extend, the case is properly provided for; and, except in the case of minority, and of the person entitled dying a minor, or of some eccentric person, like Susan de Lancey, who refused to take the interest or principal, as soon as a person becomes absolutely entitled, the fund, would be handed over to him, and so "get home" (as the phrase is), and resume the character of personal estate. The case of a person becoming entitled to the fund under the will is provided for, but the case of the same person dying entitled to, as real estate, what he took as personal estate, was not contemplated, and therefore was not provided for, and there was, as far as I can see, no machinery for getting the legacy duty, or indeed of fixing the amount, as there is no executor or administrator to administer it. It seems to me, therefore, that the duty is payable in this case under the Succession Duty Act, and not under the Legacy Duty Act, and that the Crown is entitled to judgment at the rate of 5 per cent.

Bramwell, B.—I am sorry that there should be a difference on the bench in this case, because I think it will be found that we arrive at the same conclusion, only by different paths. The petitioner here prays that the assessment of the commissioners may be altered or varied, so far as the same makes your petitioner liable to a duty at 5 per cent. Now it strikes me that, on the view which I know is taken by my Lord Chief Baron and my brother Channell, the petitioner will be liable to a duty of 5 per cent. as upon an intestacy, as I understand, of the person under whom he took. However, I think that this sect. 19 of the 36 Geo. 3, c. 52 is not applicable. It begins by saying "Any sum of money or personal estate directed to be applied to the purchase of real estate shall be charged and pay duty as personal estate." If the enactment stood there it seems manifest that the same money so applied would pay duty once for all; but it goes on and says, "unless it shall be so given as to be enjoyed by different persons in succession, and then each person entitled thereunto in succession shall pay duty for the same, in the same manner as if the same had not been directed to be applied in the purchase of real estate." And then it proceeds, "Provided nevertheless that in case before the same, or some part thereof shall be actually so applied, any person or persons shall become entitled to an estate of inheritance in possession in the real estate to be purchased therewith, or with so much thereof as shall not have been applied in the purchase of real estate, the same duty which ought to be applied to each person or persons." Therefore it seems to me the scheme of the Act is this,—the money so left shall pay legacy duty; if there are life interests in it short of an estate of inheritance, the legatees shall pay in respect of them, and when there comes to be an estate of inheritance, then the duty shall be paid as if there had been no such life interests interposed; but it seems to me that duty on the estate of inheritance is to be paid once and once only, and is not to be paid toties quoties; and it seems to me impossible that it can be so, because, suppose money is left to be laid out in the purchase of an estate for the benefit of a stranger in blood to the testator, and that man dies before the money is laid out, his son would take; surely it cannot be intended that the son should pay another rate of duty as a stranger in blood to the testator. What in truth he ought to pay would be under the will of his father if the father had left a will, or as next of kin if the father had not left a will. It seems to me, therefore, that this sect. 19, or the latter part of it, cannot be read as though the words toties quoties were there; that is to say, so often as there is an estate of inheritance that money shall pay as upon a legacy left by the original testator. I think that cannot possibly be. Then I understand the Lord Chief Baron and my brother Channell to be of opinion, whether that be so or not, that at all events the money, inasmuch as it remained in the condition of money de facto must have paid, on the death of the person entitled to the estate of inheritance, in some sense a new duty. If that be so, then in this case the money would pay the duty as upon an intestacy, either by the Aunt Susan, or an intestacy of one of the two uncles; but all these three are dead after the coming into force of the statute of 1815, I think it is, which regulates the present amount of legacy duty, and duty on intestates' estates, and then it would be found that a duty of 5 per cent. would be payable. If, therefore, this sum of money is subject to a legacy duty, or to a duty as part of an intestacy on coming to the next of kin, it is subject to legacy duty as under the Legacy Duty Act, not under sect. 19, certainly, of the 36 Geo. 3, but is subject to a duty as upon a sum of money coming to the defendant as next of kin of his aunt, or either of his uncles, and as such it is subject to a duty of 5 per cent. On the other hand, if it is subject to a succession duty, then it appears to me, for the reasons given by my brother Cleasby, it is also subject to a duty of 5 per cent. Therefore, whether we treat this as a sum of money liable to a duty as a portion of an intestate's estate coming to the defendant, a nephew of the intestate, or whether we treat it as a sum of money subject to a succession duty under the Succession Duty Act, we must in either case say that it is subject to a duty of 5 per cent., and that therefore the prayer of the petition must be refused.

Digitized by Google

Kelly, C. B.—The first question raised in this case is whether the money to which the petitioner has become entitled upon the death of Susan, the daughter of the testator, is liable to the succession duty at all. By the 30th section of the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 51, the interest of any successor in personal property, and subject to any trust for investment thereof in the purchase of real property, to which the successor would be absolutely entitled, is made chargeable with duty under that Act as personal property, but so far only as it is not chargeable with duty under the Legacy Duty Acts. We must, therefore, consider whether this money is liable to duty under the Legacy Duty Act (36 Geo. 3, c. 52.) By the first section of this statute the duty is imposed upon the clear residue of the personal estate when devolving on one person, when the title to such residue shall accrue by virtue of any testamentary disposition, or upon a partial or total intestacy. This money then, devolving upon the petitioner, either by the testamentary disposition of the testator, or upon the intestacy of his daughter, would be liable to the duty, unless it be exempt by reason of the direction to lay it out in land; and by the 19th section, the duty attaches by express enactment upon money directed to be so applied. The question, therefore, is, whether this section imposes the duty upon the money to which the petitioner is entitled in the present case? Now the enactment is, that "any sum of money or personal estate directed to be so applied in the purchase of real estate shall be charged with and pay duty as personal estate." If it stopped here it is clear that it would charge all money to whose hands soever it might come, and under whatever circumstances directed to be applied; but it proceeds, "unless the same shall be so given as to be enjoyed by different persons in succession, and then each person entitled thereto in succession shall pay duty for the same in the same manner as if the same had not been directed to be applied in the purchase of real estate (unless it shall actually have been invested)." Now, supposing this to apply to the two sons only, as they alone take in succession under the limitations of this will, they would be liable under the 8th, 12th, and 18th sections to the duty imposed in respect to a temporary and limited, and not an absolute, interest in personal estate. If, however, the words be extended to the daughter, and the petitioner, as taking in succession under the will in another sense, namely, by virtue of the provision in the will that the money is to be laid out in land, and to pass to the heir and not to the next of kin, it equally becomes liable to the duty upon personal estate under this Act. But if otherwise, and if the words attach only to the succession of the sons, we come next to the proviso that "in case, before the money is actually laid out, any person shall become entitled to an estate of inheritance in possession in the real estate to be purchased therewith, the same duty which ought to be paid by such person or persons, if absolutely entitled thereto as personal estate by virtue of any bequest thereof, shall be paid by such person or persons." I cannot ascribe any other meaning to these words than such as they naturally import, and that is, that where money is given, as here, to be laid out in land, and any person or persons before it is actually so laid out shall become entitled to an estate of inheritance in possession in the land to be purchased, he or they shall pay the same duty as ought to be paid by him or them if absolutely entitled thereto as personal estate. The petitioner is strictly and literally within the words of this provision, for before the money is laid out in land, he may become entitled to an estate of inheritance in possession in the land to be purchased. Why then shall he not pay, in the express language of the Act, "the same duty which ought to be paid by such person if absolutely entitled thereto as personal estate by virtue of any bequest thereof?" It has been suggested that this proviso applies only to the first of such persons or successors becoming entitled to an estate of inheritance in possession in the land, but what is there to authorise this limited construction? The words are not "the first person or persons becoming entitled," but "any person or persons becoming entitled to an estate of inheritance." The petitioner is clearly a person becoming entitled to an estate of inheritance in the lands to be purchased, and comes therefore within the very words of the proviso. And why should it be otherwise? The Legislature plainly intended to impose this duty upon all money devised to be laid out in land, until it should actually be so laid out, and I am at a loss to imagine a reason why, if, as has occurred in this case, two persons successively, of whom the petitioner is one, have successively become entitled to one estate of inheritance in the land to be purchased, either of the two more than the other should be exempted from the liability to this duty. I think, therefore, the fund in question is clearly liable to duty under the 36 Geo. 3, and that therefore the succession duty does not attach; but I am by no means prepared to say that if this 19th section had been omitted altogether from the Act, the duty would not have been payable by virtue of its general provisions upon any money to be laid out in land until actually so laid out. The doctrine that money is to be treated as land, though long established in courts of equity, is in truth a mere fiction and no more, and founded upon what Lord Thurlow in Pulteney v. The Earl of Darlington, called "the cant expression that in equity what is to be done is considered as done:" (1 Brown's Ch. Cas. 238; 7 Bro. Parl. Cas. 530, H. of L.) This fiction is indeed reasonable and just when applied to the succession of persons entitled under the limitations of a will or settlement, because it is necessary, in order to give effect to the intention of the testator or settlor that the property should pass in the same line of succession as if it was land, and therefore, in case of intestacy, to the heir and not to the next of kin. But here the necessity for the fiction ends; and why should it be extended when no such necessity or reason exists? Why should the Crown be precluded from claiming in respect of any money whatever, while it is in fact money, duties imposed upon all personal estate by Act of Parliament, merely because its deceased owner may have directed it to be laid out in land, when it is remembered that, as this very case shows, property clothed with the trust may pass not only through a long succession of persons entitled to limited interests, but from generation to generation, or a succession of heirs entitled to an absolute interest in the whole property? It cannot be supposed that the Legislature intended to confer a power upon anyone who might think fit to execute such a trust to exempt his personal estate from duties to which it is liable by law for an indefinite period of time. I am of opinion, that the principle or equitable fiction upon which courts of equity have so long held that money so to be laid out in land is for certain purposes to be treated as land, is inapplicable to the interpretation of the statute imposing duties upon personal estate; that these statutes must be read according to the plain and ordinary meaning of the language which the Legislature has used, and consequently that this money, not having been actually laid out in land, is liable to duty as personal estate under the Legacy Duty Acts. Virtually the equitable rule ceases to apply where anyone becomes entitled to an absolute interest in money to be laid out in land, and has himself the power to put an end to the trust by treating it as money, and requiring it to be paid over to himself, or doing any other act testifying his election to treat it as personal estate. This was determined in Chichester v. Bickerstaffe, 2 Ver. 295; that decision was indeed questioned by Lord Talbot in Lechmere v. Lechmere, Ca. temp. Talb. 90, and by Sir Joseph Jeykyll, in Lechmere v. The Earl of Carlisle, 3 Peere Williams, 221, but confirmed by Lord Thurlow in Pulteney v. The Earl of Darlington, 1 Brown's Chan. Cas. 238, and by the determination of the House of Lords in the same case, 7 Bro. Parl. Cases, 530 (Tomlin's edit.) See, also, 2 Powell on Devises, Jarman on Wills, and 1 Will. Exors., 585. Lord Eldon, in Wheldale v. Partridge, on appeal from the Master of the Rolls, 8 Ves. 227, observes, at p. 235, upon money impressed with the character of land, that "to put an end to that impression it must be shown, either that the money was in the possession of a person who had in himself the rights of both heirs and executors, or he must do some act to denote a change of his intention as to the devolution of the property upon either." The result of these decisions, thus supported by the authority of Lord Eldon, who entirely approved of Pulteney v. The Earl of Darlington (ubi sup.), is to show that, in the words of Lord Thurlow, "where a sum of money is in the hands of one without any other use but for himself, it will be money:" (1 Brown's Chan. Cas. 238.) Here, the money at the death of the daughter, when the petitioner became entitled and the duty attached, was in the hands of the trustees and not of the petitioner, but I am of opinion that neither the letter nor the spirit of the Legacy Duty Acts admits of any distinction in the liability to duty between a legal and an equitable right to a sum of money, and that therefore the money in question was liable to duty under the 36 Geo. 3, and consequently was exempt from duty under the 16 & 17 Vict. I must here observe that no question was raised at the bar as to the amount or rate of legacy duty payable in respect of this money, supposing it liable to duty under the Legacy Duty Acts. On a question put by myself to one of the learned counsel during the argument of the case, an answer was given importing that the rate or amount of duty was not in question, and would easily be settled on assessment by the commissioners when the determination of this court should be made known. I have not therefore looked into the Legacy Duty Acts with a view to consider what would be the rate or amount of duty to which the petitioner would become liable, supposing him to be assessed under the Legacy Duty Act, and not under the Succession Duty Act. It may be that the amount of duty would be the same, so that he has the same interest, and is under the same liability whichever way this case shall be decided. But our object of course is to determine what is the law of the case on the question submitted to us, and I have therefore confined myself to that question. In this view of the case it may be unnecessary to express any opinion upon the question whether the testator or the daughter Susan is to be deemed the "predecessor" of the petitioner under the Succession Duty Act; but as a court of appeal may hold that this case is governed, not by the Legacy Duty Acts, but by the Succession Duty Act, I must state my opinion to be that, inasmuch as the petitioner became entitled to that money, not by reason of any "disposition" in the will of the testator, but by a "devolution by law," that is by the rule in equity which operated on the transmission or "devolution" of the money at law, the daughter Susan, and not the testator, must be deemed the "predecessor" of the petitioner, from whom his interest was derived, under the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 51, s. 2. As this is an appeal against the assessment of the petitioner to a duty under the Succession Duty Act, no question arises upon the rate or amount of duty to which he may be liable under the Legacy Duty Act, and I therefore express no opinion on that point. My brother Channell requests me to state that he is of opinion that this case falls within the 19th section of the 36th Geo. 3, c. 52, and on this ground concurs in thinking that the judgment of the court should be that the succession duty does not attach. The petitioner prays that the assessment of the said commissioners may be altered or varied so far as the same makes the petitioner liable to the duty of 5 per cent., and it does not, therefore, make the petitioner liable to the duty of 5 per cent. under the Succession Duty Act, but it means that because he is made liable to the duty under the Succession Duty Act, and it is the assessment under the Succession Duty Act which is appealed against, as appears by the 15th and 16th paragraphs of the case, because the 15th paragraph states "That the Commissioners of Inland Revenue on the 3rd Aug. 1868, made an assessment against your petitioner, the said Edward Floyd De Lancey, whereby he was required to pay succession duty upon the said aggregate sum of 13,047*l.* 8*s.* 1*d.* Consols, and certain dividends thereon, at the rate of 5 per cent. on the ground of the same being a succession to him derived from the said Susan de Lancey the 'predecessor' (of a brother of the father of whom he was a descendant). That the petitioner by his solicitor delivered to the said commissioners within twenty-one days after the date of the said assessment, notice in writing of his intention to appeal against such assessment." The judgment of the court will therefore be that the assessment of the petitioners to the succession duty at all is illegal, and must be set aside.

[As the court were equally divided, a question arose as to the way in which the judgment should be entered, and in the course of a discussion on the point between their Lordships and counsel, it was suggested that the Crown was entitled to maintain the assessment, Bramwell, B. being of opinion that, as the duty in any case, whether as legacy or succession duty, was payable at the rate of 5 per cent., the prayer of the petition must be refused. The result, however, was that it was decided that the course usual in such cases should be adopted, namely, that the junior baron should withdraw his judgment in order to facilitate an appeal if desired, and that judgment should be given for the petitioner or appellant. The decision of the court therefore was]

Judgment for the appellant. (a)

Attorneys for the appellant, Townsend, Lee, and Houseman, 3, Princes-street, Westminster, S.W.

Attorney for the Crown, The Solicitor of Inland Revenue, Somerset-house, W.C.

(a) It is understood that the Crown intends to carry the case to the Court of Exchequer Chamber on appeal from this decision.

Digitized by Google

Equity Courts.

COURT OF APPEAL IN CHANCERY.

Reported by THOMAS BROOKBANK and E. STEWART ROCHE, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Tuesday, April 20.

(Before the LORDS JUSTICES.)

Re THE WHEAL LUDCOTT AND WREY CONSOLS MINES COMPANY; ex parte JACKSON.

Company—Winding-up—Mining company on the cost-book principle—Debt due by the company—Calls due by a shareholder—Action by the creditor at the instigation of the company against the defaulting shareholder—Verdict by consent for the amount of calls only—Payments subsequently made by the company to the creditor—Further debt incurred by the company after the action—Appropriation of payments—Admission of proof.

A mining company was formed upon the cost-book principle. In Dec. 1865 calls were made on the shareholders, which H. and J., two of the shareholders, failed to pay. In Feb. 1866, G., who was a creditor of the company for a considerable sum, at the instigation of the company commenced an action against H. for the debt due by the company. The company were desirous by means of this action to compel H. to pay his calls. When the action came on for trial, and a jury had been sworn, it was arranged that a verdict should be found against H. for the amount of calls due from him and costs, and this having been done, judgment was entered up against H. for the amount of the verdict. In May 1866, G., at the instigation of the company, brought a similar action against J. The sum claimed in this action included a part of the debt claimed in the action against H. as well as a debt subsequently incurred by the company. At the trial of this second action the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff for a sum which was afterwards raised by the court to 787*l. Before judgment could be entered up J. petitioned to wind-up the company, and a winding-up order was made, and also an order to stay proceedings in the action by G. against J. After the action against J. various sums were paid by the company to G. These sums exceeded the* 787*l., but the evidence showed that the intention of the company in paying them was to apply them in discharge of the debt due to G. before the action against H. On the footing of such an appropriation a balance remained due from the company to G., and he carried in a claim in the winding-up for that balance, and that claim was admitted by the Vice-Warden of the Stannaries Court:*

Upon appeal by J.,

Held, that the claim was properly admitted, the company having a right to attribute the payments made by them to H. to the earlier debt.

This was an appeal by Jackson, a shareholder in the above company, from a decision of the Vice-warden of the Stannaries Court, whereby a claim carried in by one Geake against the estate of the company, which was in liquidation, was admitted for the sum of 460*l.* The company was a mining company formed upon the cost book principle. In Dec. 1865, two separate calls respectively of 1*l.* per share were made on the shareholders. Jackson, the present appellant, and Hiscock, another shareholder, failed to pay these calls at the time when they were due. The company, with the view of compelling Hiscock to pay his calls, instigated Mr. Geake, to whom the company owed a considerable sum for goods supplied, to bring an action against Hiscock for the debt due to him (Geake) from the company. This action was commenced in Feb. 1866, and in it the sum of 2436*l.* 18*s.* 8*d.* was claimed by the plaintiff. This action was set down for trial at the spring assizes held at Bodmin in 1866. The cause having been called on, a jury was sworn, and the solicitors for the parties then agreed that a verdict should be found for 24*l.*, which was the amount of the calls due by Hiscock, and the costs of the action, and that no further proceedings should be taken. This was done, and judgment was entered up for the amount of the verdict.

In May 1866 a similar action was, also at the instigation of the company, commenced by Geake against Jackson, the present appellant, for the sum of 2935*l.* 9*s.* 4*d.* then owing from the company to Geake. In this sum was comprised a part of the debt claimed in the action against Hiscock, as well as a further debt for goods subsequently supplied by Geake to the company. Jackson called on the company either to pay the debt or to indemnify him against the action, and they in reply informed him that if he paid the calls which he owed the action would be abandoned. This he did not do, and accordingly the action went on, and was set down for trial at the Bodmin summer assizes in 1866. A verdict was found for 400*l.*, and upon a rule obtained by the plaintiff this amount was afterwards increased to 787*l.* Before judgment was entered up Jackson presented a petition to wind-up the company, and on the 28th Feb. 1868 a winding-up order was made. Another order was also made to stay all further proceeding in Geake's action against Jackson. After the action against Jackson had been tried the company made various payments to Geake, which altogether exceeded the sum of 787*l.* The evidence and the accounts showed that the payments so made were intended to be made in respect of the debt due by the company to Geake before the action against Hiscock. Geake made a claim in the winding-up for an alleged balance due to him of 516*l.* 2*s.* 5*d.* Jackson opposed the admission of this claim, but it was allowed by the Vice-Warden to the extent of 460*l.* Jackson appealed from this decision.

Roxburgh, Q. C., and E. S. Ford, on behalf of Jackson, urged that the judgment in the action against Hiscock extinguished the debt due from the company before that action, and substituted the amount of the verdict. Then the result of the second action was conclusive that 787*l.* and no more was then due from the company to Geake, and the evidence showed that the payments since made to him by the company exceeded that sum. Geake must stand in the same position as if there had been no winding-up order made, and he had brought an action now against the company as a going concern. In such action he must have failed. A creditor who allowed the company to make use of him as a means of compelling a shareholder to pay up calls in arrear must take the consequences of what he did, and this court would not aid him to escape from any injury resulting from such a proceeding. They cited

King v. Hoare, 13 M. & W. 494;
Gaple v. Higgins, 3 De G. & J. 33; 31 L. T. Rep. 47;
Sibley v. Minton, 5 W. R. 675;
Lindley on Partnership (2nd edit.) 150.

De Gex, Q. C., Rowcliffe, and Begg, for Geake, and for the official liquidator, were not called upon.

Lord Justice SELWYN said that he had no doubt that the Vice-Warden was right in admitting the claim. The facts of the case were not in dispute. [His Lordship stated the facts.] The result of this was that the matter must be treated just as if no action had ever been brought, inasmuch as the proceedings in the action were put an end to by means of what was done by Jackson himself. The only other question to be considered was, what was the effect of the judgment obtained against Hiscock in the first action. If that judgment operated to extinguish the debt of 2436*l.* 13*s.* 8*d.* as between Geake and Hiscock, it did not so operate as between Geake and the company. The sum of 2436*l.* 13*s.* 8*d.* remained unpaid, and the judgment did not amount to a satisfaction of the debt. His Lordship was of opinion that after that judgment the company still had it in their power to attribute the payments which they afterwards made to Geake to the debt due to him before the action against Hiscock, and the evidence showed clearly that they in fact intended to attribute those payments in that way. This was shown by Geake's evidence as well as by the accounts themselves. The result was, that the balance now claimed had not been paid, and the claim of Geake was properly admitted. The appeal must therefore be refused with costs.

Digitized by Google

Lord Justice GIFFARD agreed with the Vice-Warden in disapproving the practice adopted by these companies of setting creditors in motion against defaulting shareholders. His Lordship had no desire to weaken the authority of King v. Hoare or Ex parte Huggins; but he was of opinion that the Vice-Warden's decision was quite consistent with those cases, because the claim now made by Geake was for a debt incurred by the company after the action brought by Geake against Hiscock. Judgment was never entered up in the action against Jackson, and the proceedings in that action were stayed in consequence of Jackson's own acts. Matters were now in the same position as if that action had never been brought. Then the evidence clearly showed that Geake had never in fact been paid the sum which he now claimed. The action against Hiscock was, in truth, the company's action, and after they had made use of Geake in this way it would be most unjust for them now to refuse to pay him his debt. The evidence satisfied his Lordship that the payments afterwards made were intended to be made in satisfaction of the prior debt, and that being so, the debt now claimed was clearly still due to Geake, and his claim was properly admitted. The appeal must be refused, with costs.

Solicitors: Hooke and Street; Gregory, Rowcliffe, and Co.

Monday, May 3.

(Before the LORDS JUSTICES.)

HEARD v. PILLEY.

Specific performance—Allegation of contract—What is sufficient—Agreement made by an agent—Appointment of agent not alleged to be in writing—Statute of Frauds.

A bill for specific performance of an agreement to grant a lease, which was made by the plaintiff, through an agent, did not state the letter which constituted the agreement, or that there was such a letter; but only that the agent informed the plaintiff that the lessors had written and sent a letter agreeing to let the premises; but, as a later paragraph of the bill alleged that the agent had entered into the said agreement as agent of the plaintiff, the passages coupled together were Held to constitute a sufficient statement that there was an agreement in writing.

Held, also, that it was not necessary that the bill should state that the appointment of the agent by the plaintiff was by writing.

Demurrers on both these grounds were, confirming the decision of Malins, V.C., overruled.

This was an appeal by the two defendants in the suit, William Pilley and Samuel Sugden, against a decision of Malins, V.C., overruling two demurrers for want of equity, which they had filed to the bill of the plaintiff.

The object of the suit was to have it declared that the defendant Pilley had entered into a certain agreement with the defendant Sugden for a lease of a house and premises, No. 91, Fore-street, in the City of London, as the agent for, and on behalf of, the plaintiff, and that Sugden might be decreed to grant a lease to the plaintiff accordingly; and that Pilley might be restrained from all dealings with the premises otherwise than by the plaintiff's directions.

The bill alleged that on the 22nd Sept. 1868, Pilley called on the plaintiff and told him that one Brown, the late tenant of the house, had died insolvent; that the unexpired lease (a year and a half only) would be sold for a very trifling sum, and that he had ascertained from Sugden, the owner of the premises, that they would be let for 200*l.* a year; that the premises would let at an advanced rent; and that in consequence of the illness of the plaintiff at the time, he (Pilley) would obtain an agreement for a lease from Sugden, and for the sale of the interest of Brown, as agent for the plaintiff; and the plaintiff then authorised him to offer to Sugden 150*l.* a year as rent, for twenty-one years, and to offer 100*l.* for the interest of Brown.

That the plaintiff subsequently authorised Pilley to offer to Sugden a rent of 200*l.*, and "on or about the 20th Oct. 1868 the said William Pilley informed the plaintiff that Sugden had written and sent a letter dated on or about the 19th Oct." to Pilley, accepting the offer, and agreeing to let the premises to him for twenty-one years, to commence at the termination of Brown's term, at the rent of 200*l.* per annum. On the 21st Oct. 1868 an agreement in writing was entered into and signed by and between Brown's father and Pilley, that Brown's father should sell, and Pilley should purchase, Brown's interest; and that Brown's father would take out administration to his son, and execute a legal assignment to Pilley.

The 5th paragraph of the bill was in these words:

> The said Wm. Pilley entered into the said agreement with the said Samuel Sugden and Robert Brown (the father) respectively, as the agent for and on behalf of the plaintiff, and he afterwards paid the said sum of 100*l.* to the said Robert Brown, on the understanding that the same would be repaid to him by the plaintiff.

That the plaintiff promised to Pilley a gratuity for acting as his agent, but that Pilley, after the agreements, became dissatisfied with the amount and required a larger sum; that the plaintiff refused to comply, and subsequently Pilley claimed to have entered into the agreements with Sugden and Brown for his own benefit, and not as agent for the plaintiff; that before the agreements the plaintiff asked Pilley why he did not himself take a lease, to which Pilley replied that he had not capital to speculate with, and the bill charged (paragraph 13) that Pilley intended and threatened to sell or dispose of, or let, the premises, and deal with them as his own; that in Nov. 1868 the plaintiff's solicitor wrote to Sugden, giving him notice that the plaintiff was entitled to the benefit of the agreement, which was entered into by Pilley as his agent, but in reply Sugden wrote stating that the plaintiff was a complete stranger to him. The prayer of the bill was to the effect stated.

Both defendants demurred for want of equity, and now appealed against the order of Malins, V.C. overruling their demurrers.

Glasse, Q.C., Jolliffe, and Lawrence supported the

Digitized by Google

appeals, and argued that the demurrers ought to have been allowed, first, because there was in the bill no sufficient allegation of any written agreement with Sugden, but only a statement (sect. 4 of the bill) that "Pilley had informed the plaintiff that Sugden had written," &c.; and secondly, that there was no allegation that Pilley's appointment to act as the plaintiff's agent was by writing, and that an appointment by writing was necessary under the Statute of Frauds. On this point they referred to

Bartlett v. Pickersgill, 4 East. 577, note b; 1 Cox, 15;
Lord St. Leonards' V. & P. 11th edit. 912;
Dale v. Hamilton, 5 Hare, 369;
Taylor v. Salmon, 4 My. & Cr. 134.

Cotton, Q. C. and Berkeley, in support of the Vice-Chancellor's order, were directed to confine their argument to the second point. They accordingly contended that Bartlett v. Pickersgill had no application, for here the vendor had not assigned, but in that case he had executed a conveyance to the alleged agent, and the bill was by the alleged principal against that agent alone. They also referred to

Willis v. Willis, 2 Atk. 71;
Lees v. Nuttall, 2 Russ. & My. 53.

Jolliffe having replied,

Lord Justice SELWYN said: In this case two questions have been raised; first, whether there is any sufficient allegation in the bill that an agreement was in fact entered into by the defendant Pilley in writing, so as to constitute it an agreement which could be enforced, having regard to the provisions of the Statute of Frauds; and, secondly, as between the plaintiff and the defendant Pilley, whether there is such allegation of agency as is consistent with the provisions of that statute, and which can be enforced.

With regard to the first point, we did not think it necessary to hear the respondent's counsel; but it appears to me that, although there has been an unfortunate departure from the common forms of pleading in this bill, still there is a statement in the 4th paragraph relating to a letter which is proved, which is so stated as not to amount to a positive allegation. Then in the 5th paragraph it is stated, "The said Wm. Pilley entered into the said agreement with the said Samuel Sugden and Robert Brown respectively as the agent for and on behalf of the said James Rowe Heard." And coupling that statement with what is afterwards stated in the bill, I think there is sufficient allegation of an agreement, and an agreement constituted by the letter written and signed by the defendant Sugden, so as to render it impossible for him to set up a case that there is no contract in writing relating to this property.

Then with regard to the agency of Pilley—In the first place the fact of the agency of Pilley is distinctly stated: "The said Wm. Pilley entered into the said agreement with the said Samuel Sugden and Robert Brown respectively as the agent for and on behalf of the said James Rowe Heard, and afterwards paid the sum of 100*l.* to the said Robert Brown, on the understanding that the same would be repaid to him by the said James Rowe Heard." Now although it may be true that he afterwards disputed or questioned that agency, the fact must be taken as clear and indisputable. Then this bill is brought into the category of those very common bills—a bill alleging a contract entered into by the owner of the property, a contract by letter or agreement in writing, but that the person with whom he entered into it was the agent of the plaintiff; and before that contract had been performed, a bill for specific performance is filed by the principal against the agent, and against the person with whom that agent has entered into the contract. That is a bill of a very ordinary description, and it is a startling proposition to say that, unless the bill alleges that the agency was constituted by writing to the agent, such a bill cannot be sustained.

The only authority which has been cited in support of that proposition is Bartlett v. Pickersgill. It appears to me that that case does not govern the present one, because that is a case in which the conveyance was executed, and in which it appears, from the short statement of the case in a note in 4 East, that the bill was a bill by the plaintiff asking for a conveyance to the plaintiff as against the defendant, to whom that conveyance had already been made. The statement is, "That the defendant bought an estate for the plaintiff, but there was no written agreement between them, nor was any part of the purchase-money paid by the plaintiff. The defendant articled for the estate in his own name, and refused to convey to the plaintiff, so this bill was brought to compel a conveyance." That is, after the conveyance had been executed, the bill was filed by the plaintiff, by one person on one side, and only one, and the defendant on the other, seeking for a conveyance of that estate from the defendant to whom the conveyance was made. That entirely distinguishes that case from the present, which is an ordinary suit by a principal bringing before the court an agent and the person with whom the contract had been entered into. Assuming the case of Bartlett v. Pickersgill to be good law, it cannot, I think, be considered as laying down any such general proposition as is contended for by the defendants. At all events, it would be subject to qualifications, especially to those which are mentioned by Lord St. Leonards; and it is also subject to the qualification established by Lord Hardwicke in the case referred to of Willis v. Willis in 2 Atk., where his Lordship says, "There is another way of taking a case out of the statute, and that is by admitting parol evidence within the rules laid down in this court to show the trust from the mean circumstances of the pretended owner of the real estate or inheritance, which make it impossible for him to be the purchaser." It is not altogether unworthy of remark that the very passage Mr. Jolliffe referred to in his reply tends to show something like a state of circumstances existing in the present case, for he says the bill shows in the eighth paragraph that Mr. Pilley said "that he had not capital to speculate with, as the said J. R. Heard well knew." I think, therefore, in this case we must take it that there is a clear and express allegation of the agency of Pilley. I cannot at all accede to the argument urged in reply, that under those circumstances, when the agent goes to the principal and says, "I will go and buy an estate for you," it is not a fraudulent act on his part afterwards to buy the estate for himself, and then deny the agency. I think that would be an attempt to make the Statute of Frauds an instrument of fraud; therefore I agree with the judgment of the Vice-Chancellor, and I think that both of these demurrers were properly overruled, and both petitions of appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Lord Justice GIFFARD said:—In this case, although the fourth paragraph would not amount to a sufficient allegation of agreement between the plaintiff and the defendant, I am satisfied that when you take in connection with that the fifth, eighth, and ninth paragraphs, there is a clear allegation of agreement in writing signed by Sugden.

That being so, the only other question is that which is raised by the case of Bartlett v. Pickersgill, and certainly I must say there has been no conveyance from Sugden to Pilley, and the whole object in point of fact is a bill to enforce specific performance between Heard, the plaintiff, and Sugden; and Pilley is brought here simply to be bound, and nothing else, and no conveyance is sought from him. I cannot help saying, as regards the case of Bartlett v. Pickersgill, that it seems to be quite inconsistent with all the authorities of this court, which proceed on the footing that it will not allow the Statute of Frauds to be made an instrument of fraud. Therefore the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Digitized by Google

Solicitors for the demurring defendants, W. T. Bateson; Alfred Watson.

Solicitor for the plaintiff, George Edward East.

Wednesday, May 26.

(Before The LORDS JUSTICES)

TAYLOR v. DOWLEN.

Practice—Appeal for costs only.

A bill was filed against trustees to compel them to assign and transfer to the plaintiffs certain trust funds and premises. The bill prayed that the trustees might be ordered to pay the costs of the suit. Malins, V.C., made a decree as prayed for, and, being of opinion that the conduct of the trustees had been improper, ordered them to pay the costs of the suit. The trustees appealed from this decree so far as it ordered them to pay the costs of the suit.

Held, that this being an appeal for costs only could not be entertained.

The circumstance that, if the costs had been ordered to be paid out of the trust funds, the plaintiffs might have appealed from the decree so far as it directed payment of the costs out of those funds, was no reason why the trustees should be allowed to appeal from the decree actually made on the ground that the costs ought to have been ordered to come out of the trust funds.

Bagot v. Bagot, Dan. Chan. Prac. (4th edit.) p. 1849, explained.

This was an appeal by the defendants from a decree of Malins, V.C., in so far as it ordered the defendants to pay the costs of the suit.

The bill was filed by the plaintiffs, who were cestuis que trustent against the defendants, who were trustees, and it prayed that the defendants might be ordered to assign to the plaintiffs certain leasehold premises, and to transfer to them certain stock the subject of the trust, and also that the defendants might be ordered to pay the costs of the suit. The Vice-Chancellor, by his decree, ordered the leaseholds to be assigned, and the stock transferred as prayed, and, being of opinion that the defendants, by their improper conduct, had rendered the suit necessary, he ordered them to pay the costs of the suit up to and including the hearing.

The defendants appealed, and by their petition of appeal asked to have the decree varied only so far as it ordered them to pay the costs. They insisted that the costs ought to have been directed to be paid out of the trust funds.

Montague Cookson opened the appeal.

Glasse, Q. C. and Graham Hastings, on behalf of respondents, took the preliminary objection that the appeal was one for costs only and could not, therefore, consistently with the established rule of the court, be entertained.

Montague Cookson, for the appellants, then contended that the case fell within one or other of the exceptions to the general rule, that an appeal for costs only could not be entertained. In the first place, there was the authority of Lord Cottenham in Angell v. Davis, 4 My. & Cr. 360, for saying that in a case where the bill prayed, by way of special relief, that the defendant might be ordered to pay the costs of the suit, there an appeal for costs only could be entertained. Some doubt was however thrown upon this ground of distinction by what was said by Lord Cottenham in the later case of Lancashire v. Lancashire, 2 Ph. 657. But at least there ought to be a mutuality in the right of appeal, and in the present case, if the costs of the appellants had been ordered to be paid out of the trust estate, the plaintiffs could then have appealed as to costs only, it being well settled that such an appeal could be entertained when costs had been ordered to come out of a particular fund. On this ground of mutuality, if on no other, the present appeal ought to be entertained. He relied also upon Bagot v. Bagot, mentioned in Daniell's Chancery Practice (4th edit.), p. 1349. In that case a married woman claimed against her husband a trust-fund which was in court, on the ground that it was settled to her separate use. Shadwell, V. C. ordered the fund to be paid to her, and directed the costs of the suit to be paid personally by the husband and the trustees of the settlement. From this decree separate petitions of appeal were presented by the husband and the trustees. The result of this was that the trustees' appeal was really one for costs only, inasmuch as the question who was entitled to the trust-fund could have been decided upon the husband's appeal alone. This objection was taken to the competency of the trustees' appeal, and, notwithstanding this, Lord Cottenham allowed the appeal to be heard.

Without calling upon the respondents,

Lord Justice SELWYN said that the petition of appeal possessed at least the merit of candour, inasmuch as it professed to be an appeal for costs only, and this circumstance threw upon the appellants the onus of showing that the case was within one of the admitted exceptions to the established rule of the court, that an appeal for costs alone could not be entertained. In the case of Angell v. Davis, which had been referred to, the exceptions enumerated by Lord Cottenham to the rule that an appeal for costs only could not be entertained were three in number (4 My. & Cr. 362)—(1) Where the bill prayed by way of special relief that the costs of the suit might be paid by the defendant; (2) Where the case was one in which the proceedings themselves, without going into the details of the transaction, furnished all the information necessary for the purpose of determining the question; (3) Where it was not a case of personal costs, but a case in which the court had directed them to be paid out of a particular fund. In the later case of Lancashire v. Lancashire, Lord Cottenham reconsidered the first of those exceptions to the general rule, and then expressed his opinion (2 Ph. 662) that it ought not to be allowed, for the consequence would be that every bill would pray expressly for costs in order to enable the plaintiff to raise that question on appeal. Moreover Hatherley, L. C., when Vice-Chancellor, in the case of Umpleby v. The Waveney Valley Railway Company, 1 Joh. & H. 254; 3 L. T. Rep. N. S. 404, considered Lord Cottenham's opinion, as expressed in Lancashire v. Lancashire, to be sounder than the opinion which he expressed in Angell v. Davis on this point. As to the second exception from the general rule mentioned by Lord Cottenham in Angell v. Davis, in that case there was on the face of the decree appealed from an obvious error, because it allowed a trustee who had been guilty of a breach of trust to have his costs paid out of the trust fund. The question, however, in the present case was whether the conduct of the appellants had been so improper that they ought personally to pay the costs of the suit up to the hearing; and the Vice-Chancellor, in the exercise of his discretion, had decided that they ought. The third exception mentioned by Lord Cottenham had no application to the present case, for the costs had not been ordered to be paid out of a particular fund. In the case of Bagot v. Bagot, which had been so much relied upon, it appeared that the trustees' petition of appeal raised the whole question of the right to the trust fund, and was not limited to the question of the payment of the costs of the suit, and the trustees, as representing all the persons entitled to the fund, had an interest in the subject-matter of the suit. That case, therefore, had no application to the present case. If in every case where a trustee or a creditor or a legatee asserted that he was entitled to have his costs paid out of a particular fund, he were to be allowed to appeal upon the question of costs alone, the exceptions to the general rule, that there could be no appeal for costs only, would be very much increased in number. His Lordship had very recently, in Hope v. Carnegie, 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 5, said that he considered this rule a very wholesome one, and to that opinion he still adhered. The present appeal did not come within any of the admitted exceptions to the rule, and must therefore be dismissed with costs.

Lord Justice GIFFARD was of opinion that the rule prohibiting an appeal for costs alone was an important and wholesome rule, and that it had been quite enough broken through by the exceptions which had been already admitted to it. In the present case no question of forfeiture was involved, the appellants having been ordered to pay costs merely on the ground of their improper conduct, and if in such case they were allowed to appeal for costs only his Lordship could see no reason why an appeal for costs only should not be entertained in every case. It was argued that if the costs had been ordered to be paid out of the trust fund the plaintiffs might have appealed, and that there ought to be a mutuality in the right of appeal, but his Lordship could not accede to this argument. He was not at all disposed to extend the exceptions established by Angell v. Davis. In Bagot v. Bagot the merits of the case were discussed, and as an incidental result of that discussion the trustees were put in a better position as to costs than by the original decree. That had no application to the present appeal, which must be dismissed with costs.

Solicitors for the appellants, Price, Bolton, and Filden.

Solicitor for the respondent, F. Rolt.

Friday, July 16.

(Before Lord Justice GIFFARD.)

BROWN v. ADAMS.

Trustee and cestui que trust—Breach of trust—Following trust money—Solicitor—Money given by client to be invested on mortgage paid by solicitor to his own banking account—Death of solicitor without investing the money on mortgage—Whether balance at bankers can be claimed in specie by the client—Banker and customer—Appropriation of drawings by customer.

Though it is a general rule that trust-money misapplied by a trustee can, if it can be traced, be followed by the cestui que trust, it is also a settled rule that in a bankers' account the drawings by the customer are to be attributed to the payments made to the credit of his account in the order of their date, unless there be any specific appropriation of any sum when paid to his credit.

Therefore, where a solicitor paid to his own general account current (without making any specific appropriation), a sum of 5000l. received by him from a client for the purpose of being invested by him upon a mortgage, and died without having made the investment, it appearing that his drawing upon his account after the 5000l. was paid in, exceeded the amount of that sum and the balance then standing to his credit, it was Held (reversing James, V.C.), that the client was not entitled to an injunction to restrain the administrator of the solicitors from dealing with the balance to his credit at his banker's at the time of his death.

This was an appeal by the defendant Adams from an order made by James, V.C., granting an injunction to restrain the appellant from drawing upon, or in any way dealing with, the balance standing to the credit of William Hale, a solicitor, at the time of his death, with Messrs. Drummond, his bankers.

Adams was the administrator of Hale, who died on the 13th May 1869. The plaintiff, Sarah Brown, was a client of Hale, and she, in Oct. 1868 gave him a cheque on her bankers for 5000*l.*, for the purpose of his investing the amount for her upon a mortgage. He never made the investment. It appeared that he kept a banking account with Messrs. Drummond, that he paid the 5000*l.* to his credit with them, without directing any specific appropriation to be made, and that it was placed to the credit of his account in the ordinary way.

At the time the balance to his credit was about 4000*l.* Before he died he made other payments to his credit, to the amount of about 12,500*l.*, and his drawings after the 5000*l.* was paid down to the time of his death amounted to about 18,800*l.* The balance to his credit at the time of his death was 2700*l.* or thereabouts.

The bill in this suit was filed against Adams and the members of Messrs. Drummond's firm, and it prayed that it might be declared that the balance which at the time of Hale's death stood to his credit with Messrs. Drummond was a trust fund appropriated to the plaintiff, and for an injunction, to restrain Messrs. Drummond from parting with that balance to anyone but the plaintiff, and to restrain Adams from in any way dealing with the balance. The Vice-Chancellor having granted an injunction as above mentioned, Adams appealed.

Kay, Q. C., and T. A. Roberts, in support of the appeal, contended that by the authority of Clayton's case, 1 Mer. 572, as between banker and customer, the drawings on the customer's account were to be attributed to the payments made to his credit in the order of their date, in the absence of any specific appropriation of any sum paid in. And it could make no difference that any sum paid in to the general account was in fact trust money. This was clear from Pennell v. Deffell, 4 D. M. & G. 372. In the present case it was clear from the evidence that no specific appropriation was made of the 5000*l.*, but that it was paid to the general credit of the account in the ordinary way, and that being so, the account showed that it was all drawn out by Hale before his death. The plaintiff in the present suit could, therefore, have no specific claim to the balance, and the injunction ought not to have been granted. They referred also to Frith v. Cartland, 2 H. & M. 417; 12 L. T. Rep. N. S. 175.

Digitized by Google

Willcock, Q. C., and Charles Browne, for the plaintiff, urged that it was the duty of Hale to have kept the 5000*l.* distinct from his own moneys, and that he must be taken, therefore, to have intended to draw in the first instance upon the moneys which were his own, and not upon the trust money. The injunction, at any rate, was only granted to protect the money until the hearing of the cause. They endeavoured to distinguish Pennell v. Deffell, and they cited

Lord Chedworth v. Edwards, 8 Ves. 46;
Lupton v. White, 15 Ves. 432;
Taylor v. Plumer, 3 M. & S. 562.

Without calling for a reply,

Lord Justice GIFFARD said that if there were any reason to suppose that the plaintiff at the hearing of the cause would be able to establish a better case than she could now, he would continue the injunction. But it was clear that the plaintiff had made the best case she could. The facts of the case were very simple, and it was plain from the evidence that, if the 5000*l.* were not trust money, it must be treated as having been drawn out by Hale before his death. It had been argued that Pennell v. Deffell was not an authority for saying that trust-money paid by a trustee to his general banking account must be treated in the same way as any other money so paid. There could be no question that at law the 5000*l.* was extinguished as a debt, and it would be rather a strange thing if, being extinguished at law, it could be kept alive in equity. It was a different case from that of trust-money placed by a trustee in a box with money of his own, the case to which many of the observations of Knight Bruce, L.J., in Pennell v. Deffell referred. Now, at p. 383 of 4 D. M. & G., Knight Bruce, L.J. said, "When a trustee pays trust-money into a bank to his credit, the account being a simple account with himself, not marked or distinguished in any other manner, the debt thus constituted from the bank to him is one which, as long as it remains due, belongs specifically to the trust as much and as effectually as the money so paid would have done had it specifically been placed by a trustee in a particular repository and so remained; that is to say, if the specific debt shall be claimed on behalf of the cestuis que trustent, it must be deemed specifically theirs, as between the trustee and his executors and the general creditors after his death on the one hand, and the trust on the other." That would be the case here if no part of the 5000*l.* had been drawn out. But then at p. 384 Knight Bruce, L. J. went on to say, "This state of things would not, I apprehend, be varied by the circumstance of the bank holding also for the trustee, or owing also to him money in every sense his own. It may be, however, and, as I think, is true, that cheques drawn by a trustee in a general manner upon the bank, would for every purpose be ascribed to and affect the account in the manner explained and laid down by Sir W. Grant in Clayton's case. The principles there stated would, I conceive, be applicable notwithstanding the different nature and character of the sums forming together the balance due from the bank to the trustee, whatever the purposes and objects of the cheques. Supposing, however, the bank to apprise the customer, or the customer to apprise the bank, contemporaneously or with due dispatch, of an intention to ascribe and apply a cheque in a manner out of the ordinary course, that possibly might make a difference or raise a question." Then in the same case. Turner, L. J., at p. 391, said: "We must see, however, whether the law does not furnish the means of meeting even the difficulty arising from such a continued series of moneys paid in and drawn out. I think that it does. I take it to be now well settled that moneys drawn out on a banking account are to be applied to the earlier items on the opposite side of the account. By every payment which he makes the banker discharges so much of the debt which he first contracted. If that debt arose from trust moneys paid in by the customer, so much of those moneys is paid off, and unless otherwise invested on account of the trust, falls into the customer's general estate, and is lost to the trust, because it cannot be distinguished from the general estate of which it has been part. If, on the other hand, the earliest debt due from the banker arose from the customer's own moneys paid in by him, that debt is pro tanto discharged, and the trust moneys subsequently paid in remain unaffected. The same principle runs through the whole account; each sum drawn out goes to discharge the earliest debt due from the banker which is remaining unpaid; and thus, when it is ascertained what moneys have been paid in belonging to the trust, it becomes clear to what portion of the balance which remains the trust estate is entitled." Then further, at p. 393, his Lordship said: "The master's opinion appears by his report to be founded upon this principle—that the sums drawn out by Green on his private account ought to be attributed to the sums paid in by him on that account, without reference to the order in which the sums were paid in or drawn out, and the case of Pinkett v. Wright, 2 Ha. 120, was cited in support of that principle; but the case of Pinkett v. Wright, in which I fully concur, is, I think, materially distinguishable from the present. Pinkett v. Wright was the simple case of a person having shares in his own right and also as a trustee, and selling some of the shares, and the court held that the shares which were sold must be taken to be those to which the party was entitled in his own right. There was no course of dealing, no bankers' account to be considered in Pinkett v. Wright. Now Green opened and kept the banking accounts upon the usual footing, and the plaintiff taking the benefit of the accounts cannot, as I think, be entitled to alter their character. Adopting them for the purpose of establishing his demand against Green's estate, he must, I think, adopt them with all their incidents, one of which is that the moneys drawn out are to be applied to the moneys first paid in. Upon any other footing this consequence would follow: that a debt which had been extinguished at law by the course of payment would be revived in equity by an alteration in that course. Indeed it would follow that in all cases where trust moneys were paid by a trustee into a bank to his own private account, they must be held to have remained there so long as the trustee may have had moneys of his own in the bank to answer his drafts, whatever may have been the dealings upon the account, and however long it may have continued. To apply the principle of Pinkett v. Wright to such a case as the present was, in my opinion, an unwarrantable extension of that principle, and certainly it would be attended with the greatest inconvenience." That case was a plain authority for the present as directly in point as it was possible to conceive. Then, again, in Frith v. Cartland, 2 H. & M. 422, Hatherley, L. C., when Vice-Chancellor, said, "In Pennell v. Deffell part of the trust-fund had been paid into a bank, but it was not ear-marked, and was wiped out by subsequent drawings, and the whole ultimate balance could not be fixed with the trust, any more than a second 1000*l.* of stock which a trustee might happen to acquire after selling 1000*l.* of trust-stock and spending the proceeds. So long, however, as the fund can be traced the trustee cannot assert his own title to it." Both those authorities were applicable to the present case, and if authorities ever were to be binding those must be taken to be so; and even without authority his Lordship could not have hesitated in coming to the same conclusion. If the injunction were continued the only result would be to remit the parties to a very useless litigation. The order of the Vice-Chancellor must be discharged, and an order made refusing, with costs, the motion for an injunction; but there would be no costs of the appeal.

Solicitors for the appellant, W. Hitchcock.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Surr and Gribble.

July 14 and 28.

(Before the LORD CHANCELLOR (Hatherley).

OVEREND, GURNEY, AND COMPANY (LIMITED) v. GURNEY AND OTHERS.

Demurrer—Bill by company against its directors—Breach of trust by directors—Companies Act 1862.

A bill was filed on behalf of O. G. and Co., a limited company in course of being wound-up, against its directors, seeking to render them liable for neglect of duty and breach of trust in having carried out the powers given them by the company in purchasing the business of the old firm of O. G. and Co., when they knew that that firm was insolvent; and also for having neglected to obtain a sufficient guarantee by that firm, or a mortgage of the private estates of the partners, to secure or make good the difference between what they knew to be the actual and the nominal value of the assets of the old firm.

Demurrer, on the ground that it was incompetent for a company to sue its own directors for breach of trust; that the proper remedy was by action at law for damages, and that if the Court of Chancery could give any relief it was under the machinery of the Companies Act 1862, allowed;

Reversing the order of Malins, V.C.

This was an appeal by the defendants from an order of Vice-Chancellor Malins, overruling a demurrer to a bill filed in the name of the company, Overend, Gurney, and Co. (Limited), against the first directors of the company. Thomas Augustus Gibb, one of those directors had however died, prior to the institution of the suit, and his executors were accordingly made defendants. The main ground of complaint alleged by the bill was that the directors had exceeded their authority in completing the purchase of the business without due communication with the shareholders, and that they were aware at the time of the insolvency of the old firm. The four surviving directors had submitted to answer the bill, but the executors of Gibb had put in a general demurrer, to the effect that the company was not competent to sue its own directors; that the remedy, if any, for the negligence charged, which was in the nature of a common tort, was by an action at law; and that even if the Court of Chancery could give relief, the application should have been by summons under the Companies Act, and not by bill. The facts and arguments are fully set forth in the proceedings before the Vice-Chancellor (reported 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 652).

Sir R. Palmer, Q.C., Glasse, Q.C., and H. M. Jackson, for the appellants.

Cotton, Q.C., and Ferrers for the plaintiffs.

The following authorities were cited:—

Oakes v. Turquand, 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 808;
Turquand v. Marshall, 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 385; L. Rep. 6 Eq. 112;
Rawlins v. Wickham, 3 De G. & J. 304;
Croskey v. Bank of Wales, 4 Giff. 314;
Powell v. Aiken, 4 K. & J. 343;
Charitable Corporation v. Sutton, 2 Atk. 400;
Lansdowne v. Lansdowne, 1 Madd. 116;
Sawyer v. Goodwin, 15 M. & W. 1008;
Society of Practical Knowledge v. Abbott, 2 Beav. 559—67.

Without calling for a reply,

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Hatherley) said:—I have very carefully considered the case, and it does not appear to me that the bill can be sustained as against the demurring defendants. The bill is one of a very singular character. It endeavours to raise, and I have no doubt does raise properly and fairly, the case that is in dispute between the two parties, not over-colouring or over-stating any of the matters, but simply, I presume, from the mode in which it is framed, stating the exact facts, and those exact facts being so stated, it comes in substance to this—that the gentleman, Mr. Gibb, whom the demurring defendants represent as his personal representatives, was a person who, acting as a director of a company which had been formed, and who now are in truth the plaintiffs in the present proceedings, bought for them that which they formed themselves into a company to buy, namely, a certain business of Overend, Gurney, and Company; yet that buying that business, though fully authorised to buy it on such terms as might seem to him and his co-directors to be just and proper, buying it also with certain guarantees which they were authorised to take and accept, and in no way, therefore, exceeding the power, at all events, literally, it is said that Mr. Gibb so exercised this function of purchasing on behalf of the company which was to be formed, as their agent and on their behalf, that he has, by his imprudence (for it is not put any higher—the Vice-Chancellor himself says so, and I think that is truly the result of the bill), made a very burdensome purchase, and has fixed the company in consequence with a very heavy loss, and the bill seeks solely on that ground—want of wisdom and want of judgment in the proceedings which he has taken with reference to the purchase of the property — to fix the defendants with the consequences of that want of wisdom and that error of judgment. It does not aver, from the beginning to the end, that there was any fraud on his part; and indeed, from the averments in the bill, it must be almost taken to be impossible that it should be so, because he himself is a purchaser, he has an interest in the concern; and I cannot put the case in that respect either more high in favour of the demurring parties, or more adversely to the bill, than by stating the conclusion to which the Vice-Chancellor came, and in which I entirely concur. He says, "There is no charge of anything involving personal misconduct in the conduct of the directors in making the purchase of this business, or that they intended to do otherwise than discharge that which they thought their duty to the shareholders who had joined, or who were likely to join, the company." Therefore, it is to be taken that this gentleman at all events, Mr. Gibb, who was not one of the original partners in Overend, Gurney, and Company's concern, has done nothing more than that which he believed to be the proper discharge of his duty. The bill, however, contains averments which tend to show that in so discharging his duty, he has acted in a manner which has entailed great loss, owing (as the bill puts it) to circumstances and facts which were brought to his knowledge, and which ought to have deterred him and his co-directors from entering into this purchase which they had been authorised to make on behalf of the company. Accordingly, the bill charges that very heavy losses had been sustained, and seeks to make responsible

Digitized by Google

Mr. Gibb and his co-directors jointly and severally, "to make good and pay to the plaintiff company the amount of the loss which they had sustained, and to indemnify them against all such further loss as they may sustain by reason of their having purchased the said good-will and assets, and having undertaken the liabilities of the said firm of Overend, Gurney, and Company." Now, it seems to me that the case here divides itself into two branches, and, with respect to one branch of the case, I confess I think it is quite impossible for a bill to be sustained in this court; and that whatever remedy there may be, would be by an action for negligence for such loss as has accrued in consequence of the debts and liabilities which have fallen upon the new company irrespective of the loss of their capital, because it appears to me that those two matters are entirely distinct. It may be said, and I am not prepared at present to say that I should not require a good deal more consideration if the case had rested upon that alone, that, to the extent of the capital placed in the directors' hands, Mr. Gibb and his co-directors are responsible to the shareholders for that sum of money so placed in their hands, following the case before Lord Hardwicke, The Charitable Corporation v. Sutton, by which it would be possible for this Court to hold, that if a certain body of people placed a given sum of money in the hands of another to be laid out, and he lays out that money in such a manner that he can be said to be guilty of a breach of trust towards them, he may be answerable for the amount of money so placed in his hands, and which has been so wasted. That is one view of the case. But how can it possibly be held in this court that they are further to be pursued by the plaintiff in respect of all liabilities that have been occasioned by the property in which the money was invested being a damnosa hæreditas beyond the amount of the property lost, namely, occasioning other losses, other debts, and other liabilities, to those who so entrusted the money to him? To say that he can be pursued in this court for that default or negligence is, it seems to me, in the absence of any fraud of course, a proposition extremely difficult to sustain. All the loss in the shape of liability beyond the 250,000*l.* which they may be supposed in this case to have had in their hands, I apprehend would form the proper subject of an action for negligence, if they thought they could maintain such an action in the absence of any fraud being charged; and the consequence of that would be that the present gentlemen, the executors of Mr. Gibb, could not be pursued either at law or in equity. It certainly seems to me not in equity, with reference to any such loss as that which I have last mentioned. However, I have now to consider the case (which is the most favourable view in which I can put it to the plaintiffs) as so much money placed at the disposal of Mr. Gibb and the others, to be laid out on behalf of the Company. Then I have to consider whether or not the charges in the bill, in that point of view, amount to such a breach of trust as should induce me to say that Mr. Gibb, or his personal representatives, are liable in respect of that breach of trust for this waste that has taken place in the Company's assets. Now, here the case is one, I may almost say, of first impression; because all the cases which we have hitherto had have not been cases of parties having full power to do all they have done, and being held to have done it imprudently or unadvisedly; but they have been cases in which fraud has been alleged. They have been cases, not of suits by the company to get back the assets of the company, but cases of suits by individual shareholders, who say that they have been induced by the fraud, by the misrepresentation, and misconduct of the directors to become shareholders in the company. And one of two things they have tried—either to make the directors personally responsible for the moneys that have been so obtained from them, as they say, by fraudulent misrepresentation; or, what is more common, they have tried, as in the case of Oakes v. Turquand, and cases of that kind, to escape from the contract altogether, and to be liberated from their position in the company, and have their names struck out from the company's list as having been brought into the company by fraudulent acts on the part of those who were, for that purpose, to be taken as the agents of the company. But such a ca e as this, namely, a bill by the company, saying, "We have employed our agents to purchase for us a certain property, and they have not misconducted themselves in any way with reference to fraud, but they have misconducted themselves in purchasing that which it was unwise and imprudent for them to purchase," is, under the circumstances of the case, to my mind, one of first impression. Now just look at it as regards the character of the purchase which these gentlemen are empowered to make. They are not to buy an estate where they might, no doubt, be held guilty of such an amount of gross negligence which, if not actually amounting to fraud, would be such as this court might make them responsible for, in their character of trustees, to their cestuis que trust. But this is the case of the purchase of that which must of itself be extremely speculative. Everybody knows that all classes of trade are very speculative, and the trade of a bill broker cannot be considered as the least so. That being so, the authority they receive is to be found in the articles of association and the memorandum of association, which are set forth and which I therefore deal with in the first instance. The memorandum of association is this: There is a joint stock company to be formed, and the persons to form it are to be certain persons who are the old partners in the bank, together with certain new persons, among whom is Mr. Gibb, who was never a partner in the old bank, and the name of the Company is to be "Overend, Gurney, and Company, Limited." It is for the purchase of that business, or at all events, that is the principal object, for which the company is formed. Its registered office is to be situate in England. Then it says, "The objects for which the company is established are, the receiving of money on deposit or by re-discount of bills, and the employment and investment of such money, and of the paid-up capital of the Company in the discounting of bills of exchange, promissory notes, and other negotiable securities, and in making advances on loan and investing in securities, and generally the carrying on of the business of bill-brokers and money dealers as heretofore carried on by Messrs. Overend, Gurney, and Co., at No. 65, Lombard-street, in the city of London; and with a view to the above objects the acquisition of such business upon terms to be agreed upon by the directors, and the acquisition, whether by way of purchase or amalgamation or otherwise, of such other business or businesses of a like character, and upon such terms as the directors shall think expedient, and the doing of all acts and things incidental or conducive to the attainment of the above objects." There they say, we are about to embark in that which must always be a hazardous business, a business entirely dependent on the prudence and dexterity of those who manage it, namely, the business of discounting bills and advancing money upon securities, those securities not being such securities as we generally have to deal with in this court, namely, mortgages, and so on, but shares and bills, and other securities of that description. That is the thing which is to be bought. Then by the Articles of Association "The directors are also authorised to purchase or acquire upon such terms, and under such stipulations as to guarantee or otherwise, as may be agreed upon, the business and goodwill of the said Messrs. Overend, Gurney, and Co., as the same now stands, and any other business of a like character which they may hereafter think it expedient to acquire for the benefit of the company." There is the largest possible power given to these gentlemen to buy this, which was, in itself, a speculative business, and they are to do it entirely in such manner as they may think expedient. Now let us see what are the errors of judgment of which this gentleman and his co-directors are accused. It is stated in the beginning of the paragraph that Overend, Gurney, and Co. had at the time this company was formed, or about that time, attained the highest commercial reputation, and its business was universally supposed to be most successful and profitable. Then they say further, "In or about the year 1861, certain accounts upon which very large amounts were due to the firm, and which were wholly unsecured, or insufficiently secured, and also certain investments, were regarded with alarm by the partners. They then give a list of those debts, which seem to be very considerable, amounting to 2,782,000*l.*; and without knowing much of mercantile affairs, one may take judicial notice, regard being had to the enormous amount due from some of the parties, that they were not very eligible investments in the way of carrying on business. That was in 1861. Then it is said that in consequence of the position of affairs, Mr. John Henry Gurney, who was one of the partners, and who took no part, previously to 1861, in the London business beyond attending annual meetings, and occasionally looking in at the London office, "commenced in 1861, and continued from that time, until the transfer of the business in 1865 to the plaintiff's company, to attend regularly at the office of the firm in Lombard-street, for the purpose of superintending generally the business, but nevertheless by the end of June, 1865, the said firm was insolvent to the extent of at least two millions sterling." That probably is the strongest averment in the whole bill. But there is one observation to be made upon that. Of course it must be taken to be stated in the bill, that the firm was in June, 1865, insolvent to the extent of two millions sterling; but at the same time, I think it must be taken to mean exactly what it says, namely that if the firm had stopped on that day, they would not have had assets, to the extent of two millions, sufficient to meet their liabilities. Still it does not follow from that, that there might not have been some of these outstanding debts very imprudently contracted, having long time to run and the like, which, not being capable of immediate realisation, would leave this enormous deficit. But one must not assume more on behalf of the pleader than is averred, and certainly not more than the facts will justify, for I apprehend it is the case in all large concerns of this kind, that there are a number of matters which are of no value on a given day, but which nevertheless may be of considerable value as time goes on and if time be allowed; time being the essence of everything of this description with regard to mercantile affairs. However, we must take it that they, according to the averments in the bill, upon that day in June, owed more than two millions exceeding their assets. Then it says, "in the month of June 1865, the partners" (not including Mr. Gibb) "were aware of the state of the firm." It goes on, "under these circumstances a project was, in the said month of June 1865, devised by the said then partners in the firm" (again not including Mr. Gibb), "for the formation of a joint-stock company which should purchase the name, goodwill, and business of the said firm, and it was in the result arranged that the said company should be formed," by these partners (who are the six defendants) and Mr. Gibb, "and that they should be the directors of it, and that the said company should take over all the liabilities of the said firm, and also its assets, except those referred to in the next paragraph of this bill." There, again, the arrangement is said to be made by the partners, who were at that time perfectly cognisant of the state of things, but it is not alleged that at that time there was any preconceived plot, plan, arrangement, or scheme by Mr. Gibb, beyond their arranging with him, and he is to join them in the concern. He is afterwards said to be cognisant of the state of affairs, but not to be cognisant of any scheme being contrived. [His Lordship then examined in detail the arrangement between the partners and other parties to the project, and said:] No doubt, to one not accustomed to be engaged in hazardous transactions of this kind, this does seem to be a most hazardous speculation, and one which few persons in this court would be disposed to enter into, but I must take it upon the bill as stated by the Vice-Chancellor himself, that those who entered into this concern believed themselves, that they were discharging their duty; that is to say, that having power to buy the business upon the best terms they could make, and having power to take a guarantee, which implies that they might possibly find a necessity for a guarantee in respect of the liabilities, they entered into this arrangement, and they have bought a business which, although a speculation, under all the circumstances which I have detailed, has turned out to be not so profitable as was anticipated. However, it was evidently a speculation, because, although there were these two millions on the one hand at this instant, yet on the other we have four millions of debt in hand, which is to be worked off by the suspense account. It is stated in the bill that in a great measure they were bad investments. But then, how are we to tell what portion was expected to be worked off? It is more than double the amount of debts in question. But in this state of things, how can I say that this man, with his power of dealing with this concern, who has not exceeded in a single word the letter of his power, has committed a breach of trust towards those who employed him as their agent, for which he is to be answerable? They employ him to buy this concern, believing it to be, although a hazardous, yet a flourishing one. The view which I must take is, that he bought it, believing it to be a flourishing concern, and the only averment which I find that seems to have pressed on the mind of the Vice-Chancellor is, that having this authority given, no meeting was called. It is said, "When you found how things were, the public believing that this was a very good concern, and a prosperous concern, you, coming in as our director to deal for us, finding that things were so far from prosperous, because it had been badly managed to a certain extent, and finding it so badly managed that if things were wound-up at that moment there would be a deficiency, were content to go on without calling a general meeting, thinking it would be beneficial (for I think we must take that to be the opinion of the Vice-Chancellor), and therefore you are to be taken as being liable for not coming to us and telling us what sort of a thing it was you were drawing us into, without coming to us for further power." I apprehend that I cannot hold such a doctrine as that. Mr. Gibb, being quite willing to enter into the speculation, how was it possible that he should know that the others were not as willing to enter into it as himself? How could these people dive into all the minds of the shareholders? How could he know anything as to the feeling of security which might exist in the minds of others with regard to the affairs of Overend, Gurney, and Company, and how was he to know that it was not the same as that which he himself felt? If I were to hold any such doctrine as that, it would involve in extreme peril numbers of transactions which we all know were going on some few years ago. At that time business after business was being bought, and other speculative companies of all sorts were being bought, for instance, such as Masterman's Bank; and if I were to hold that persons entering into a treaty to sell to others their business are liable to this, that the external directors with whom they treat on behalf of the company—I mean those who are not partners—are to be informed fairly and fully of the state of the concern, and then are to lay the whole of the affairs of the concern before a public meeting of shareholders before the affair could be dealt with, it would of course at once put a stop to the buying and selling of businesses of this description. One would suppose that they would desire their affairs to be kept private, and not desire to have them ransacked; and, unless they had persons with whom they were authorised to deal, and whom the Company had entrusted with their affairs, and were content to rely upon their acts, it would be impossible that transactions of this description could be carried out. Then, if I do not find that they have acted in breach of their duty, if I do not find that they have done anything more than make a bad bargain—it appears to me that I cannot assume that the company are thereupon entitled to say that this gentleman is responsible for a breach of trust, he only having done that which they sent him to do, having bought this business, but with an amount of knowledge, which he must necessarily as a director acquire, exceeding the amount of knowledge which was acquired by them. Then, after that, a prospectus is issued, and I cannot help thinking that there has been some confusion in that part of the argument in this case between the case of those who were misled by the prospectus, which was the case relied upon in Oakes v. Turquand, and the case of those who relied upon an agent, and gave him full confidence as an agent, and who has not acted as a wise or prudent agent. We are told that the company was registered, and the arrangement had been made immediately after the registration of the memorandum of association. They say that the prospectus was prepared and intended to be issued, but then, in the meantime, the company had been formed. The prospectus says this: "The company is formed for the purpose of carrying into effect an arrangement which has been made" (therefore that shows that it is done) "for the purchase from Messrs. Overend, Gurney, and Co. of their long established business as bill brokers and money dealers, and of the premises in which the business is conducted, the consideration for the good will being 500,000*l.*, one half being paid in cash, and the remainder in shares of the company, with 15*l.* per share credited thereon; terms which, in the opinion of the directors, cannot fail to ensure a highly remunerative return to the shareholders." I cannot say that was not their opinion, however sanguine it may have been, and nobody can doubt at this moment, now that we know the full extent of the disaster, that the good-will of the business of Overend, Gurney, and Co. was enormous. Therefore, it is impossible for me to say that, looking at these advances, these gentlemen might not well have said, "You have been very imprudent, you have got a splendid business, but when you have money at call you should not have these large investments of money which are not at call; we will conduct the business on a new footing; we have got your four millions of debts to work upon to make the best we can of; we shall be able to work off the concern by that means, and having your goodwill, and the enormous extent of business which you have at your command, we shall be able to make that again a flourishing business which had evidently been in former times a flourishing business, for it is alleged that in 1861 there was no doubt whatever upon the subject. There is one other point which I ought to notice. I said that I would not deal with the two deeds. I should mention that one is an ordinary deed with reference to the arrangement with the company; and in that deed there is contained also the arrangement about the 500,000*l.*—the 250,000*l.* in shares, and the 250,000*l.* to be paid by the company. The other is a separate deed as to the suspense account, and the suspense period containing the arrangement as to the 4,000,000*l.* to be worked off in the way I have described, and in respect of which the guarantee is to be given at the end of the suspense period of two and a half years. Then the prospectus says, "Copies of the company's memorandum and articles of association as well as of the deed of covenant in relation to the transfer of the business, can be inspected at the offices of the solicitors of the company." Great stress was laid, as was laid in the case of Oakes v. Turquand, by the Vice-Chancellor in this case, upon the second deed not being brought forward, and it was said that if the second deed had been produced many persons would not have subscribed. How far an averment of that kind is to be taken as an averment of fact I think is a very doubtful matter. To say that any particular person would or would not have subscribed, if this or that had or had not been done, is predicting the future, and cannot be taken as an averment of fact. However, whatever may have been done, I apprehend what I have to consider is whether the deed is ultra vires. It seems to me that it is not ultra vires at all. They had the power to buy under such terms as they thought fit; and taking such guarantee as they thought fit. This second deed is the guarantee which they think fit to take; and I must say that, there being no fraud, but a total absence of anything like fraud, it would be impossible for me to say, that taking such guarantee as they think fit means that they are to take mortgages. No one ever heard that in buying a company's business there is to be also a mortgage security. We must look to the contract and construe the contract to see whether the averments in the bill be accurate or not. There is nothing whatever in the contract to show that in taking these guarantees they were bound to take guarantees in the shape of substantial guarantees by way of security on the real property of the several partners. The partners were all thought to be men of wealth, and there is nothing to show, in truth, that the bulk of them were not men of wealth, subject of course to this question of the two millions, which if they had broken up at that moment might have been demanded of them. Then the case is reduced to this. As regards one half of the bill, I hold it to be utterly untenable, namely, as to the damage accruing ultra the 250,000*l.* That I hold to be simply a case of negligence for which no proceedings can now be had against the executors of Mr. Gibb. But as to the other 250,000*l.*, and as to whether or not there has not been a waste of the assets put into this gentleman's hands, looking to the terms of the agreement, the authority which was given to him, the circumstance that he is not alleged to have acted malâ fide in any part of it; but all that is alleged against him is that he has not made a profitable and sound bargain under the circumstances of the case, it being said by the Vice-Chancellor that in all which he has done he conceived himself to be doing his duty; if I find nothing to restrain him from doing that which he has done, I think that people must take the consequences of the manner in which their business is conducted by others whom they have trusted to act as their agents. If the question were simply whether they had, or had not, made a bad or imprudent bargain, that is not a question which could be dealt with in this court as a breach of trust; or, if it were in respect of having failed to secure a bargain for persons who intrusted the moneys to them for that purpose, which is not the case we have here, the company must take the consequences of having intrusted their moneys to persons of sanguine temperament who have made a purchase which turns out to be a bad one; but I do not find enough in this case to show me that it is so ridiculous or absurd, or that there is such crassa negligentia as would amount to fraud, as to induce me to hold that the gentleman, whose executors are now sought to be impeached, has made himself responsible for a breach of trust for which I can hold them liable. With reference to the prospectus, it seems to me to have little or no bearing, and I should not have referred to it, if it had not been for the reliance placed on Lord Chelmsford's observations in Oakes v. Turquand, in which he considered that the directors were not justified in keeping back the second instrument with reference to the four millions, when they were inviting persons in the prospectus to join the company. I have nothing more to say about that part of the case. That may or may not justify a particular creditor saying "You have mislead me by the misrepresentations of your prospectus, and therefore I ought to be released from the company altogether." That appears to me to be a totally different question from the company itself having armed these gentlemen with an authority, which authority they have exercised, which does not depend upon what was said or done in the prospectus, but upon the terms of the articles and memorandum of association; and then I must look to see what the contract with the company and the whole body of the directors is. We can look to nothing else but the articles of association and the memorandum of association, and I find that the directors are armed with such powers by that instrument as justify them, as it appears to me in this court, in saying that they have acted to the best of their judgment, however erroneously, and are, therefore, not liable to answer to those who have entrusted them with such large powers for a breach of trust. I hold, therefore, that in this case I ought to reverse the decision of the Vice-Chancellor, and hold that the demurrer ought to have been allowed, and ought to have been allowed with the usual consequences.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Uptons, Johnson, and Upton, solicitors for the appellants.

Maynard and Son, solicitors for the respondents.

ROLLS COURT.

Reported by HENRY PEAT and HENRY GODEFROI, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

April 23 and 26.

GRAHAM v. JOHNSON.

Voluntary bond—Assignee for valuable consideration—Subsisting equities—Forbearance to sue—Promise to pay made in ignorance of right to relief.

G., an officer in the Indian army, and J., a barrister practising in India, having been in the habit of accepting accommodation bills for each other, J. one day asked G. to give him further assistance by signing a document, which G. did sign. This document was a bond for 1000l., but G. alleged that he believed it to be a negotiable security like the accommodation bills, which he had accepted. At the same time G. wrote a letter to J., in which he said that he owed a good deal of money to J., and wished to give him a promise to pay 1000l., adding, "I mean so that you can raise the wind on it." There was no consideration for the bond. J. assigned it to B. for valuable consideration. B.'s solicitors applied to G. for payment of the amount secured; whereupon G. promised to pay, if B. would wait till he received some money to which he was entitled under his father's will. B.'s solicitors consented, and deferred taking proceedings.

On a bill by G. to have the bond cancelled, and to restrain J. and B. from taking proceedings on it, Held, that G. was entitled to have the bond set aside as against J., and also as against B., who took it, subject to the equities subsisting between G. and J., there being nothing on the face of the bond to show the intention that it should be used as a negotiable instrument, and G.'s promise to pay B. having been made in ignorance of his right to relief.

Forbearance to sue is a good consideration for a promise to pay only when the right to sue exists.

Re Agra and Masterman's Bank; Ex parte Asiatic Banking Corporation, 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 162; L. R. 2 Ch. App. 391, examined and distinguished.

This was a suit instituted by the plaintiff to procure the cancellation of, and to restrain the prosecution of any action upon, a bond which had come into the possession of the defendants to the suit under the following circumstances:—

The plaintiff, Thomas Chadwick Graham, a captain in Her Majesty's 4th Regiment of Bengal European Light Cavalry, became acquainted with the defendant Henry Charles Ross Johnson, who was a barrister practising at Calcutta, during a visit of both parties to this country. On his return to India in Feb. 1862 Graham renewed his acquaintance with Johnson, and they became intimate friends, and accepted accommodation bills for each other.

After Graham had accepted several bills in this manner, Johnson on the morning of the 6th March 1862 requested Graham to give him a little further assistance with his signature. Graham, according to his own account, went accordingly to Johnson's chambers, where Johnson produced a document for his signature, which he (Graham) signed in the presence of a witness whom Johnson fetched for the purpose, and who was, Graham alleged, an utter stranger to him. This document was in the following terms:

Calcutta, 6th March 1862.

Know all men by these presents that I, Thomas Chadwick Graham, at present of Calcutta, a captain in Her Majesty's Bengal Light Cavalry, am held and firmly bound unto Henry Charles Ross Johnson, now of Calcutta, Esq., barrister-at-law, or his assigns, or heirs, or administrators, or executors, for the payment on demand of the sum of company's rupees 10,000 of lawful money of Bengal, or its equivalent, in lawful money of Great Britain. And further, for such payment to be well and truly paid unto the said Henry Charles Ross Johnson, or his assigns, executors, administrators, or heirs, I hereby bind, as well as myself, my heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, also firmly by these presents. In witness whereof my hand and seal delivered this 6th March in the year of our Lord 1862.

T. C. GRAHAM (L.S.),
Capt. H.M. Bengal Lt. Cavalry.

Signed, sealed, and delivered in the presence of us together,

G. S. Thompson,
Grish Chunder Chatterjee,
Clerk to Mr. Bell, barrister-at-law.

The plaintiff alleged that this document was never read over by him, nor by Johnson to him, that the contents or effect of it were not explained to him by Johnson before he signed it, or at any time; and that Johnson excused himself from doing so on the ground that it would be "of no use," and that he having perfect confidence in Johnson asked no questions concerning it. The plaintiff further alleged that he did not know that the document was a bond, and was ignorant of the legal nature or effect of a bond, and that he understood it to be a means to enable Johnson to raise money as in the case of the bills of exchange which he had previously accepted for Johnson, and that he signed the document under that impression.

The plaintiff also alleged that immediately after he had signed the bond, Johnson dictated to him the contents of a letter which he at Johnson's request wrote and delivered to him, and which was in the following terms:

Wilson's Hotel, March 6th, 1862.

My dear Johnson,—As you have been my security for some thousands, and as by rights I should owe you a good deal of money, not only for money paid, but for services performed, and also for our many long and confidential consultations, never forgetting our last, and your extricating me from the payment of the 1000*l.* to Col. Harvey, and perhaps the bother of a court of inquiry; I repeat that for these reasons I am anxious to give you a promise in writing to pay you, say company's rupees 10,000, on demand, or 1000*l.* I don't know much about business, so you draw it up in the way you may think most pucka (i. e., binding) on me, or, if I go out, my representatives. I am sorry to hear your business gets on so slowly. When do you think Mr. Public Works will stump up? Yours sincerely, T. C. GRAHAM.

P.S.—Of course you can, or promise in any way you like —I mean so that you can raise the wind on it.

In his answer, Johnson gave the following version of the transaction:—"On the 6th March 1862 the plaintiff, who was then staying at Wilson's Hotel, Calcutta, came to my chambers and said that he felt very grateful to me for assistance which I had rendered to him in various ways, and that he desired to make me a substantial recompense for what I had done for him, but that, inasmuch as he would not come into possession of his property until he was thirty-five years old, he could not then pay me the sum which he desired to pay me. In order, however, to prevent my losing it in the event of his death, he would, he said, give me such a security for it as would enable me to raise the money. The plaintiff then sat down and wrote a letter to me, which was as follows": (the letter of the 6th March 1862, set forth above).

The plaintiff alleged that the only sum for which Johnson had become security for him, and that only jointly with another person, was 9000 rupees, or 900*l.*, and that the only money which Johnson had ever paid on his account consisted of trifling sums paid by him for the stamps on the bills of exchange.

Johnson, in his answer, admitted that the plaintiff received no pecuniary consideration for the bond, but that it was voluntarily executed by the plaintiff as above stated.

In May 1862 one of the plaintiff's friends wrote a letter on behalf of the plaintiff to Johnson, asking for an account of the liabilities which the plaintiff was under for him, and Johnson, in his reply, mentioned several bills, but made no mention of the bond.

In Feb. 1864, when the plaintiff was about to set out for England, he visited Johnson at Meerut, in order to obtain some information about his liabilities on Johnson's account. He then asked Johnson, "What was it I signed for you in presence of the witness?" and was assured that it was only a transaction between themselves, and that Johnson was the proper person to be "come down upon," or that it was nothing that he (the plaintiff) could be "come down upon for." For the plaintiff's further satisfaction, Johnson, on the occasion of that visit, wrote a letter to the plaintiff in the following words:—

My dear Graham,—In answer to your queries of this day's date I have paid off all the bills bearing our joint names but one for 6000 rupees, now overdue nearly two years, and towards liquidation of which I have paid some 2000 or 3000 rupees, and signed an agreement to pay 12 per cent. till liquidation of the balance. . . . . There is nothing more you can become liable for me for. Yours sincerely, H. C. ROSS JOHNSON.

Meerut, the 6th Feb. 1864.

By an indenture dated 28th Dec. 1864, and made between Johnson of the one part, and Charles Grant Barlow (also a defendant to this suit) of the other part, in consideration of 10,000 rupees in accepted bills granted to Johnson by Barlow, Johnson assigned the bond to Barlow. When Johnson applied to Barlow to accept the bills, and proposed to assign the bond to him, it was alleged that he produced Graham's letter of the 6th March 1862, and assured Barlow that valuable consideration had been given for the bond.

In Aug. 1865 the plaintiff received a letter from Barlow's solicitors, inquiring what arrangement he was prepared to make for the liquidation of the bond, or for giving security for its payment.

The plaintiff was in Paris when he received this letter, and being, as he alleged, without professional advice and ignorant of Johnson's address, and believing that, although he had received no consideration for the bond, he was liable thereupon to Barlow, wrote a letter to Barlow's solicitors in reply to their letter, in the following words:—

Poste restante, Paris.

Aug. 17th, 1865.

Dear Sir,—I am in receipt of your letter of the 8th, forwarded from the Isle of Wight, and beg to say in reference to my bond for 10,000 rupees, in favour of Mr. H. C. Ross Johnson, that at the expiration of the present vacation I expect to obtain the property I am entitled to by my late father's will, when I shall have the means to and will settle the same. I therefore hope this proposed arrangement will be satisfactory, and remain, yours faithfully, T. C. GRAHAM.

In reply, Barlow's solicitors said that they would advise their client to defer his proceedings if there was a prospect of the plaintiff obtaining the property referred to within a reasonable time, and accordingly no proceedings were then taken in the matter.

In Jan. 1866 the plaintiff, having been informed of his right to relief in equity from payment of the bond, instituted the present suit to obtain cancellation of the bond, and thereupon Barlow at once commenced an action in the name of Johnson against the plaintiff upon the bond. In Dec. 1866 an order was made in the suit that Graham should allow judgment to be entered against him in the action, and that execution should be stayed until the hearing of the cause.

The cause now came on for hearing on motion for decree.

Southgate, Q.C. and Cates, for the plaintiff, argued that he was clearly entitled to have the bond set aside as against Johnson, as it had been executed without any pecuniary consideration, and the services referred to in Graham's letter of the 6th March 1862, being those of a barrister, it was settled that they could not be the consideration for such a document: (Brown v. Kennedy, 9 L. T. Rep. N. S. 302, 736; 33 Beav. 133.) Moreover the plaintiff executed the bond in ignorance of its effect and legal nature. He was also, they submitted, entitled to have it set aside as against Barlow, who being the assignee of a chose in action, could only have taken it subject to the equities subsisting between the plaintiff and Johnson. Barlow must take the consequences of not having ascertained whether the bond was tainted with fraud or irregularity before buying it, for the purchaser of a chose in action was bound to make such inquiries; this was clearly settled by The Athenæum Life Insurance Company v. Pooley, 3 De G. & J. 294; 28 L. J. 119, Ch.; and Cockle v. Taylor, 15 Beav. 103.

The forbearance of Barlow to sue was not a good consideration for the plaintiff's promise to redeem the bond, for the plaintiff made the promise in ignorance of his rights. They cited

Bell v. Gardiner, 4 Man. & Gr. 11;
Chitty on Contracts, p. 25.

Jessel, Q.C. and Hemming, for the defendant Barlow, contended that the plaintiff's letter of the 6th March 1862, having clearly been written for the purpose of inducing third parties to advance money on the bond, precluded him from setting up against a bona fide purchaser of it the equity which he had against Johnson. On this point they cited

Re Agra and Masterman's Bank; Ex parte Asiatic Banking Corporation, 16 L. T. Rep. N.S. 162; L. Rep. 2 Ch. App. 391;
Re Blakely Ordnance Company; Ex parte New Zealand Banking Corporation, 18 L. T. Rep. N.S. 132; L. Rep. 3 Ch. App. 154;
Re General Estates Company; Ex parte City Bank, 18 L. T. Rep. N.S. 894; L. Rep. 3 Ch. App. 758.

They contended moreover that the plaintiff was bound by his promise to Barlow's solicitors, upon the faith of which promise they had forborne to sue him till after he had filed his bill in the present suit. They cited

Forth v. Stanton, 1 Wms. Saund. 210, note;
Lee v. Muggeridge, 5 Taunt. 36.

Cracknall, for the defendant Johnson, contended that upon the evidence the bond was intended by the plaintiff as a gift to Johnson, and that it had not been obtained by undue influence. Johnson's services to the plaintiff formed a consideration on which the bond might be supported. He cited

Hunter v. Atkins, 3 My. & Kee. 113;
Kennedy v. Brown, 13 C. B. 677.

Lord ROMILLY, without calling for a reply, said: I think the plaintiff is entitled to a decree against both defendants. The cases against the two defendants are distinct, and I will take them separately. First as regards Johnson, the plaintiff and he were intimate friends, and were in the habit of accepting accommodation bills for each other. In that state of things the plaintiff, at Johnson's invitation, comes to Johnson's chambers; Johnson produces a bond prepared and engrossed, by which the plaintiff binds himself to pay Johnson 1000*l.*, and the plaintiff executes the bond and sits down and writes this letter. [His Lordship read the letter of the 6th March 1862.] The plaintiff says that this letter was dictated to him by Johnson; this Johnson denies, and I think that probably it was not actually dictated by him, but I think it is clear that it was written at his instance. The letter is dated from Wilson's Hotel, where the plaintiff was living; it is quite unintelligible why this should have been done and why the plaintiff should have stated all the circumstances mentioned in the letter, if he was only making Johnson a present of 1000*l.* But the plaintiff says that he thought he was only doing what he had done before, putting his name to a bill or negotiable instrument upon which Johnson could raise money, but which he (the plaintiff) would never be called upon to pay. Afterwards, being alarmed at the circumstance of a witness having been present when he signed the bond, the plaintiff asks Johnson about his liabilities, and Johnson gives him a letter, in which he does not mention the bond, and in which he says, "There is nothing more you can become liable for me for." I am satisfied that the plaintiff's is the true account of the transaction, and that Johnson has failed to make out that the bond was intended as a bona fide present of 1000*l.* to him. There was nothing whatever to induce the plaintiff to make him such a present, and if he had done so, I think that he might have insisted on having it back the next day. After Johnson's letter of Feb. 1864, the plaintiff naturally thought no more about the matter until a claim was made upon him by the assignee of the bond, and thereupon he wrote to Johnson asking to be kept harmless, which is quite consistent with his own account of the transaction. Under these circumstances, I am clearly of opinion that, as against Johnson, the plaintiff is entitled to have the bond cancelled. The plaintiff was twenty-six years old, Johnson was thirty-two; they met together after a month's familiar association, and one gave the other a bond, believing it to be a bill of exchange. I think Johnson was bound to give up the bond, if the plaintiff required it, and that this is a case in which the right to have the bond given up is not affected by delay. The case against Barlow is different; he is the bonâ fide assignee of the bond, and has given valuable consideration for it. Now the general rule is well settled, that the assignee of a chose in action takes it subject to all the equities affecting the original holder, and the question is whether there is anything in the circumstances of this case to take it out of the general rule. The first defence put forward by Barlow is, that this bond was given by the plaintiff to Johnson as a negotiable security. But that does not alter the character of the instrument; a bond is not a negotiable instrument, and the mere fact that the bond was given with the intention that it should be used as a negotiable instrument, the intention not being expressed on the face of the bond, does not make it a negotiable instrument. This bond is, upon the face of it, a mere bond, and the assignee was bound to know that in taking an assignment of such a bond he would take it subject to the equities subsisting between the obligor and obligee. The case is very different where upon the face of the instrument it is made negotiable; that was the case in Re Agra and Masterman's Bank (supra), where the bank, by the terms of the letter of credit, expressly contracted to honour the bills negotiated upon the faith of the letter of credit. The letter was to be shown to the persons who were to negotiate the bills, and they were requested to endorse on the letter the amount which they advanced. It was, in fact, an ordinary letter of credit, such as a banker gives to a person going abroad, upon which each of the foreign bankers who advances money upon it indorses the amount which he has paid, and the bank could not, after having held out to persons who were to negotiate the bills that it would be answerable for their payment, refuse to be answerable on the ground of any equity between the bank and the persons to whom the letter was given. If the plaintiff had said in this bond, "I undertake to pay anyone who shall advance money on the faith of this bond," the case would have been within the authority of Re Agra and Masterman's Bank, but it would be introducing a new doctrine if I were to hold that the assignee of a bond is relieved from the equities between the original parties by an unexpressed intention. Barlow's second ground of defence is, that what took place in 1865 between the plaintiff and Barlow's solicitors, created a new and independent contract between the plaintiff and Barlow. Now, in all the cases in which forbearance to sue has been held to be a sufficient consideration to support a promise to pay, the person forbearing to sue has had a right to sue. I have not now to consider what would have been the effect if Barlow had been induced to deliver up the bond to the plaintiff by the plaintiff's promise to settle it; but the question I have to consider is whether, assuming, as I must assume, that the plaintiff when he made the promise was ignorant that the Court of Chancery would restrain an action on the bond without requiring him to pay off what had been paid by Barlow to the obligee, his promise made in consideration of Barlow's forbearance to sue is binding on him. I think it is not; and that he is not, under the circumstances, precluded by it from availing himself against Barlow of the equities between himself and Johnson. I will, therefore, make a decree for a perpetual injunction to restrain the defendants from prosecuting any action at law or other proceedings against the plaintiff upon the bond, and satisfaction must be entered upon the judgment. I shall not make Barlow pay costs, but Johnson must pay the plaintiff's costs.

Digitized by Google

Solicitor for the plaintiff, Elgood.

Solicitors for the defendants, Moseley, Tayler, and Moseley; Johnston, Farquhar, and Leech.

April 30 and May 24.

ELGOOD v. COLE.

Will—Construction—"Profits"—Surviving family—Power of appointment—Execution of by will.

A testatrix, by her will, gave certain real and personal property to her daughter, Mary Anne, absolutely. She afterwards made a codicil to her will, which contained the following words:—"The profits arising in my will, which I have given my daughter Mary Anne, I give her for her life, and at her disposal by will into my surviving family, as she may think proper. In case she died without a will, then I request her property may be divided to the females in Mrs. L.'s, Mr. W.'s, and Mr. J.'s daughters, share and share alike." Mary Anne, by her will, in which she made no reference to her mother's will or codicil, gave all her property to her neice R., who was a grandchild of the testatrix:

Held, first, that the words, "the profits arising in my will," were confined to the real estate of the testatrix.

Secondly, that R. was one of the members of the testatrix's family, and one of the objects of the power.

Thirdly, that Mary Anne's will was not a good execution of the power, but that it operated upon all her property not included in the codicil.

Stillman v. Weedon, 16 Sim. 26, not followed.

This was a suit instituted by the legal personal representative of Mrs. Elizabeth Cole to obtain the decision of the court as to the rights of certain persons in the residuary personal estate of the testatrix.

By her will dated the 28th Oct. 1833, the testatrix (after reciting her husband's will, whereby he gave and devised all his estates, hereditaments, and premises, as well freehold as leasehold, at certain places therein named, to trustees upon trust, from and after the decease of his wife, for such persons and in such manner as she should by deed or will appoint) in exercise of the said power contained in her late husband's will, appointed and devised the same estates, hereditaments, and premises to trustees upon trust to pay the rents, issues, and annual produce thereof to such of her children, William George Cole, Robert Martin Cole, John James Cole, Elizabeth Laing, Maria Cole, and Mary Anne Cole as should be living at the time of her (the testatrix's) death, during their natural lives, share and share alike; and in case of the death of any or either of her said children either in her lifetime or after her decease (except her daughters Maria Cole and Mary Ann Cole) upon trust to pay and apply the share or shares in the said rents and profits of such child or children so dying and leaving lawful issue him or her surviving to or for the benefit of his, her, or their child or children respectively until the decease of the survivor of all her (the testatrix's) said children: and after the death of all her children upon trust to hold the said estates, hereditaments, and premises (except certain ground-rents therein mentioned) as to one-sixth part thereof to and for the use of her said daughter Mary Anne Cole in fee. And after making certain bequests, as to all the rest and residue of her personal estate and effects whatsoever and wheresoever, the testatrix gave and bequeathed the same unto her two sons, Henry Robert Cole and William George Cole, and her two daughters Maria Cole and Mary Anne Cole, their executors and administrators, equally to be divided between them, share and share alike.

The testatrix made ten codicils to her will, the second of which alone was material to the present suit, and which was dated the 8th Jan. 1835, and was in the following words:

A codicil to my last will and testament, dated 28th Oct. 1833. The profits arisseing in my will, which I have given to my daughter Mary Anne Cole, I give her for her life and at her disposal by will into my surviveing family as she may think proper. In case she dies without a will, then I request her property may be divid'd to the feemails in Mrs. Laing's, Mr. W. G. Cole's, and Mr. Jno. Jas. Cole's daughters, share and share alike.

The testatrix died in Sept. 1837.

Mary Anne Cole made her will dated the 28th Aug. 1863, and thereby, after giving certain legacies, bequeathed all the residue of her estate subject to the payment of her just debts, funeral and testamentary expenses and legacies, and the expenses of carrying into effect the trusts of that her will, unto her niece and goddaughter, Rosa Anne Cole, for her own absolute use and benefit, and appointed the plaintiff executor of her will.

This will did not contain any allusion to the will or codicils of Elizabeth Cole, and did not purport to be made in exercise of the power given to Mary Anne Cole by her mother's will.

Questions arose in the administration of the estate of Elizabeth Cole in regard to the one-fourth share of her residuary personal estate bequeathed by her will to Mary Anne Cole, as to the effect and meaning of the said codicil of the 8th Jan. 1835, and whether Rosa Anne Cole (who was made a defendant to the present suit) was entitled thereto by virtue of Mary Anne Cole's will, or whether such one-fourth share was divisible amongst the daughters of Mrs. Laing, Mr. W. G. Cole, and Mr. Jno. Jas. Cole, living at the decease of the said Elizabeth Cole, or born after her decease and before the death of the said Mary Anne Cole.

To determine these questions the plaintiff instituted the present suit, to which Rosa Anne Cole and Elizabeth Laing were made defendants.

Cates, for the plaintiff, took no part in the argument.

W. W. Karslake, for Rosa Anne Cole, submitted that she was within the power, as it was well settled that the donee of such a power might select persons not within the degree of next of kin, and that Mary Anne Cole's will was a good execution of the power given to her by her mother's will, though it did not purport to be an execution of the power. He cited,

Grant v. Lynam, 4 Russ. 292;
Williams v. Williams, 1 Sim. N. S. 358;
Stillman v. Weedon, 16 Sim. 26.

Southgate, Q.C., for Mrs. Laing (who represented the persons claiming under the gift over in the codicil of 8th Jan. 1835), cited,

Weale v. Ollive, 32 Beav. 421;
Knight v. Poole, 32 Beav. 548;
Cripps v. Wolcott, 4 Madd. 11.

Google

May 24.—Lord ROMILLY.—This is a suit to determine the rights of certain persons under the will and codicils of Mrs. Elizabeth Cole, who made her will in the year 1833, and afterwards made ten codicils to her will. On the second codicil the questions arise for the decision of which this suit was instituted. [His Lordship stated the will, and read the second codicil.] The first question which arises is, what does this codicil include under the words "the profits arising in my will?" I think that these words are confined to the income arising from the real estate, which she designates in the will by the words "rents and profits." The second question is, what is the meaning of the word "family;" and whether a person who is niece of Mary Anne Cole and grandchild of the testatrix comes within the word "family," and is one of the objects of the power contained in the codicil. The third question is whether Mary Anne Cole's will is a good execution of the power contained in the codicil. The cases on the meaning of the word "family" are very numerous, and its meaning depends on a variety of circumstances. Sometimes it means heir-at-law, at other times it means next of kin. In the present case I am of opinion that the niece of Mary Anne Cole and grandchild of the testatrix is one of the members of her family, one of the objects of the power contained in the codicil, and one of the persons to whom Mary Anne Cole must have given the interest given to her by her mother's will. But on the third and most important question, viz., whether Mary Anne Cole's will is a good execution of the power, I have reluctantly come to the conclusion that it is not, and that it is not assisted by the 27th section of the Wills Act, inasmuch as that relates only to general powers, while this cannot be treated as a general power, inasmuch as the appointees, the objects of the power, must be members of the surviving family of the testatrix. The case of Stillman v. Weedon (sup.), to which I was referred, seems to have a contrary tendency; but that case must be considered as resting on its own foundation exclusively. That case was very peculiar, and was affected by two different powers contained in it. I am of opinion, therefore, on the whole, that the codicil of the first testatrix is confined to the real estate, and that the will of the donee of the power, Mary Anne Cole, is not a good execution of the power given to her; but that it operates upon all that Mary Anne Cole tried to dispose of which was not included in the codicil.

Solicitor for all parties, Elgood.

May 29; June 1 and 3.

THE WATFORD AND RICKMANSWORTH RAILWAY COMPANY v. THE LONDON AND NORTH-WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

Suit for account—Agreement to refer—Railway Companies Arbitration Act 1859 (22 & 23 Vict. c. 59), sects. 2 and 26—Jurisdiction.

An agreement entered into between two companies contained an arbitration clause, by which it was provided that in every case in which any difference should arise between the two companies touching the construction of the agreement, or touching anything to be done, &c., in pursuance of the agreement, or touching any of the incidents or consequences of the agreement, &c., should be referred to and determined by arbitration according to the provisions of the Railway Companies Arbitration Act 1859.

On a bill by one of the companies praying for an account as to matters connected with the agreement, to which the other company objected, requiring the matters to be referred to arbitration:

Held that the 26*th section of the Act renders it compulsory on the court to give full effect to the agreement to refer.*

Bill accordingly dismissed.

This was a suit to obtain a declaration of the rights of the above-named railway companies, under an agreement made between them, and dated the 16th June 1862; the bill also prayed for the taking of accounts, and the payment of what should be found due to the plaintiff company under the agreement.

The plaintiff company was incorporated by the Watford and Rickmansworth Railway Act 1860, for the purpose of making a branch line from the Watford station of the London and North-Western Railway to Rickmansworth, and the agreement of the 16th June 1862 was entered into between the two companies for the working of the branch line by the defendant company, when opened for traffic. This agreement provided that as soon as the branch line should be completed to the satisfaction of the inspector to be appointed by the Board of Trade, so as to be opened for public traffic, and should have been passed by such inspector, together with all proper and sufficient sidings, stations, approaches, works, and conveniences, the plaintiff company should hand the same over to the defendant company, who should thereafter work and use the same with their own engines and carriages, and at their own expense; that on and after the expiration of one year after the completion and opening for traffic of the branch line, the defendant company should, at their own expense, keep in repair and maintain the same in good working order or condition; that in consideration of such working and use as aforesaid, the defendant company should pay to the plaintiff company half yearly a sum equal to 50 per cent. of the actual amount of the gross earnings from tolls, rates, and charges (to be fixed and levied in manner therein provided) received by them in respect of traffic of all kinds, as well local as through, over, and in respect of the branch line or any part thereof; that the defendant company should, within forty-four days after the 30th June and the 31st Dec. in each year, make out and submit to the plaintiff company a true and particular account of the gross earnings from traffic of all kinds, local as well as through, due in respect of such traffic over or upon the branch line or any part thereof, and should, if and when so required, duly verify such accounts, and permit inspection and transcripts to be made at reasonable times and by one or two persons to be appointed by the plaintiff company, of all books, vouchers, and documents relating thereto, and that such accounts respectively, if not objected to within fourteen days from the delivery thereof, should be accepted as final and conclusive except as to manifest errors; and if objected to, in whole or in part, and any difference or dispute should arise thereon, such difference or dispute should be referred to an accountant to be agreed upon between the companies, or, failing such agreement, to be nominated by the secretary for the time being of the Committee of the Railway Clearing-house, London.

The agreement contained an arbitration clause in the following words:—

In every case in which any difference shall arise between the London and North Western Company and the Watford Company, touching the true intent or construction of this agreement, or touching anything to be done, suffered, or omitted in pursuance of this agreement, or touching any of the incidences or consequences of this agreement, or touching any breach or non-fulfilment of this agreement, or touching any liability, damages, losses, costs, or expenses by reason of any such breach or non-fulfilment, or touching any claim or demand relating to any such liability, damages, losses, costs or expenses, or otherwise relating to the premises, every such difference shall be referred to and determined by arbitration according to the provisions of the Railway Companies Arbitration Act 1859.

The consent of the Board of Trade having been obtained, the Watford and Rickmansworth Railway was opened for traffic on the 1st Oct. 1862, and soon afterwards disputes began to arise between the parties to the agreement, the defendant company alleging that the branch line was not constructed in such a manner as to enable them to work it profitably.

By the present bill, which was filed in Aug. 1867, the plaintiff company claimed that there was due to them 50 per cent. on the sum of 8275*l.* 9*s.* 5*d.*, which they alleged to be the amount of the gross traffic earnings received by the defendant company; they prayed that the rights of the two companies under the agreement of the 16th June 1862, might be declared; that an account might be taken of the tolls, rates and charges levied or charged by the defendant company for the conveyance of passengers and goods upon the branch line; and that what should be found due to the plaintiff company in respect thereof might be ordered to be paid to the plaintiff company with compound interest at 5 per cent. per annum.

The defendant company claimed by their answer that they were entitled to set off against the plaintiff company's claims, sums amounting to more than the plaintiff company's claim, expended by them in completing the branch line, which they alleged ought to have been completed by the plaintiff company. They submitted that the proper remedy of the plaintiff company was by an action at law or by a reference to arbitration under the agreement, and not by a suit in equity, and they claimed the benefit of the objection as if they had raised it by demurrer or plea.

Locock Webb (with him Sir R. Baggallay, Q.C.), for the plaintiff company, first examined the items of the defendants' claim to set off, which were set out in a schedule to their answer, and submitted that their claim was unfounded. He submitted that the courts of law and equity had concurrent jurisdiction in a case of this sort, that this was a case which could not be satisfactorily dealt with at law, and that when proceedings were once commenced in equity, the court would direct an account to be taken. He cited

The South-Eastern Railway Company v. Brogden, 3 M. & G. 8;
O'Connor v. Spaight, 1 Sch. & Lef. 305;
Nixon v. The Taff Vale Railway Company, 1 H. of L. Cas. 111;
The North-Eastern Railway Company v. Martin, 2 Phil. 759; 5 Rail. Cas. 478.

As to the question of arbitration, he submitted that it was not compulsory upon the court to grant an arbitration, as there was no covenant in the agreement not to sue; this was clearly decided by the authorities on former Arbitration Acts, and he submitted that the Railway Companies Arbitration Act 1859 did not go any further than the other Arbitration Acts which preceded it. He cited

Scott v. The Corporation of Liverpool, 3 De G. & J. 334;
Halfhide v. Fenning, 2 Bro. C. C. 336;
Dimsdale v. Robertson, 2 J. & L. 58;
Scott v. Avery, 5 H. of L. Cas. 811;
The Earl of Mexborough v. Bower, 7 Beav. 132;
McIntosh v. The Great Western Railway Company, 3 Sm. & G. 146;
Croskey v. The European and American Steam Shipping Company, 2 L. T. Rep. N. S. 566; 1 J. & H. 108;
Cooke v. Cooke, 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 313; L. Rep. 4 Eq. 77.

Speed, for the defendant company, contended that the account asked for was of such a simple nature that it could be obtained in an action at law, and that the agreement being one of which the court could not enforce specific performance, as it was one for the working of the branch line in perpetuity, the court would not decree an account. In The South-Eastern Railway Company v. Brogden (sup.) Lord Cottenham decreed an account, but he did so on the well known principle that the account was a complicated account, but in the present case there was no complication. He also referred to

O'Connor v. Spaight (sup.);
Nixon v. The Taff Vale Railway Company (sup.);
Dabbs v. Nugent, 13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 396; 11 Jur. N. S. 943;
Dinwiddie v. Bailey, 6 Ves. 136;
Phillips v. Phillips, 9 Hare, 471;
Padwick v. Hurst, 18 Beav. 575;
Foley v. Hill, 2 H. of L. Cas. 28;
The North-Eastern Railway Company v. Martin (sup.)
Smith v. Leveaux, 9 L. T. Rep. N. S. 313; 2 De G. J. & S. 1;
Moxon v. Bright, L. Rep. 4, Ch. App. 292;
Kernot v. Potter, 3 De G. F. & J. 447.

Moreover by the 2nd and 26th sections of the Railway Companies Arbitration Act 1859, taken in conjunction with the arbitration clause contained in the agreement of the 6th June 1862, the court was deprived of its jurisdiction.

Sir Richard Baggallay, Q.C. was heard in reply on the question of the effect of the sections of the Act, and the clause in the agreement on the jurisdiction of the court. He cited

Cook v. Catchpole, 11 L. T. Rep. N. S. 264.

The following sections of the Railway Companies Arbitration Act 1859, were relied upon by the defendant company:

Sect. 2:

Any two or more railway companies, whether already or hereafter incorporated (in this Act called "the companies") from time to time, by writing under their respective common seals, may agree to refer, and may refer, to arbitration, in accordance with this Act, any then existing or future differences, questions, or other matters whatsoever in which they then are, or thereafter shall be, mutually interested, and which they might lawfully settle or dispose of by agreement between themselves, and may delegate to the person or persons to whom the reference is made any power to determine all or any of the terms of any contract to be made between the companies which the directors of the companies might lawfully delegate to any committees of themselves respectively.

Sect. 26:

Full effect shall be given by all the Superior Courts of law and equity in the United Kingdom, according to their respective jurisdictions, and by the companies respectively and otherwise, to all agreements, references, arbitrations, and awards in accordance with this Act; and the performance or observance thereof may, where the courts think fit, be compelled by distress infinite on the property of the companies respectively, or by any other process against the companies respectively, or their respective property, that the courts or any judge thereof shall direct, and where requisite frame for the purpose.

June 3.—Lord ROMILLY.—On looking at the papers in this case I am quite satisfied that the account prayed by this bill is not one that would be taken in an action at law, but that if an action were brought the matter would at once be referred to arbitration. Many cases have been cited to me, but in these questions of account one case does not govern another, but each case depends upon its own circumstances. I am quite clear that the nature of this particular case is such that it would be a proper case for an account in equity; but a greater difficulty arises out of the agreement to refer disputes to arbitration. I am of opinion that it is impossible to evade the words of the agreement. The plaintiffs assert that the whole question between them is to be governed by the agreement, which they say has not been observed by the defendants; and they also say that the case made by the defendants for a set-off rests upon an alleged understanding, which was no part of the agreement. It is impossible, however, to escape from the words of the arbitration clause; the matters complained of by the plaintiffs have been done by the defendants either in pursuance of a right which they have under the agreement, or in non-fulfilment of their obligations under the agreement, and, in either case, these matters come within the questions agreed to be referred to arbitration. [His Lordship read the arbitration clause and the 2nd and 26th sections of the Railway Companies Arbitration Act 1859, and continued.] The present account is clearly within the arbitration clause; it remains to be considered whether the 26th section of the Act makes the reference to arbitration compulsory, and ousts the jurisdiction of the court, which is not ousted by an ordinary agreement to refer. The question is quite new to me, and no decision in point has been cited. The agreement, however, being clearly within the description contained in the 2nd section of matters which may be referred, I think that the words of the 26th section are conclusive, and render it compulsory upon the court to give full effect to the agreement. If the defendants will consent to waive the point, and, if both sides can agree as to the amounts of the items in dispute, I shall have no objection to act as arbitrator, and to hear in chambers and decide on the rights of the parties under the agreement; but if the defendants insist upon their right to take the objection that the plaintiffs' claim is covered by the arbitration clause, I must dismiss the plaintiffs' bill, but without costs, because the defendants might have raised their objection by plea.

Digitized by Google

Solicitor for the plaintiff company, W. Clarke.

Solicitor for the defendant company, Blenkinsop.

V. C. MALINS' COURT.

Reported by G. T. EDWARDS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

May 31st, and June 1st.

LAING v. REED.

Demurrer—Benefit society — Certificate of rules— 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 32.

The trustees of a Benefit Building Society by its 18th rule were empowered to borrow money, at interest on legal security, and be indemnified by the society, the trustees not being responsible, and the money borrowed not to exceed a certain proportion of the society's mortgages. A bill was filed charging that the rule was invalid, and to restrain such borrowing. On general demurrer to such bill,

Held, that the barrister's certificate was only conclusive as to matters within his jurisdiction, and that the question of the validity of the rule was one upon which by possibility the plaintiffs might be entitled to relief at the hearing. Demurrer overruled, reserving costs.

This was a general demurrer for want of equity to a bill filed by Thomas Heron Laing, on behalf of himself and all other the shareholders of the Northern Counties Permanent Benefit Building Society except the defendants, against Matthew Reed, William Brogg Leighton, and Mason Watson. The bill stated that the society was formed in January 1851, at Newcastle-on-Tyne, under 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 32, and rules were passed at a meeting, and certified by the barrister appointed for that purpose, the objects being thus stated: For raising, by weekly contributions, a stock or fund to enable each member to erect or purchase a dwelling-house, or other real or leasehold property. The affairs to be conducted by three trustees, two stewards, twelve directors, and a treasurer, surveyor, auditor, solicitor, and secretary, to be elected annually, except the trustees and stewards. The trustees ex officio to be directors, the funds and property being vested in them subject to the rules. That whenever a shareholder should desire to receive an advance he should make application, and if he did not offer security when the secretary gave notice, he should forfeit 2s. 6d. per share. The secretary at the first monthly meeting to produce to the directors all applications for advances, to be dealt with in a manner specified. As the society's funds accumulated, notice should be sent to shareholders on the list for advances informing them when they might receive them. The 18th rule was as follows:—

(1) That the trustees for the time being may, from time to time as occasion shall require, borrow and take up at interest any sum of money from any banker with whom the funds of this society shall be deposited, or from any other person; to procure which the trustees may give their own personal security, and they shall be indemnified out of the first funds of this society which shall be received. (2) That the parties lending money to the trustees of this society pursuant to the provisions herein contained, shall be allowed interest for the same at the rate of, and not exceeding, 5l. per cent. per annum, such interest to be payable half yearly or otherwise as may be agreed upon; and that all loans to the society shall be repayable to the lender by giving twenty-eight days' notice on any monthly meeting night of the society. (3) That for securing the repayment to the person or persons advancing the same, of all moneys to be so borrowed by the trustees, on behalf of the society as aforesaid, it shall be lawful for them, the said trustees, to give or authorise to be given such form of security as may be legal and as the said trustees shall think proper and necessary for or in respect of the same. (4) That no trustee (except by his consent expressly signified in writing on the security to be given to any banker) shall become responsible for any sum or sums of money so borrowed as aforesaid. And (5) That the total sum of money to be borrowed under the rule shall not at any one time exceed two-thirds of the amount for the time being secured by mortgages to the society, including mortgage or mortgages for which such advance or advances may be required.

That the society had carried on a considerable business for eighteen years, and the plaintiff on the 16th Jan. 1869 became a member and the registered holder of one unadvanced share, the defendants being the trustees. That said defendants from time to time and on the alleged authority of said 18th rule, had borrowed from various persons 66,362*l.* 19*s.* 8*d.* according to the financial statement of the society ending Dec. 1868, and submitted to a general meeting held the 18th Jan. 1869, secured by promissory notes signed by the defendants, and countersigned by the secretary, at six months, with interest at 5*l.* per cent., and it appeared by such statement that during the year 1868 8482*l.* 2*s.* 10*d.* had been paid out of the assets of the society for interest. The bill then charged that such 18th rule was absolutely illegal and invalid, and that the borrowing of money on behalf of the said society was beyond the powers of, and a breach of trust on the part of, the defendants as trustees, and the payment of such interest was a misappropriation of the funds and a breach of trust, for which the defendants were responsible. That the defendants had also lent a portion of the assets to other building societies, to wit, the Grange Permanent Benefit Building Society, and the Gateshead Institute Permanent Building Society, who were not members of the society, on the security of the promissory notes of the trustees. The plaintiff believed that those particular loans had been repaid, but he charged that they were absolutely void and illegal. The bill then charged generally that the transactions complained of were illegal and invalid, and incapable of confirmation by any majority of the shareholders, and alleged that the defendants threatened and intended to borrow money on behalf of the society and pay interest thereon, and that the defendants ought to be restrained from so doing, and from lending the assets until the moneys already borrowed had been repaid. That the shareholders were 1400 in number, too numerous to be made parties, and their interests were sufficiently resented by himself. And the bill prayed a declaration that the 18th rule of the society was absolutely illegal and invalid, and the borrowing money on behalf of the society and paying interest on it out of the assets, and lending any part of the assets to any person not being a member thereof were beyond the powers of, and a breach of trust on the part of, the defendants, and every other officer of the society. To restrain the defendants from borrowing money on behalf of the society and paying interest, and advancing any part of the assets to any member until all moneys borrowed by the defendants had been repaid, and from advancing any part of the assets to any person other than a member, and to provide for the costs.

Digitized by Google

Sir Roundell Palmer, Q. C., Osborne, Q. C., and Chitty, in support of the demurrer, contended that there was a statutory power to make rules, and those rules being certified by Mr. Tidd Pratt, that was conclusive of their legality. Independent of that, moreover, the terms of the statutes themselves showed that there was nothing whatever illegal or invalid in the 18th Rule. Sums were entirely comparative, and the 66,362*l.* 19*s.* 8*d.* might not be a large sum compared with the transactions of the society. It appeared on the allegations of the bill to be a flourishing one, and had continued for eighteen years doing a large business, and this rule had been acted upon satisfactorily and unquestioned during all that period, alone good evidence of its legality, and the plaintiff had now evidently purchased the least amount of interest he could acquire, merely for the purposes of the suit, and the court would look with little favour on such a person.

Mallock v. Jenkins, 14 Beav. 628;
Armitage v. Walker, 2 K. & J. 211-15;
6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 32, s. 4;
Dewhurst v. Clarkson, 3 Ell. & Bl. 206;
Pare v. Clegg, 29 Beav. 598;
Tidd Pratt's Practice of Benefit Societies;
Parker v. Butcher, L. Rep. 3 Eq. 762.

Glasse, Q. C. and Graham Hastings, for the plaintiff, insisted that however small his interest that had nothing to do with the matter; the case stated on the bill must be taken to be true on the demurrer. He was in fact a much better person to bring forward such a question, only having recently become a member, and therefore not having acquiesced in the wrong. It was a question of great public importance, and on the authorities the certificate of the barrister was only conclusive as to matters within the jurisdiction.

Kelsall v. Taylor, 11 Ex. 513;
Reg. v. Davis, W. N., Q. B. Jan. 1866, 24;
10 Geo. 4, c. 56, s. 3;
Grimes v. Harrison, 29 Beav. 440.

Sir Roundell Palmer, Q. C. in reply.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—This is a demurrer to the whole bill for want of equity, and, therefore, the question is whether the case so entirely fails, that I am bound, at this stage, to allow the demurrer and put an end to the litigation. (The Vice-Chancellor referred to the bill.) The objects of the society as stated in the bill, are entirely in conformity with the Act of Parliament, but it is alleged that one of the rules is entirely beyond the scope of it, viz., the 18th. (The Vice-Chancellor read the rule.) The power given by this rule is certainly, on the face of it, unlimited; it is "to borrow any sum from any person," the 5th paragraph of it only contains a restriction that the amount should not exceed two-thirds of the mortgages including the mortgage on the advance itself. (The Vice-Chancellor read the remainder of the bill.) It was argued in support of the demurrer that the court would not look with much favour upon a person who comes after eighteen years, no member having complained during all that time, and purchases a single share, I assume for the purpose of the suit. Mr. Glasse, for the bill, answered that by saying that the question may be one of general importance; and, for the purpose of raising that general question, a person not previously mixed up with the affairs of the society is a more proper plaintiff than an old member. Upon the demerits of the plaintiff and the object of instituting the suit I cannot enter on this demurrer; I can only take him as a shareholder prosecuting the litigation at his own risk, and therefore I cannot allow the demurrer on that ground. It is next said that this rule was certified by Mr. Tidd Pratt, and all rules so allowed are binding upon the society, and the 4th section of the 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 32, is conclusive on that subject. By this it is enacted that all rules and alterations of rules for the management of such societies from the time of the certificate shall be binding on the members and officers and all other persons having an interest therein. It is then said that the certificate is conclusive, and therefore the plaintiff is not at liberty and cannot sustain any claim as to the invalidity of this rule. But authorities have been cited on the other side which oblige me to come to the conclusion that that is not so. Although it is true that Dewhurst v. Clarkson (sup.) decided that the certificate is conclusive, two authorities show the contrary. Kelsall v. Taylor (sup.), and Reg. v. Davis (sup.), where it was held that the certificate is only conclusive as to matters within the barrister's jurisdiction, and will not give validity to a rule repugnant to the objects of the society, in strict conformity with the Act. The 1st section enacts that the society shal assemble from time to time to make proper and wholesome rules for the government, &c., of the society, so long as such rules shall not be repugnant to the express provisions of that Act and the general laws of the realm. I admit that to borrow is not repugnant to the laws of the realm; as to whether it is repugnant to the provisions of the Act, I do not intend to decide anything. I am bound to come to the conclusion that at this stage of the case I cannot put an end to it. If the plaintiff makes out a primâ facie case, the question must be decided at the hearing, when the court will be able to act upon complete information. Now, the Legislature says that by means of small periodical subscriptions a fund may be obtained to acquire freehold or leasehold property, and can I say that it is repugnant to the objects of such a society that they should have an unlimited power of borrowing and lending irrespective of the amount of the assets? As I understand it, the object of these societies is to receive from the members certain payments, that is, an income from such payments, fines, &c., that is to be accumulated, and when it is found that they have more than they want for the present expenses, that they should make advances to members, these being the subject of competition by ballot. I had occasion lately, in Ingles v. Cave, to consider this subject, and if it is said that in order to make advances money should be borrowed, one cannot help regarding it with some suspicion; and upon such materials as the bill presents a demurrer is a very inconvenient form to consider such a question. I am not told the extent of the mortgages; they may amount to a million, and, if so, the 66,000*l.* odd is a small proportion; but the bill alleges, and I must take it to be true, that 3652*l.* was paid last year for interest. It is settled by the two cases cited that the certificate is not final, and cannot give legality to that which is illegal otherwise, and Sir Roundell Palmer admitted that this rule did not authorise embarking in any trade, nor did the certificate make it legal. But I find it decided by the Court of Appeal that the certificate is not absolutely binding, and that it has been held that an order signed by the Lord Chancellor and Vice-Chancellors under the Winding-up Acts, was null because not within the scope of those Acts, and by the Court of Exchequer in Kellsall v. Tyler (sup.) that it was not within the province of the society then in question to take policies, all these questions I shall reserve until the hearing, not being satisfied that such an unlimited power of borrowing, is within the provisions of the Act, and warranted by law. Mallock v. Jenkins (sup.) was cited in support of the demurrer; but there the Master of the Rolls stopped the litigation, because there was an attempt to keep both land and money by raising a technical question; but, subsequently, the same judge, in Grimes v. Harrison (sup.) decided that it was beyond the scope of a benefit building society to transact business as a freehold land society. I also decided a similar point in a case where one man purchased, as the agent of another, and repudiated subsequently. Without, therefore, expressing any opinion upon this question, there being considerable doubt how far such a power as this is consistent with the object of the society, I overrule the demurrer, in order that the question may have full consideration on all the facts, and leave it now entirely open; and I shall reserve the question of costs until the hearing.

Digitized by Google

Solicitor for the plaintiff, John Tucker.

Solicitors for the defendants, Shum and Crossman

Thursday, July 8.

MONTGOMERY v. CAMERON.

Practice—Pro confesso—Requisite forms.

A defendant, having appeared and taken out a summons for time to answer interrogatories, was attached, and there was a return "non est," as he could not be found. On certificate of record and writ clerk, and evidence of service, and on fourteen days' notice, order made to take bill pro confesso.

Langley moved in this cause to take the bill pro confesso, on the usual fourteen days' notice. The bill was filed in respect of a breach of trust on the 5th Feb. 1869, and the defendant appeared in person on the 19th. Interrogatories were filed, and served on that day. On the 20th March the defendant took out a summons for time to answer; and on the 24th (a letter having been written meantime) an attachment issued, and a return was made of non est inventus. There was an affidavit of the sheriff's officer that on the 3rd June he served a warrant of arrest on the defendant for contempt, and attended at his residence at Richmond on six different occasions, on some of which he saw a female servant, and on one a lady, who said he was not within; and he had not been able to meet with him, although inquiries were subsequently made. There was the usual certificate of the proceedings of the record and writ clerk, and evidence of service:

Seton, 1265.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—You appear to have gone through all the regular forms, and you may therefore take the order.

Solicitor: Proudfoot.

Friday, July 9th.

Re CROCKFORD'S ESTATE.

Railway company—Payment into court—Will—Precatory trust.

A testator gave all his property, real and personal, to his wife, "relying upon her doing what was right." He left his wife and four daughters surviving, to whom the widow by her will left all her property in joint tenancy. A railway company took part of the land and raised an objection to the title that there was a precatory trust:

Held, that there was not.

Osborne, Q. C. and C. Locock Webb appeared upon a petition asking payment out of court of 500*l.* paid in under the provisions of the Lands Clauses Act in order that the Holywell Railway Company under this Act (1864) might take possession. William Crockford, by his will dated in May 1844, gave all his real and personal estate whatsoever and wheresoever to his wife, Sarah Crockford, and continued as follows: "relying on her doing what is right." Sarah Crockford by her will gave all her property to her four daughters (petitioners), who were all single, in such a manner as primâ facie to make them joint tenants, and they being in possession the railway company served them with the usual notice to treat and took the land in the ordinary way under the Lands Clauses Act, paying 500*l.* into court. It appeared that the testator had a son. An abstract title was delivered, and matters went on until the spring of the present year, when the company took an objection to the petitioners' title, contending that the will of William Crockford contained a precatory trust to the widow. The petitioners being ready to execute a conveyance, on the ground that the company were in truth only taking this and other objections in order to force them to sell another piece of land required by the company but which they had no Parliamentary powers to purchase, presented the present petition.

Fischer, for the company, contended that there was a trust granted by the will of William Crockford in favour of some objects, or for some purposes unknown, or which did not appear, but were probably known to the widow, and it made no difference that she had not acted upon it. In Briggs v. Penny, 3 M. & G. 546, there was a gift of certain property to Sarah Penny, her executors, administrators, and assigns, "well knowing that she will make a good use and dispose of it according to my views and wishes," and there it was held that there was a good trust. Moreover the abstract was quite insufficient, and there was no delay on the part of the company. The testator had also left a son.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR (without hearing a reply).—I cannot destroy the title of these petitioners upon a mere conjecture. If I were to yield to the argument they have no title at all. The sole question is whether, under the will of William Crockford, a trust was created. What he says is simply "relying upon her (his wife) doing what is right." Not, "I have told her to do anything"; neither the purpose nor the persons are indicated, and what language can possibly be more vague. It would be impossible for the court to act upon it, even supposing I held that there was a trust of some kind, unless there is some evidence from which a conclusion can be drawn. Taking the words in the largest sense, even if you read them "relying that under the circumstances she will make a good use of the property," what does that amount to more than that she can do with it as she chooses; in other words that he gave her, without any annexed obligation an absolute and unqualified interest, that is an estate in fee-simple. She then made her will devising this same property to her four single daughters in a manner which probably makes them joint-tenants of it for life with remainder to the survivor. It is admitted, indeed it cannot be denied, that the four petitioners amongst them took a fee-simple, and, therefore, the title is clear beyond all possibility of doubt. The company having been put into possession, if I entertained this objection I might keep this money in court for half a century. The contention cannot be sustained, and the argument founded on the testator having left a son must also fail, because mere lapse of time must prevail against him supposing all the rest clear, for once having began to run it was an absolute bar, no subsequent disabilities stopping it. Let the order be made, but not acted upon for a fortnight.

Solicitors for the company, Sharpe and Co.

V. C. JAMES'S COURT.

Reported by W. H. BENNET and R. T. BOULT, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Friday, May 7.

Re THE EAST AND WEST JUNCTION RAILWAY COMPANY.

Scheme—Railway Companies Act 1867—Debenture holders — Outside creditors — Absence of fraud — Effect of a majority of three-fourths of debenture holders.

A scheme of arrangement by a railway company with its creditors under the 30 & 31 Vict. c. 127 (The Railway Companies Act 1867), had been assented to by three-fourths in value of the debenture holders of the company.

Held, that in the absence of fraud to invalidate that majority, such assent was binding on all the other debenture holders of the company.

Held, also, that outside creditors were not bound by the scheme.

This was a petition by the directors of the above-named railway company to confirm the details of a scheme of arrangement between the company and its creditors under the Act.

The company was incorporated in 1864, under its particular Act, for the purpose of making a railway from the Northampton and Banbury Junction Railway to the Great-Western Railway at Stratford-on-Avon. The capital was to be 300,000*l.*, in 15,000 shares of 20*l.* each. They had all been issued and called up, and a sum of 100,000*l.*, which the company had power to borrow, had been raised on debentures.

In 1866 an application was made to Parliament to enable the company to increase their capital, and by the East and West Junction Railway (Capital) Act 1866 they were empowered to raise additional capital, not exceeding 300,000*l.* by the creation of new shares, and to borrow further sums, not exceeding 100,000*l.*, when the additional capital should have been subscribed for. It was also provided that all mortgages granted under the powers of the original Act should have priority over any mortgages granted by this Act.

Resolutions were passed at an extraordinary general meeting of the shareholders, held in Jan. 1867, for raising this additional capital, but nothing had been done under those resolutions, and since Aug. 1866 the works on the contemplated line, about twenty miles of which were partially completed, were suspended.

The company had no rolling stock, plant, or other property, beyond land held for the purposes of their undertaking to the alleged value of 43,000*l.*, and they were unable to meet the engagements to the outside creditors, or to pay the interest, much less the principal moneys, due on the debentures.

The debts and liabilities of the company in round numbers amounted to 195,000*l.*

In 1868 an attempt was made by the directors and other parties interested to extricate the company from its difficulties, and to complete the railway. An investigation took place, meetings were held, new directors had been appointed, and a scheme of arrangement was prepared, in which, as subsequently filed, under the Act of 1867 on the 8th March 1869, it was stated that "It is believed that the company can procure from a responsible and experienced contractor an agreement to complete the construction of the company's line of railway;" and that in the event of such a contract being entered into, the company would be able to procure 100,000*l.* on debentures to rank in priority to the existing share and debenture capital. The proposed scheme also stated "that the outside creditors whose claims amounted to 46,377*l.* 11*s.* 5*d.*, will, it is believed, agree to take in satisfaction of their respective claims, equivalent amounts of debenture stock of the company, such debenture stock ranking after the 100,000*l.* debenture stock, and also after the existing debentures of the company."

The scheme also contained inter alia the following provisions:

First. That the directors be at liberty to enter into a contract for the completion of the railway within twenty-four months for a sum not exceeding 230,000*l.*

Secondly. That in lieu of the additional share capital of 300,000*l.*, and 100,000*l.* debenture capital authorised to be raised, there shall be created and issued at a discount not exceeding 20*l.* per cent. on the nominal amount thereof debenture stock, to be called First Debenture Stock, to the amount of 400,000*l.*, bearing a fixed and perpetual interest at 5*l.* per cent.

Thirdly. That such First Debenture Stock and the interest thereof shall be a first charge on the company's undertaking, and shall have priority over the existing debentures of the company, and the interest thereof due and to become due.

Fourthly. That the existing debentures be converted into a sum of 100,000*l.* debenture stock, bearing interest as from six months after the date of the opening of the line at 6*l.* per cent., payable only out of the net profits of the year during which such interest accrues, to be called Second Debenture Stock, and to have priority over all other charges except first debenture stock.

Fifthly. Creation and issue of a debenture stock not exceeding 100,000*l.*, to bear interest at 6*l.* per cent, payment only out of the net profits of the year during which such interest accrues, as from six months after the opening of the railway, to be called Third Debenture Stock, to rank next in priority after the Second Debenture Stock, "and to be allotted and taken at par by the outside creditors of the company (including 8700*l.* 19*s.* 10*d.* arrears of interest, and including also interest on the original debentures, and also upon the claims of the outside creditors from the 31st July 1868 to the expiration of six months after the opening of the railway) as fully paid up stock, according to the amount of their respective debts, and in satisfaction thereof.

At a general meeting of the shareholders of the company especially convened for the purpose, the scheme was assented to without any dissentient, and debenture holders representing 75,280*l.*, out of 99,580*l.*, the amount actually issued, had also assented. It was also stated that nearly all the outside creditors had assented to the scheme.

The scheme, however, was opposed by a Mr. Toogood, a holder of nine mortgage bonds of 500*l.* each, containing an assignment of all the tolls and sums of money arising by virtue of the Companies Act of 1864, from the railway, and all the estate, right, title, and interest of the company therein, dated the 7th Sept. 1864, and falling due in Sept. 1869.

A judgment at law had been obtained by him against the company for 185*l.*, the arrears of interest upon his mortgage securities, and in Dec. 1868, he had filed his bill in the court of Malins, V.C., to enforce his security.

Digitized by Google

After the filing of the scheme the company had, on the 1st April 1869, served Mr. Toogood with notice of motion before James, V.C., for an injunction to restrain him from prosecuting his suit. This, on the 16th April, was ordered to stand over until he had amended his bill.

The scheme was also opposed by a Mr. Pell, who claimed to be a creditor to the amount of 15,000*l.*, for costs and professional charges. This claim was, however, disputed by the company, and by an affidavit made by the secretary in support of the present petition, he stated his belief that upon the matters between Mr. Pell and the company being properly gone into, it would be found that nothing was due to Mr. Pell.

Willcock, Q. C., and Fry, in support of the petition, contended that the scheme having been assented to by three-fourths in value of the debenture holders, such appeal bound the rest, and the scheme must be presumed to be right and proper.

C. Dale, for outside creditors to the amount of 25,000*l.*, assented to the terms of the scheme.

Westlake for Mr. Pell, the outside creditor.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said he considered that outside creditors would not be bound by the scheme. The effect of the judgment of Lord Cairns in the case of the Cambrian Railway Companies Scheme, L. Rep. 3 Ch. 278; 17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 512, 530, was to declare that the assent of outside creditors was not required. An outside creditor was not within the meaning of sect. 18 of the Act of 1867.

Westlake then contended that the court would not confirm any scheme which attempted to bind outside creditors without their written consent.

Re The Bristol and North-Somerset Railway Company, L. Rep. 6 Eq. 448; 17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 641.

E. E. Kay, Q. C., and J. Napier Higgins, for Mr. Toogood, the dissenting debenture holder. In addition to the case cited by Westlake, they relied on Furness v. Caterham Railway Company, 26 Beav. 614, 27 Beav. 358.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said:—In this case I am of opinion that the scheme ought to be confirmed, notwithstanding the objections that have been raised to it, and I propose to preface my order by a declaration that the court is of opinion that according to the true construction of the scheme it does not, and does not purport to, bind the outside creditors to accept the Third Debenture Stock in satisfaction of their debts. The clause relating to this Third Debenture Stock is to be read in connection with the recital which precedes, viz., "The outside creditors of the company, whose debts and claims as hereinbefore stated amounted to 46,877*l.* 11*s.*, will, it is believed, agree to take in satisfaction of their respective claims, equivalent amounts of debenture stock of the company, such debenture stock ranking after the 400,000*l.* debenture stock and also after the existing debentures of the company;" and in the belief that they will take it, authority is given to raise debenture stock, to be allotted to them and taken by them, at par, if they agree to take it in satisfaction of their debts. That, I think, disposes of the objection of the one creditor who comes here to oppose the scheme; and having regard to the circumstances that he is a creditor certainly in a very doubtful position, being a person who has got an account pending between himself and the company, on which the company say it will turn out that he is a debtor and not a creditor, and also that the account has been in abeyance since last August, I do not think he stands in a very favourable position for asking the court to interfere in his behalf. If I thought that the scheme deprived any creditor of any reasonable prospect of being paid, I should have had much more hesitation in confirming it; but I cannot help seeing that unless some scheme is resorted to there will be nothing for the company and nothing for the outside creditors. With regard to the debenture holders, it may be different, as there may be some little value in the price of the land which has been obtained for the purposes of the railway. Now, the 10th section of the Act of 1867 has said that a majority of three-fourths of the debenture holders shall bind the others, and that when three-fourths in value of the holders of such mortgages or bonds have assented in writing it shall be deemed to be assented to by the holders: that is to say, by all the holders, and therefore the debenture-holder comes here having in law assented to it by the vote of the majority. It is still open to the debenture-holder (and I have therefore heard him) to show that it was a fraudulent arrangement, and that the majority was really obtained by fraud. Supposing it was made out that in order to constitute a majority some of them received a bribe, that would be a very substantial objection. When the books are looked at the objection seems to resolve itself into this, that there has been a great waste of money, and an improvident expenditure in the conduct of the affairs of the company, but there is nothing, in my opinion, averred showing that the holders who have given their votes are not holders of mortgages or bonds, or that they do not amount to that which the Act of Parliament has required, to three-fourths in value of the existing mortgages or bonds. That being so, in the absence of any case of fraud—not fraud in the dealings of the company, but fraud in obtaining the assent of the requisite three-fourths—the debenture-holder is bound by the assent of that majority. I do not know whether it is likely to do the company any good or not, but all the outside creditors except this one who has got a particular reason for objecting to any scheme apparently, and all the debenture-holders except one having come to the conclusion that this is the best thing to be done for the company, I must arrive at the same conclusion, taking their testimony upon it, and therefore the order to confirm the scheme ought to be made. There will be no order as to costs, there not appearing to be any fund out of which they could be paid.

Order accordingly.

Solicitors: Ashurst, Morris, and Co., Parker, Rooke, and Co., Dale, and Stretton.

July 19 and 20.

HALDANE v. ECKFORD.

Domicil—Animus manendi—Length of residence previous to decease—Implied domicil—Costs of inquiry.

R. E., a Scotchman by birth, resided in Jersey for twenty-four years preceding his decease. He took occasional excursions to his native place in Scotland and elsewhere. Two of his children had died in France, and he caused their remains to be disinterred and buried in Jersey. It was proved that he contemplated being buried there himself. He had been in India in early life in the service of the late East India Company. He went to Scotland a short time previously to his death, but there was no proof of any intention to return and reside there:

Held, under these circumstances, and particularly as to the length of his residence in Jersey previously to his death, that he had obtained a domicil in Jersey.

Digitized by Google

Costs of the inquiry out of the general estate.

This cause came on for further consideration on a question raised in chambers as to the domicil of a testator under the following circumstances:—

Robert Eckford, formerly President of the Medical Board of Bombay, in the East Indies, but lately residing in the Island of Jersey, made and executed his last will and testament, bearing date the 28th March 1862 with certain codicils thereto annexed, and which were duly proved in Jersey and England by his executors therein named.

The testator died in Jersey in the year 1865. He was born in 1779 in Dumfriesshire, in Scotland, of Scotch parents. He studied medicine in Edinburgh, and obtained an appointment in the navy. He afterwards accepted an appointment in the East India Company's service, and went out to India. In 1815 he returned to England, and in Jan. 1817 was married in London to a Miss Halliwell. He and his wife shortly afterwards proceeded to India, but in consequence of the bad state of her health she returned to England after two or three years residence, and never returned to India. Dr. Eckford came back to England shortly afterwards, and he and his wife resided in Edinburgh. Two children were born to them there. He returned to India, and remained there till 1832 or 1833, when he quitted India, retiring on the usual pension. He had in the mean time become President of the Medical Board of Bombay.

Within a short period after his quitting India, he and his wife went to live in Jersey, where in the year 1834 a daughter was born. Some time after this they went to St. Servan, on the neighbouring coast of France, where a son was born, but died shortly after its death. The daughter also afterwards died, and both children were buried at St. Servan. In 1841 the husband and wife returned to Jersey. He took a house and resided there until 1865, when he died. He had had the bodies of his two children who had died in France exhumed, and re-interred in Jersey. He had purchased the ground for a grave for them, and he was ultimately buried there himself. He had been in the habit of making occasional excursions to France, Scotland, and other places during the last years of his life, and went to Scotland two or three years before his decease.

The following are extracts from the depositions of some of the witnesses:

Mrs. Elizabeth B. M. Threshie, the wife of a writer to the signet, residing in Jersey, deposed as follows:

I knew and was acquainted with the said Dr. Robert Eckford previous to my marriage, and for fourteen years previous to the decease of said Dr. Eckford. . . I verily believe that during the period over which my acquaintance with the said Dr. Eckford extended it was his intention to spend the remainder of his life in Jersey. I have sometimes heard him say, in reference to the climate of Jersey, "Is not this a fine climate? I never could live anywhere but in this place," or words to that effect. Upon one occasion, when reference was made to my children, he said to me, "Mine are in St. Saviour's burial ground, where I hope to be buried some day.'

Another witness, a Mr. Gautier, also residing in Jersey, said

I knew and was well acquainted with the late Dr. Eckford. In 1846 he became my tenant of a house, garden, and premises in St. Heliers. Subsequently, a written memorandum as to the said tenancy was signed by him and me. He furnished the said house himself, and he continued my tenant for eighteen years and upwards, until the time of his decease.

A Mrs. Mary Anne Robertson, also residing in Jersey, deposed:

Among other conversations with Dr. Eckford, I mentioned on one occasion that I had an idea of going to England, and in a jocular, off-hand kind of way suggested his doing so also, when in reply he adverted to the fact of one of his children having been buried in St. Saviour's Churchyard, in the Island of Jersey, and remarked that that for one thing would keep him in Jersey. In another conversation he told me that nothing but a war with France would induce him to leave Jersey.

A Dr. Vaudin, also of Jersey, deposed:

I knew and was well acquainted with the late Dr. Eckford for a period of at least twenty years preceding his death, and during all that time he resided continuously in Jersey, with the exception of occasional short travelling excursions chiefly in the summer time, never, as I believe, exceeding a few weeks on each occasion. During my acquaintance with the said testator he never consulted me as to his leaving the island, or expressed or intimated any desire or intention to go to reside at any other place. He frequently told me that the climate of Jersey suited him, and that it resembled that of the hilly ranges of India. On one occasion when I tasted a pipe of port wine which he had purchased, he remarked that it would turn out a good wine with keeping, and told me that it was his practice to lay down a quantity of wine from year to year for keeping, meaning, as I understood him, that he laid down such wine in Jersey for the consumption of himself and friends there.

A grandson of the testator, also residing in Jersey, deposed,

That the said testator has never since the year 1841 expressed or intimated to me, or in my hearing, any intention of ever leaving Jersey for another place of residence; and, on the contrary, he at one time was about buying a piece of ground in Rouge Bouillon, Jersey, for the purpose of building a house there for his own residence, and only gave up the idea of so doing from the impression that if he made such a purchase he could not, by the law of Jersey, dispose of the property by his will as he pleased. The said testator also informed me that about thirty years ago he was in actual treaty for the purchase of a house at St. Servans, and only abandoned such purchase because he understood that under the French law, as under the law of Jersey, he could not dispose of his real property by will as he pleased. The testator has frequently, in the course of conversation, told me that he never would leave Jersey, except in the event of a war with France. I have frequently heard him say that the climate of Jersey was the finest in the world, and that there was nothing like the Jersey climate to live in, and that he never wished to live in a better; that it had cured him of dysentery and liver complaint: and that, in his opinion, invalids coming to Jersey would prolong their lives; and he has often written to me when I have been absent from Jersey as if it were his home, using such expressions as "When are you coming home? When you get your holidays be sure to spend them at home with me," and I have heard him say that the Scotch climate was a miserable one, and that he could not endure it on account of the cold. The said testator purchased ground and built a vault in St. Saviour's churchyard, Jersey, and the bodies of his two children, who had been buried at St. Servan were disinterred and brought to Jersey, and deposited in such vault where they still remain, as well as the bodies of their nurse Susan de Maistre and her daughter, both of whom were also buried there. In the year 1851 the said Susan de Maistre, who had been my nurse, died; and the testator caused her to be buried in his said vault, and I and the said testator were present when the same was opened; and the said testator in my presence asked the mason if there was room to bury another person besides the nurse, and the mason replied, "that by adding two bricks to increase the height there would be room," when the testator added, "That will be for me." The said testator repeatedly told me that he would never leave Jersey; that almost all his old friends were dead, and that all those he had remaining were living in Jersey, and he did not wish to form new acquaintances, and he invariably spoke of Jersey as his home. I often expressed a wish to leave Jersey, and to travel to different places, but he would not give me permission to do so. Early in the month of Feb. 1865 the said testator laid down at his residence in Jersey about fifty or sixty dozens of wine. I helped him to lay it down, and at the time of his decease there were about 200 dozens of wine in his cellar in Adelaide-place, Rouge Bouillon, some of which was very old, but the testator drank very little wine himself, and at the rate of consumption in his household the stock of wine in his cellar when he died would have lasted for ten years at least.

The brother, Capt. Robert Eckford confirmed this testimony, and added many facts of a similar character to the above.

Mr. Edward Flower, a solicitor of St. Helier's, deposed:

That the said testator, Robert Eckford, employed me as his solicitor to prepare his will and codicil, and in relation to other business. In pursuance of his instructions I prepared his will and the two codicils thereto. Upon several occasions I had conversations with him as to his past history, and he informed me that he had resided in India for a period of forty years or thereabouts, and that upon leaving India he came to Jersey, where he had resided for a period of thirty years. During the last eight years of his life to which my knowledge of him extends, his home was entirely in Jersey and not elsewhere. At the time when I prepared the codicil to his will bearing date 15th Feb. last, I explained to him that the English law concerning perpetuities and the provisions of the Act of Parliament called Thelluson's Act, would, if he were domiciled in England at the time of his decease, prevent his making such dispositions of his property as are made by the said codicil, but that if his legal domicil at the time of his decease were in Jersey, such disposition of his property would, in my opinion be valid and effectual. I further explained to him by the expression "his domicil" I meant the place where he had made his home, with the intention of remaining in it as his home, or to that effect. And I say that the testator was a man of considerable shrewdness and intelligence, and appeared to understand fully what I said to him as before mentioned with regard to his will and codicils, and his domicil; and I have no doubt whatever that he executed the last-mentioned codicil on the 15th Feb. last in the conviction that he was then legally domiciled in Jersey. And I say that the said testator died in Jersey a few days after the time of his making the last-mentioned codicil.

Digitized by Google

Depositions were also made by advocates in Jersey that the testator's will and codicils were valid according to the laws in force in Jersey.

As to the Scotch domicil the following are some of the extracts from depositions made in furtherance of that view of the question.

A domestic servant to the testator, one Hannah Groizard, who lived in his service during three and a half years preceding his death, deposed:

That she had heard the testator say that he was a native of Scotland. That he had great love for Scotland, for Scotch people, and for everything Scotch. If anything occupied his mind he used to sing about it to himself. I have frequently seen him walking in the greenhouse, and heard him singing about Scotland. He died in Feb. 1865. It was his intention to have gone to Scotland if he had lived till the summer following. He often spoke about his intended journey, and appeared to be longing for the summer to come that he might go, and looked forward to the journey with great pleasure. He was always very pleased to hear from Scotland. For about a year and a half before his death he used regularly to receive a Scotch newspaper, and of this newspaper he took particular care. He has often said to me, pointing to the newspaper, "Mind, you must not touch this, it comes from Scotland." When he received his letters, if there was one from Scotland he would always open it first. About a year and a half before his death he went to Scotland on a visit. I heard him talking about going before he went, and after he came back I heard him say, "I have been to my dear native land." He had a number of Scotch books. I believe he lived in Jersey more for its cheapness than anything else. He was very close in money matters. He liked the climate of Jersey because it suited his health, but I never heard him say that he would never leave it, or anything to that effect.

A Mrs. Susan Hood, of St. Heliers, Jersey, inter alia deposed:

About ten years ago I became acquainted with Dr. Robert Eckford. He had great love for Scotland. He always sang Scotch songs. Scotland and his early associations there were the constant themes of conversations between him and my mother and ourselves. Anything relating to Scotland interested and excited him, and he was down to the time of his death thoroughly Scotch at heart, and always prided himself on being a Scotchman. I have frequently heard him say that he was the chief of his clan. I never heard him express any intention of adopting Jersey as his country. On the contrary, he disliked the laws of Jersey, and particulary those relating to real property, and I believe his dislike in this respect prevented him from acquiring real property in Jersey. He attended occasionally at the Scotch church in Jersey, and at his funeral there was the usual Scotch service performed in the house. There are a number of Scotch people staying in Jersey in the same way, who would be very much surprised to hear that they could be considered domiciled in Jersey.

A brother of the testator deposed that he (the testator) disliked the Jersey laws, particularly those relating to real property, and he has often said to me "Never buy a house in Jersey."

Amphlett, Q. C. and J. F. Villiers, for the trustees of the testator's will, submitted the questions to the court.

E. E. Kay, Q. C., Eddis, Q. C., De Gex, Q. C., and W. Dundas Gardiner contended for the domicil of the testator being in Jersey. They cited:

Story's Conflict of Laws, 947;
Phillimore on Domicil, p. 148;
Bruce v. Bruce, 2 Bos. & P. 229, note (a);
Somerville v. Somerville, 5 Ves. 571;
The Indian Chief, 3 C. Rob. Adm. Rep. 12;
Munroe v. Douglas, 5 Madd. 379;
Colville v. Lander, Phill. Dom. 22, 23.

W. W. Mackeson, Q. C. and Crossley, Willcock, Q. C. and Cates, for parties interested in making out a Scotch domicil, argued that the domicil was in Scotland. They contended that strict proof of the domicil being in Jersey was on the other side. That the domicil of origin was undoubtedly Scotch, and that that had not been rebutted by any of the evidence produced. Only two years before his death the testator contemplated purchasing an estate, and living in Scotland, and the very recital in his will "now residing in Jersey," raised the presumption that he did not intend permanently to reside there. Jersey was only a half-way house towards Scotland. They cited

Forbes v. Forbes, Kay 341;
Attorney-General v. Fitzgerald, 3 Drew. 610;
Hoskins v. Matthews, 8 De G. M. & G. 13;
Hodgson v. De Beauchene, 12 Moo. P. C. Cas. 285;
Whicher v. Hume, 7 H. of L. Cas. 124;
Moorhouse v. Lord, 10 H. of L. Cas. 272; 8 L. T. Rep. N. S. 212;
Aikman v. Aikman, 3 H. of L. Cas. 854;
President of United States v. Drummond, 33 Beav. 449; 10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 321;
Re Capdevielle, 2 Hurl. & C. 985;
Blucher v. Wahlstatt, 3 Hurl. & C. 374;
Udney v. Allnatt, in the H. of L. 3rd June 1869, MS.

No reply.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said the law of the case was very succinctly laid down by Lord Westbury in the observations attributed to him in Udney v. Allnatt, in which he said "that domicil was an unlimited intention of continuing to reside;" "there must be a residence freely chosen, not dictated by any external necessity." The law of domicil was also very aptly expressed in Turner's, L. J. observations in Hoskins v. Matthews: "Questions of change of domicil depend upon the animus and factum." The state of circumstances predicated by that able and painstaking judge may be predicated of the present case. Jersey was the place in which the testator had set up his family. He had two grandsons with him, over whom he exercised a control. He did at one time contemplate a possible change of residence from Jersey; but with a view of continuing to reside there, and that his grandson might reside with him, he gave him a larger pecuniary allowance if he would remain in Jersey. A very important fact was his removal of the remains of his two deceased children from St. Servan to Jersey. His residence in Jersey for so long a period of time was also another most important circumstance. When preparing his will he was reminded that it would be valid if his domicil were in Jersey. His conduct on that occasion was tantamount to saying, "I elect to be considered a domiciled Jerseyman." The present case was quite as strong as Forbes v. Forbes, and Udney v. Allnatt. I must, therefore, declare that the testator's domicil was in Jersey.

An application was then made that the Vice-Chancellor should now give some directions as to the general costs in the cause; but

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said that he must be presumed to be sitting in chambers on the hearing of the present summons, which was an adjournment from thence; but he might direct the costs of the present inquiry, and the evidence relating thereto, to be taxed, and paid out of the general fund of the estate.

Digitized by Google

Order accordingly.

Solicitors: Lambert, Hampton, and Co.; W. J. Myatt; Travers Smith, and De Gex; G. Cates.

Common Law Courts.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.

Reported by T. W. SAUNDERS and J. SHORTT, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

April 26 and May 11.

REG. v. THE WALLASEY LOCAL BOARD OF HEALTH.

Public Health Act—Compensation—Premises injuriously affected—11 & 12 Vict. c. 63, ss. 69, 144.

By sect. 69 of the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 63 (Public Health Act) the local board may by notice require the owner of premises fronting, &c., any future street (not being a highway) to sewer, level, &c., the same, and in default the board may themselves execute the works, and the expenses incurred are to be paid by the said owner. By sect. 144 full compensation is to be made out of the general district rate to all persons sustaining any damage by reason of the exercise of any of the powers of the Act.

E. T., an owner of premises, having had a notice served upon him under the above section, refused to comply therewith, whereupon the board themselves did the work, the result of which as alleged by the said E. T. was to obstruct the entrance to his house, and to render the access to his doorway dangerous and inconvenient, and for this he claimed compensation under the above 144*th section:*

Held, that he was entitled to such compensation.

On a former day a rule had been obtained on the part of one Evan Thomas calling upon the Wallasey Local Board of Health to show cause why a mandamus should not issue commanding the said local board to make compensation to the said Evan Thomas out of the general district rate levied under the Public Health Act (11 & 12 Vict. c. 63), for damage sustained by him by the exercise of the powers vested in the said board.

By the 69th section of 11 & 12 Vict. c. 63, it is enacted that

In case any present or future street, or any part therof (not being a highway), be not sewered, levelled, paved, flagged, and channelled to the satisfaction of the Local Board of Health, such board may, by notice in writing to the respective owners or occupiers of the premises adjoining or abutting upon such parts thereof as may require to be sewered, levelled, &c., require them to sewer, level, &c., within a time to be specified in such notice; and if such notice be not complied with, the said local board may, if they shall think fit, execute the works mentioned or referred to therein, and the expenses incurred by them in so doing shall be paid by the owners in default, according to the frontage of their respective premises, and in such proportion as shall be settled by the surveyor, or, in case of dispute, as shall be settled by arbitration (having regard to all the circumstances of the case) in the manner provided by this Act, and such expenses may be recovered from the last-mentioned owners in a summary manner, or the same may be declared by order of the said local board to be private improvement expenses, and be recoverable as such in the manner hereinafter provided.

By sect. 144 it is enacted

That full compensation shall be made out of the general or special district rates to be levied under this Act to all persons sustaining any damage by reason of the exercise of any of the powers of this Act, and in case of dispute as to amount, the same shall be settled by arbitration in the manner provided by this Act; or if the compensation claimed do not exceed the sum of twenty pounds, the same may be ascertained by, and recovered before, justices in a summary way.

From the facts it appeared that Mr. Evan Thomas was the owner of a house which abutted upon a road or district of the Local Board of Health for Wallasey, which road, however, was not a highway, and that in Dec. 1865, he was served with a notice which required him, within a time specified, to sewer, level, pave, flag, and channel a certain part of the said street. As Mr. Thomas did not comply with such notice, the board proceeded to execute the works themselves, and in so doing they raised the level of the road opposite Mr. Thomas's house, so as to block up a portion of the doorway, and so obstruct the access to the house from the street.

Milward, Q. C. and R. G. Williams showed cause.

Bruce in support of the rule.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 11.—HANNEN, J.—In this case a rule was obtained for a mandamus to the Wallasey Local Board of Health, to cause compensation to be make to Evan Thomas for damage by him sustained by the exercise by the local board of the powers of the Public Health Acts. The local board, acting under the 69th section of the Public Health Act 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 63), required the owners (the said Evan Thomas and others) of premises in a certain street in New Brighton, to sewer, level, pave, and channel the same; and the said Evan Thomas having made default in complying with the notice, the board executed the required works, and claims as the contribution payable by the said Evan Thomas in respect of the said works the sum of 71*l.* 8*s.* It is alleged by Evan Thomas that the effect of the works as executed is to obstruct the entrance to his house and to render the access to his doorway inconvenient; and in respect of this injury he claims compensation under sect. 144, which enacts that full compensation shall be made to all persons sustaining any damage by reason of the exercise of the powers of the Act. It was contended, on behalf of the local board, that inasmuch as the owners of the houses in the street were bound to do the works themselves or, if done by the board, to pay for them, they could not be entitled to compensation for injury occasioned by the works. We are of opinion, however, that this argument is not well founded. There is no necessary connexion between the cost of the works and the damage which they may occasion. The raising of the level of a street may be very advantageous to the majority of the houses in it, but be very injurious to one. Although, therefore, the owner of that house may be bound under sect. 69 to pay his proportion of the costs (having regard to the frontage of the house) of altering the level, he may still be entitled to compensation out of the general district rates for the special damage which he has sustained in order that his neighbours and the district generally should be benefited. We are, therefore, of opinion that Evan Thomas is entitled to have it ascertained whether or not he has sustained damage by the execution of the works in question, and to receive compensation for such damage, if any. The rule will, therefore, be made absolute for a mandamus.

Rule absolute.

Attorneys for the claimant, W. and A. Clare.

Attorneys for the defendants, Simpson and North, Liverpool.

Digitized by Google

In Parliament.

Reported by FREDERICK CLIFFORD, and PEMBROKE S. STEPHENS, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

THE COURT OF REFEREES ON PRIVATE BILLS.

Monday, April 12.

(Before Mr. DODSON, M.P., Chairman; Mr. WYNN, M.P., and Mr. RICKARDS, Referees.)

ST. HELEN'S BOROUGH IMPROVEMENT BILL.

Objections to the locus standi: (1) of Messrs. ROBERTSON GLADSTONE, and others; (2) of Sir R. T. GERARD, Bart.; (3) of Rev. JAMES ABRAHAM; (4) of the Marquis of SALISBURY; (5) of THOMAS DICCONSON, Esq.

Improvement Bill — Rating powers — Exemptions— Lands and minerals—Representation—Landowners affected by taxation.

A Bill was promoted by the corporation of St. H., acting under a charter of incorporation newly granted, for the extinction of local bodies with taxing powers previously existing within the borough, and for conferring additional powers on the corporation. Five petitions were presented, four by landowners, and one by owners, lessees, and occupiers of land, mines, and collieries within the borough limits, complaining that their property would be injured by the transfer and the granting of the proposed powers; and more especially that they would be deprived of the protection from taxation afforded to mineral and agricultural property in St. H. by a clause in an Improvement Act of 1855, proposed to be repealed. None of the existing public bodies petitioned against the Bill, and none of the petitioner's lands were scheduled for compulsory taking:

Held, that the owners whose mineral and agricultural property was or might be affected by the Bill, had each a locus standi; but that only such of the owners, lessees, &c., "as were owners of property within the area affected by the Bill" were entitled to be heard.

The Bill had for its object "to dissolve the local boards of the districts of Sutton and Parr in the borough of St. Helen's in the county of Lancaster, and to repeal the St. Helen's Improvement Act 1855; to constitute the corporation of the said borough the local authority therein for the improving and governing of the said borough; and to enable the said corporation to extend their waterworks and to purchase the undertakings of the St. Helen's Waterworks Company and the St. Helen's Gas Company, and for other purposes."

From the statements in the petitions and the arguments, it appeared that the town of St. Helen's in Lancashire, an active manufacturing centre, is built upon the points of junction of four districts or townships, viz., Sutton, Parr, Eccleston, and Windle. The central area, or town of St. Helen's, including portions of each of these townships, was governed by improvement commissioners under an Act of 1855. The townships of Sutton and Parr each adopted the Local Government Act some years ago, and were consequently under the jurisdiction of local boards. Eccleston and Windle remained purely agricultural districts under the highway system.

In the year 1866 some of the inhabitants of St. Helen's were desirous of obtaining a charter of incorporation for the town, and for extending the boundaries, and on the 5th March 1868 a charter was accordingly obtained, whereby the inhabitants of St. Helen's proper, those of the districts of Sutton and Parr, and of parts of the townships of Windle and Eccleston contiguous to the town, were incorporated by the name of the Mayor, Aldermen, and Burgesses of the Town of St. Helen's, and had extended to them the powers and provisions of the Municipal Corporation Acts. This, however, was but the creation of a new and independent jurisdiction, leaving untouched the jurisdictions already existing. The present Bill was brought in by the corporation for the purpose of getting rid of this conflict of authority, by consolidating all the existing powers in the hands of the corporation, and arming them with such new and further powers as the promoters considered desirable.

The petitioners were all owners of property within the original limits of the improvement commission, or within the extended municipal boundary, and were apprehensive of injury from the provisions of the Bill. The nature of their representations and complaints will appear from the arguments addressed to the court, which it had been arranged in the case of these five petitions should be taken and dealt with as a class.

The objections to the locus standi of the different petitioners were identical in each case, and were as follow:

1. That no land of the petitioner will be taken under the powers of the Bill, nor is any property right, or interest of the petitioner injuriously affected by the provisions of it.

2. That the petitioner's only objections to the Bill are founded on his character of a ratepayer, and he is not, according to the practice of Parliament, entitled to be heard apart from other ratepayers, or as representing them.

3. That the petitioner, in his character of a ratepayer, is represented by the corporation, who are the promoters of the Bill.

4. The petition does not show any ground of objection which, according to the practice of Parliament, entitles the petitioner to be heard against the Bill.

Round (for Messrs. Robertson Gladstone, and others.—My clients are owners and occupiers of property in the borough of St. Helens, and in the townships of Sutton and Parr. They are not merely ratepayers, as stated in the objections, but landowners as well. The objections to our locus rest upon the fallacy that the corporation represent us. They represent their own ratepayers; but the doctrine of representation by a corporation does not hold good in cases where third parties are introduced; and if this be so with regard to the inhabitants of St. Helen's itself, it must be more especially the case with regard to owners and occupiers in the townships of Sutton and Parr. Under the Act of 1855, which it is now proposed to repeal, coal mines in St. Helen's are exempted from rating, and arable and pasture lands are only liable to be rated at one-fourth of their net value. But under the 352nd clause of the Bill, coal owners in St. Helen's who are now exempt will be rated like owners of other property. In the districts of Sutton and Parr the special exemption of coal mines does not exist, and, therefore, they are not affected to the same extent by the change; but no one can doubt that in these, which are to a great extent agricultural districts, the rates at present leviable are much smaller than those which will be levied by the corporation. This is a transfer of our allegiance, without our consent, and behind our backs.

Mr. RICKARDS.—Do the local boards of Sutton and Parr petition?

Pembroke Stephens (for the promoters).—They do not.

Round.—And that is an additional reason why the petitioners, who are owners and occupiers, both in the inner and the outer districts, ought to be heard before they are transferred to the sole control of the new municipal body. Under clause 109, taken in connection with the interpretation clause, the corporation may declare a lane, or a bridge, or two or three straggling houses, "a street;" and, having declared it to be a street, they may under the 97th clause call upon the petitioners, as owners, to incur very large expenses in paving, &c.; and under the 98th clause, if the petitioners do not comply, the corporation may do these works themselves and charge the petitioners for "new street expenses." Such extensive powers will press hardly upon the petitioners. With respect to bridges, the 125th clause provides that "the plans and sections of all bridges which shall be built or rebuilt after the passing of this Act (other than county bridges) shall, before each such bridge be commenced, be laid before and be subject to the approval of the corporation." A private bridge between two persons' estates would be subject to this objectionable provision. By the 192nd and 194th clauses no trade of a noxious character is to be carried on without the consent of the corporation. The petitioners ask to be allowed to show that St. Helen's owes very much of its importance to the fact of certain trades being carried on there, and that there ought not to be a wider power vested in the corporation than is absolutely necessary to prevent nuisances arising from noxious trades. Under the Bill it would be in the power of members of the corporation engaged in trade to prevent trades being set up in competition with their own. And the petitioners claim the right of going before the committee to see that those powers, and the other powers of which they complain, are fenced in with sufficient restrictions to prevent their being used harshly. We are owners transferred from a jurisdiction with which we are content to a new jurisdiction which we fear. If we are not heard, in future corporations may promote Bills extending their territory indefinitely, and nobody will be heard in opposition, except persons whose lands are actually taken. This is a Bill of 480 sections. Is no one to see that proper safeguards are introduced? If so, the corporation are absolute master of the position; and owners will have their property saddled with taxes, remaining powerless all the while. Parliament will never shut out from the discussion persons plainly interested as we are.

Digitized by Google

Counsel was proceeding to comment upon the effect of a MS. addition to one of the clauses, when

Mr. DODSON said: The practice of the court is to take the Bill as deposited.

Pembroke Stephens (for the promoters).—Unless the petitioners are prepared to point out the names of any coal owners in St. Helen's who are exempt from taxation at present, and who will be subject to taxation under the provisions of this Bill, we shall contend that there are not any such. And I now call upon them to do so.

Round subsequently said: I have ascertained that two of the persons joining in the petition of Messrs. Robertson Gladstone, and others—i. e., Messrs. Brown and Robinson, are lessees and occupiers of coal mines and working coal mines. The coal they work is partly situated in the township of Windle and partly in the townships of Sutton and Parr, some of it lying within the limits of the jurisdiction of St. Helen's. According to law, those persons would be rateable, not only at the place in which the coal is raised, but at the place where the coal is worked. Therefore, inasmuch as those petitioners are lessees of coal which is worked, though not raised, within the limits of St. Helen's, they would be rateable by law for that coal, were it not for the Act of 1855, which at present exempts them. The Bill proposes to do away with this exemption.

Pembroke Stephens.—The question now raised is a legal question. But the petitioners have still failed to distinguish those whose interests lie, as a matter of fact, within St. Helen's proper, from those which are outside.

Round.—The Referees doubtless can give the petitioners a locus standi in such terms that when they come before the committee only such of them will be heard as come within the scope of the Bill.

Mundell, Q.C. (for Sir R. Gerard).—My client is the owner of a large quantity of agricultural land; namely, forty-four acres, in the district at present under the St. Helen's Improvement Act, in which district also he has coal works, not yet leased, and 110 acres of land in the district of Windle, within the municipal boundary, but not at present subject to any taxation for local purposes, except highway rate and poor rate, no action under the Health of Towns Act having been taken within that district There is no ground for the objection that Sir R. Gerard is a ratepayer represented by an elected body, that is to say, by the corporation, for Sir R. Gerard is not a ratepayer, and has no share in the election of the corporation, and, consequently, is in no way represented by them. As an owner of agricultural land and of coal mines within the district proposed to be included in the area of rating, he claims to be heard against a Bill the provisions of which will injuriously affect his property. At present, in St. Helen's proper, under the 159th section of the Improvement Act 1855, neither coal mines nor agricultural land have to pay anything, whereas in future they will both be taxed. It is idle for the promoters to object that Sir R. Gerard will not be rated, he being the owner and not the occupier; for the value of his property as owner will be diminished by the amount of the rate. As in the case of land under tithes and land tithe free, the difference in value is the amount of the tithe; so here, the taxation imposed by the Bill will be the difference that will be made in the value of our collieries. The estimated value of Sir R. Gerard's coal mines unworked outside the boundary is 80,000*l.* How can it be said that Sir R. Gerard either is or will be represented? The representation, if any, accorded under the Bill is the representation of somebody who may hereafter be our tenant for the mines, not of Sir R. Gerard as owner. All that Sir R. Gerard can be said to have any representation with regard to, is in respect of the municipal borough rate. Sir R. Gerard stands, in one respect, in a different position from the other petitioners, as he alleges in his petition that when the corporation of St. Helen's were about to seek for a charter of incorporation "negotiations took place between the promoters of the charter of incorporation and your petitioner's agent, and your petitioner being anxious to further the wishes of the town of St. Helen's to the utmost of his power, ultimately acquiesced in the incorporation scheme, upon the express understanding, which was reduced into writing, that all property of which your petitioner is in possession, as well in the township of Windle as of Parr, and used only as agricultural land, should not be charged with rates beyond the average of that imposed upon such property within the five preceding years." So that, in fact, an agreement has been come to upon which the petitioner would have a right to be heard. But he does not put it upon that narrow ground, for the agreement referred to does not touch upon or include the main question of the mines. The mineral property was not included in that agreement, Sir R. Gerard never supposing that any municipal body would seek to tax mines to their full extent. And I claim now as a right to protect 80,000*l.* worth of property from harsh and needless taxation. He consented to come within the taxable area for municipal purposes under the 5 & 6 Will. 4, when the borough was newly constituted, the money leviable under that Act being for strictly municipal purposes. Under this Bill the promoters have not only retained the borough rate for municipal purposes, but for a great many other purposes besides. They are about to impose liabilities on the new district different from those contemplated either by the Municipal Acts or by the Local Government Acts at present in force in portions of the district. Counsel referred in detail to various clauses of the Bill as bearing out this assertion, and, in anticipation of arguments which might be urged by the promoters, relied upon the case of the Maryport Improvement Harbour and Dock Bill 1866—Petition of Ratepayers, Shipowners, and Coalowners (Smethurst 128.) Sir R. Gerard does not petition as a ratepayer, and hence the objection on that score does not apply. But he is a coalowner, and coalowners were heard in the Maryport case. The only other objection is that he is represented. By whom? Not by the improvemement commissioners, whose Act is to be repealed; for under that Act he is not taxable, and therefore cannot be represented by them. Not by the corporation, to whom the powers of the improvement commissioners will be transferred, for the same reason; although, as to the taxation which may properly be levied under the 5 & 6 Will. 4, he may be said to be represented by the corporation. For the sake of argument, I admit that if they were only going by the Bill to regulate the borough fund, it would not be competent for Sir R. Gerard to object. But they are going to do something for which the assent of Parliament is necessary, and therefore Sir R. Gerard claims the right to be heard against the proposals of a body which does not represent him, or only represents him in a special manner to increase their area of taxation.

April 14.—Webster, Q. C. (for Rev. James Abraham).—Mr. Abraham is the owner of valuable property, consisting to some extent of coal mines and house property, but mostly of agricultural land, occupied by tenants for agricultural purposes. [Refers to sect. 159 of the Improvement Act 1865, containing the exemption; and to the charter of incorporation.] Under this Bill the status of the petitioner will be changed. As matters stood, he and other landowners were subject to taxation for municipal purposes, but otherwise they were protected. The promoters are now seeking to bring them under a local Act, with new powers of taxation, and jurisdiction of a more extended character than at present exists. Notwithstanding this, as the petition alleges, no notice of the Bill was ever given to the petitioner, a portion of whose coal mines are situated under the townships of Parr and Windle, and to whom also a considerable portion of the surface lands of those townships belongs. The Bill is of a very sweeping character. It contains provisions for discontinuing the Local Government Acts within the several parts of the borough in which they are now in force, powers for the supply of water and gas, for paving and making roads, streets, and sewers, for providing a police force, and powers also with respect to the regulation of buildings, with regard to nuisances, slaughter-houses, and other matters, all or any of which may be put in force hereafter, in the discretion of the corporation, although such powers may be inapplicable or actually injurious to property situated and circumstanced like that of the petitioner. For these and other purposes the Bill authorises the corporation to levy a highway rate and a borough rate in respect of the whole of the property comprised within the limits of the borough. The amount of these rates is practically unlimited, and may become a heavy charge upon the petitioner's property, whilst, from its nature, he will receive little or no benefit from the outlay in respect of which these rates are to be levied. In his petition, he further objects to the powers sought to charge upon rates levied on the borough as a whole the payment of debts contracted for local purposes by the improvement commissions, the corporation, and the local boards; and he also contends that he or his tenants ought not to be taxed for promoting a private Bill of great length, when the general Acts are sufficient for the wants of the town. Dealing with the points raised in the objections, I contend that the Rev. Mr. Abraham is not a ratepayer in the sense in which he would be a ratepayer under the Bill, being at present merely a ratepayer under the charter of incorporation for municipal purposes. Wherever a person possesses an incorporeal right, which incorporeal right is proposed to be affected by special legislation, that person has a locus standi to show in what respect the special legislation will interfere with that right.

Cripps, Q. C. (for the Marquis of Salisbury).—In his petition the marquis alleges himself to be "an owner, not only of property within the town of St. Helen's, but also of considerable agricultural land and of mineral property within the limits of the said Bill" (i. e., Sutton) "and subject to taxation under its provisions." We deny the necessity of the proposed legislation, and allege that certain specific provisions will be unjust to us and to other owners of property proposed to be taxed for lighting, sewering, and general purposes, being only liable now to highway rate and poor rate. This property will accordingly be rendered less valuable by the Bill. The 358th clause is especially objectionable, and, moreover, is without precedent, for it gives the Corporation power to make a retrospective rate. [Counsel relied strongly upon various clauses, which he said imposed restrictions upon the petitioner's property from which it was now free, and on the following passage of the petition:] "The powers given by the Bill to the Corporation as to streets, and the cost which may be incurred by them in respect thereof, and which they can charge upon the owners of property adjoining the highway, would or might impose upon your petitioner liabilities to which he ought not to be exposed; and the provisions in the Bill as to nuisances, and particularly the 192nd clause, which prohibits the establishment hereafter of any noxious or offensive business, trade, or manufacture, in any building or place without the consent of the corporation, might, in its operation, perpetuate a monopoly in favour of existing manufactories, and is totally inapplicable to St. Helen's, whose trade and prosperity mainly depend upon the carrying on of works, which, in their nature, must be more or less noxious and offensive." Upon these two general principles we are distinctly entitled to a hearing—first, that we are the owners of property proposed to be affected by private legislation; and, secondly, that new and special legislation affecting trades and manufactures is contemplated, by which we are, or may be, injuriously affected.

Riddle (for Mr. Thomas Dicconson).—We rely on several of the arguments already urged. Mr. Dicconson is an owner within the limits of the Improvement Act of 1855, and also of lands in Sutton and Eccleston, his property consisting of agricultural and mining property, that on lease representing 103,000*l.* in value, and that out of lease representing a value

Digitized by Google

heard b trol of taken i the cor or thre declar claus
very l
98th c corpor charg
Such petiti claus
bridg passi shall, laid i corp estat visio
a no cons be a
of it carr wid lute nox pow tra wit of po pla pr
tr
co ar
B n
w
4
g al
h
p sl re ef

ta

Digitized by Google

purpose it surely has never been held that a single owner of property has a right to set himself up in opposition and be heard. If the owners of property or inhabitants want to be heard, let them hold a public meeting, and declare the Bill injurious to the district, and sign a petition in sufficient numbers to show that they represent the district.

Mr. RICKARDS.—The petitioners do claim a locus standi as owners, on the ground that their property, becoming liable to increased taxation, will be rendered less valuable; and that their only remedy is to go before a committee?

Stephens.—But not individually. Under the existing system the local boards in Sutton and Parr are partly elected by owners of property; they can accordingly be heard through those local boards.

Mr. RICKARDS.—If you touch the land of a landowner at all, he has a right to be heard. But here is a case of a landowner whose property will be permanently diminished in value by liability to certain burdens. Ought not he to be heard, on the same principle on which an owner whose land is taken is heard?

Stephens.—He must claim to be heard on one of two grounds: either that his property is injuriously affected—in which case he has no locus standi—or he must claim in common with other ratepayers who would be equally injured.

Mr. RICKARDS.—This is not an injurious affecting within the meaning of the Lands Clauses Act, but an injurious affecting in this sense, that the property will become less valuable than before; how do you distinguish this case, and the case of a man whose property is taken compulsorily?

Stephens.—In the one case the injury done is done to the man's private property; while, in the other case, the injury, if any, is one which the man can only suffer in common with the rest of the community. He can only suffer by the levying of rates.

Mr. RICKARDS.—Put the case of there being only one landowner, in that position, whose property would be liable to the exceptional rate?

Stephens.—If the landowner has an exceptional injury to show, he will of course set that forth in his petition; but the only injury which these petitioners allege is one to which they will become liable by the payment of rates, which they will only have to pay in common with their neighbours. If one landowner be admitted to petition separately on this ground, this court must be prepared to let in every landowner in the district. In towns of this kind somebody must have the controlling power; and the only question is in whose hands it ought to be deposited. The rural districts are sure to make their influence felt, seeing that Sutton and Parr elect one half the corporation. This question has been argued as if the doctrine of representation were altogether new. But The Staffordshire Potteries Water Bill 1868, Petition of the Corporation of Longton, 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 539 affirms the principle that municipal corporations and local boards of health are properly the guardians and representatives of individual interests affected. Here the local boards do not in any way petition or oppose the Bill. As to the rating powers being retrospective, the rates referred to are only rates to pay off charges incurred previous to the passing of the Act. Messrs. Gladstone and others, although challenged, have failed to show that they have any property within St. Helen's to which the exemption would apply. And if Mr. Bower and Mr. Robinson worked coal under St. Helen's, as alleged, their names would appear in the highway rate book, which is not the case. Sir R. T. Gerard stands in a different position, and we are willing to concede a locus standi to him, for the purpose of seeing that the agreement is preserved by the Bill.

Mundell, Q.C.—The corporation have refused to carry out that agreement; and a limited locus will not suit my purpose.

Stephens.—Many of the clauses complained of are taken in substance from existing public Acts. If we succeed to the revenues of public bodies, we must also take over their debts. We do not schedule Mr. Dicconson's lands, and therefore there is nothing in his complaint as to watercourses; if he wants water for his mines or agricultural lands he will be enabled to obtain it from us. The petitioners here, instead of indicating any special grievance, and suggesting a remedy, one and all seek to be heard with the same object, that of altering the Bill for their own advantage. It is to prevent this that the court refuses to hear a single trader, as distinct from a class, seeing that his object is to make terms for himself. Yet, a particular trade may be injured or crushed by legislation, and an exemption may sometimes be beneficial. But a landowner who, as a ratepayer, makes terms for himself, not only fails to contribute his proper share of taxation, but the amount which he fails to contribute has to be made good by his neighbours. And if one landowner is to make terms for himself, on the same principle you should admit 500. It will then become a race between those quick enough, or rich enough, to be heard before committees. This is a principle novel, dangerous, and unsupported either by the Standing Orders or by the previous decisions of this court.

The Referees remained for some time in consultation. When the parties were called in,

Mr. DODSON said: The locus standi of Sir R. T. Gerard, of the Rev. J. Abraham, of the Marquis of Salisbury, and of Thomas Dicconson is allowed. The locus standi is allowed of such only of the subscribers to the petition of Robertson Gladstone and others as are owners of property within the area affected by the Bill.

Agents for Sir R. Gerard; and for the Marquis of Salisbury, Dyson and Co.

Agents for the Rev. J. Abraham, Wyatt and Hoskins.

Agents for Robertson Gladstone and Co., Field and Co.

Agents for Thomas Dicconson, Loch and Maclaurin.

Agent for the Bill, S. H. Lewin.

Wednesday, April 14.

(Before Mr. WYNN, M.P., Chairman, Mr. ST. AUBYN, M.P., and Mr. RICKARDS.)

ST. HELEN'S BOROUGH IMPROVEMENT BILL.

Objections to the locus standi of DANIEL WILLIS.

Waterworks—Corporation—Landowner — Interference with soil beneath road—Underground water.

An Improvement Bill promoted by the Corporation of St. H., among other objects to sanction the extension of their waterworks, was petitioned against by a landowner apprehensive of injury from the abstraction of underground water. It appeared that the pipes of the corporation would be laid along a road, the soil of which belonged to the petitioner, though the surface had been dedicated to the public:

Held (without completing the discussion of the water question), that the petitioner had a locus standi on the ground of interference with the soil.

Digitized by Google

The Bill had for its object to constitute the corporation of the newly-created borough of St. Helen's the local authority for that borough, and among other things, "to enable the corporation to extend their waterworks, and to purchase the undertakings of the St. Helen's Waterworks Company.

The petition set forth that it was intended by the Bill to empower the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses to make and maintain certain waterworks described in the Bill, comprising a well or shaft, pumping engines, and other buildings and works in the township of Whiston, in the parish of Prescot, in the county of Lancaster, in a field belonging to the trustees of Thomas Atherton, deceased, and in the occupation of Thomas Asherton, and to make and maintain other wells or shafts, pumping engines, buildings and works.

The Bill also gave power to the corporation for the purpose of these works, and of any waterworks vested in them, absolutely, or by way of lease, to collect, pump up, take, use, and appropriate all such springs, streams, and waters, which might be found in, upon, or under the lands described in the book of reference, and to carry the same by pipes under a road, a considerable portion of which passed through the petitioner's estate, and to the soil of which he was entitled, subject to the public right of way over it.

The petitioner was owner as tenant for life in possession of a valuable estate in the parishes of Prescott and Huyton, with a park and mansion house called Halsned Hall, let for 600*l.* a year; and also of another residence in the same parish, called Sandfield, which he occupied; and the situations of the wells or shafts proposed to be sunk were at a short distance from both the residences and from the village of Whiston, which contained a great number of cottages, many belonging to the petitioner, and wholly or partly supplied with water by the existing wells or springs. A large sum had been expended by the petitioner in bringing a supply of water to these two residences from a spring about half a mile distant; and the petition alleged that if the proposed shafts were allowed to be constructed, and the springs and waters appropriated under the powers of the bill, the water supply of the petitioner's two residences would be in danger of being seriously diminished, and the inhabitants of the village of Whiston, principally labourers in coal mines or agricultural labourers, would be deprived of their water supply. The corporation, therefore, it was contended, should be bound to furnish the petitioner and his tenants with a supply of water equal in quantity and quality to that which they now possessed.

The locus standi of the petitioners was objected to on the following grounds:

1. The Bill does not contain any provision for taking any lands, streams, or springs of water, the property of the petitioner, and no property, right, or interest of the petitioner's is injuriously affected by the provisions of the Bill.

2. One of the objects of the Bill is the sinking of a well on lands belonging to the petitioner, and to raise a supply of water from a considerable depth below the surface, to which water the petitioner has no right or claim.

3. The petition does not show any ground of objection which, according to the practice of Parliament, entitles the petitioner to be heard agains the Bill.

Pember, for the petitioner.—A slight verbal addition to the petition will render it more specific.

Mr. RICKARDS.—The court cannot alter the terms of a petition. We take the petition and the Bill as deposited.

Pember, for the petitioner.—The petitioner is, or may be, seriously affected by the proposals of the Bill. I admit that, according to the strict reading of Acton v. Blundell, we cannot probably claim any property in underground water; but that has always been considered a hard decision, its propriety has been questioned, and more than one eminent authority has from time to time considered and referred to it. The position, however, of the promoters differs from that of an adjoining landowner who sinks wells on his own land; for they came for powers to sink shafts, having at present no right whatever to sink them, not being owners of adjoining lands. If the promoters seek to shut out the petitioner on the technical legal ground, I shall meet that technicality by another, and shall insist that, technically, Mr. Willis has a locus standi as legal owner of the soil of the highway under which the pipes are proposed to be laid; being proprietor of the land on each side of the highway, having dedicated the highway itself to the use of the public. In the Aberdeen Water Bill (before the Court of Referees was established), Sir William Burnett was allowed a locus standi, because the pipes were proposed to be taken through his property. But, beside that technical ground, the petitioner possesses a substantial claim to be heard in the probable loss of water which he will experience. Owners of springs and wells, or owners of adjoining property, are entitled to be heard where they apprehend abstraction of underground water.

Cambridge University and Town Waterworks Bill 1866, Petition of the Master, Fellows, &c., of Sidney Sussex College, 14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 85;
South Staffordshire Waterworks Bill 1866, ex parte Feoffees, &c., of Lichfield, 14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 237.

All we seek is proper protection in the event of injury arising to us from the operation of the Bill, and to obtain that, a locus standi is indispensable.

Pembroke Stephens (for the promoters).—Apprehension of injury from the abstraction of underground water cannot possibly give a locus standi. The legal question has been decided, not merely by the case of Acton v. Blundell, but by the later case of Chasemore v. Richards. According, moreover, to the decision of this court in the Southport Water Bill 1867, Petition of the Ormskirk Local Board, the mere abstraction of underground water is not in itself such an injury as will entitle petitioners to a hearing. Then as to the technical question. It has never been the practice of the examiner of standing orders to regard the owner of lands adjoining a highway as entitled to notice in respect of interference with that highway. Notice is sent to the road trustees. It cannot therefore be said that the adjoining owner has any rights of ownership in the roads, after they have once been dedicated to the public.

The CHAIRMAN.—Put the case of a mine under the road?

Pember.—And that I am informed is actually the case here; there are minerals under the road, and which might be worked; and our petition stated that the petitioner is entitled to the soil under the road through which the pipes of the promoters are to be carried.

The CHAIRMAN.—We need not trouble counsel to argue the legal question further, as we are of opinion that Mr. Willis has a locus standi on the ground of interference with the soil of his property underlying the roadway.

Locus standi allowed.

Agents for the petitioners, Dorrington and Co.

Agent for the bill, S H. Lewin.

Equity Courts.

COURT OF APPEAL IN CHANCERY.

Reported by THOMAS BROOKSBANK and E. STEWART ROCHE, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

June 12 and 22.

(Before the LORDS JUSTICES.)

Re THE LONDON MARINE INSURANCE ASSOCIATION; J. W. SMITH'S CASE.

Mutual Marine Insurance Association—Winding-up—Contributory—Unstamped policy—Statute 35 Geo. 3, c. 63.

A contract for mutual insurance of ships is within the Stamp Act (35 Geo. 3, c. 63).

Accordingly, a member of a mutual marine insurance association, who had never received any stamped policy of insurance upon his own ship, was held not liable as a contributory of the association upon its being wound-up.

This was an appeal by the official liquidator of the above company from an order made by James, V. C., removing the name of Mr. John Watson Smith from the list of contributories of the company.

The London Marine Insurance Association was a mutual society for the insurance of the ships belonging to the members thereof. Each member was bound to contribute to make good the losses sustained by other members during the period of his membership, in proportion to the amount for which his own ship or ships was or were insured by the other members. The usual practice was for each member on entering the association to sign a power of attorney appointing the secretary of the association his attorney for the purpose of signing and underwriting policies of insurance, to recover contributions from the members, and to draw for and to pay all losses and averages, contributions, and expenses. Each member of the association was entitled upon application to receive a stamped policy for the amount insured by himself upon payment of entrance fees and stamp duty, but it appeared that in practice stamped policies had been very seldom issued. The secretary of the association was Mr. Joseph Henzell.

Every member on entering the association signed an application in writing, in which he stated the amount for which he desired to insure his own ship or ships.

Mr. John Watson Smith, on the 6th Sept. 1864, applied for an insurance to the amount of 300*l.* upon a ship belonging to him called the Holywood. His application (so far as material) was as follows:

To Mr. Joseph Henzell, and to the secretary or manager for the time being of the London Marine Insurance Association.

I, the undersigned, John W. Smith, of North Shields, do hereby authorise and empower you to insure in the London Marine Insurance Association the sum of 300*l.* on the ship Holywood, of the port of Shields. I hereby acknowledge myself to be a member of the said association, under and subject to the rules, regulations, and warranties thereof, and I authorise you, or any three members of the committee for the time being for me, or in my name, as such members to sign and underwrite all policies of assurance upon all ships that may from time to time be approved of by the committee of the said association in such sums respectively as they may think proper. And I undertake to accept and pay all drafts for losses and contributions that shall be drawn, made, or ordered to be paid by the said committee, and I also undertake to abide by the rules, regulations, and warranties of the said association in every respect. Risk to commence the 6th Sept. 1864.

By a letter from Mr. Henzell, dated the 7th Sept. 1864, this offer by Mr. Smith was accepted on behalf of the association. Mr. Smith paid the sum of 2*l.* 0*s.* 6*d.* for entrance fees, and on the 8th Sept. 1864 he wrote to Mr. Henzell asking that a proper policy of insurance might be sent to him. No stamped policy was ever sent to him. The ship Holywood suffered some damage at sea, and on the 1st Feb. 1865 Smith made a claim upon the association in respect of the loss, which he had thereby sustained. Henzell in reply agreed to follow the course taken by some other insurance associations, of which Smith was a member. These other associations afterwards admitted Smith's claim upon them. On the 1st July 1865 the association was ordered to be wound-up. Before this date Smith had paid some contributions demanded of him by the association in respect of losses sustained by ships of other members; but no payment had been made to him by the association in respect of his own claim. On the 21st Dec. 1866 he was settled upon the list of contributories of the association during the period of his membership. In Jan. 1867 he sent in his claim against the association for the sum of 70*l.* in respect of the damage suffered by his ship Holywood, and in Aug. 1867 he filed an affidavit in support of this claim. The official liquidator having taken out a summons for a call upon the contributories of the association, Mr. Smith applied to the Vice-Chancellor to have his name removed from the list of contributories, upon the ground that, as he had never received a stamped policy of insurance, his contract of membership was, by virtue of the Act 35 Geo. 3, c. 63, altogether void. The Vice-Chancellor took this view, and removed Mr. Smith's name from the list of contributories. The official liquidator appealed.

Eddis and Lindley, for the appellant, contended that there was a distinct agreement by Mr. Smith to bear his share of the payments ordered by the committee to be made for losses and contributions. There was no necessity for a policy of insurance, and though an unstamped policy of insurance could not be admitted in evidence, yet this species of contract for mutual indemnity was not within the Stamp Act (35 Geo. 3, c. 63). Mr. Smith was at any rate stopped from saying that he was not a member of the association, and he had, moreover, delayed too long in repudiating his liability. They referred to 35 Geo. 3, c. 63;

54 Geo. 3, c. 144;
9 Geo. 4, c. 49;
7 Vict. c. 21;
30 Vict. c. 23, s. 7;
Arnold on Marine Insurance.

And they cited

Taylor v. Dean, 22 Beav. 429;
Bromley v. Williams, 32 Beav. 177;
Harvey v. Beckwith, 10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 632;
Mead v. Davison 3 A. & E. 303;
Re Agra and Masterman's Bank, L. Rep. 2 Ch. 391; 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 162;
Underwood's case, 5 De G. M. & G. 677.

Macnaghten, for Mr. Smith, was not called upon.

Lord Justice SELWYN said:—We entertain no doubt that the conclusion of the Vice-Chancellor is correct. He has ordered the name of Mr. Smith not to be included in the list of contributories of this company. The question, in my judgment, depends entirely upon the construction of the Stamp Acts, and especially upon that of the Act 35 Geo. 3, c. 63. The case of the appellants cannot be put more favourably to them than by saying that a contract in writing was entered into, and for some time acted upon, by both parties to it. What, then, was the contract? In my judgment it was a contract for insurance. Then how is that contract affected by the Stamp Acts? Assuming that before the Act of 1867 a policy of insurance was not necessary, still the question remains whether this was not a contract for insurance within the meaning of the Act 35 Geo. 3, c. 63. Now, by sect. 1 of that Act, "from and after the 5th July 1795, there shall be raised, levied, collected, and paid for every skin or piece of vellum or parchment, or sheet, or piece of paper, upon which any insurance upon any ship or ships shall be engrossed, printed, or written," the stamp duties therein mentioned. That section imposes a stamp duty on every writing effecting a contract of insurance, and those words cast upon the appellants the duty of showing that these contracts of mutual insurance are exempt from the Act, a stamp having been imposed upon every piece of paper by means of which any insurance upon any ship shall be made. Then sect. 11 enacts that "every contract or agreement which shall be made or entered into for any insurance, in respect whereof any duty is by this Act made payable, shall be engrossed, printed, or written, and shall be deemed or called a policy of insurance." The first section is quite general in its terms; there is nothing in any way to limit it. Then we come to sect. 14, which is very material, as it contains an express reference to agreements for insurance. That section is—"No insurance made or entered into in Great Britain, in respect whereof any duty is by this Act made payable, nor any contract or agreement for such insurance as aforesaid, shall be pleaded or given in evidence in any court, or admitted in any court to be good, useful, or available in law or equity, unless the vellum, parchment, or paper, on which such insurance shall be engrossed, printed, or written, shall be stamped with a lawful stamp, to denote the rate or duty, as by this Act is directed, or to denote some higher rate of duty in this Act contained; and it shall not be lawful for the said commissioners of the said stamp duties, or any of their officers, to stamp any vellum, parchment, or paper, with any stamp directed to be provided or used by virtue of this Act, at any time, after any such insurance as aforesaid, or contract for such insurance, shall be ingrossed, printed, or written thereon, under any pretence whatever." That section plainly applies, not merely to policies for insurance, but to any agreement or contract for such insurance. It is perfectly unlimited in its language, and there is no ground for contending that, because the contract in the present case was not a contract for a policy of insurance, therefore it is not within the words of the Act. The case cannot be put higher than by saying that there was an agreement in writing between two parties, which was acted on for some time, but it was, however, a contract for the insurance of ships; and I agree with the Vice-Chancellor that it is not the duty of a court of law or of equity to be astute to find out ways in which the object of an Act of Parliament may be defeated. Then some reliance was placed in argument upon the 18th section of the Act, which provides that nothing in the Act contained shall extend to subject any of the members, officers, or servants of the corporations of the London Assurance and the Royal Exchange Assurance to any of the penalties by the Act imposed for or by reason of their making any agreement to insure by any label, slip, or memorandum, in writing, upon unstamped vellum, parchment, or paper. The proviso, however, at the end of that section puts an end to the argument which was raised, for that proviso is "provided that in every such case a policy of insurance according to the agreement expressed in such label, slip, or memorandum, shall be made out according to one of the forms in the schedule to this Act annexed, and duly entered and stamped within three office days from the time of making such agreement as aforesaid." The case may be looked at in two ways, and in two only. The policy would either be entered within the three days, or it would not. In the first case no question could arise, as the contract would then be merged in the policy; in the second case, the section would have no operation at all. That section cannot, therefore, operate to take a contract for insurance out of the provisions of the Act. In this case, therefore, the contract entirely failed, for by the Act we are precluded from taking notice of any contract as having any effect whatever at law or in equity. The name of Mr. Smith was, therefore, rightly omitted from the list of contributories. Underwood's case which was cited has really no application, and there has been no such laches on the part of Mr. Smith as can disentitle him from now saying that there is no contract binding him to become a member of the company. The decision of the Vice-Chancellor was right, and the appeal motion must be refused with costs.

Lord Justice GIFFARD.—Mr. Smith cannot be made a member of this company unless it can be shown that he entered into a binding mutual agreement for the insurance of ships. The contract, if there was any, was unquestionably a contract in writing, and I agree with the Vice-Chancellor that we cannot read any document in evidence in support of this contract, and that is the effect of the Act 35 Geo. 3, c. 63. It is clear under that Act that every contract in writing for the insurance of ships must be stamped, and cannot be used in evidence if it is not, and there is no difference between a court of law and a court of equity with regard to the evidence which can be used in support of such a contract. Then it was said that Mr. Smith is estopped from denying that he entered into this contract. But there is a complete answer to that argument in the fact that Mr. Henzell was the agent of the association as well as the agent of Mr. Smith. Moreover, with regard to laches I can find nothing to induce me to say that Mr. Smith was too late in making his application to be removed from the list of contributories. The appeal must, therefore, be refused with costs.

Solicitors for the appellants, Mercer and Mercer.

Solicitors for Mr. Smith, Young, Maples, and Co.

May 1 and 3.

(Before The LORDS JUSTICES.)

LAMB v. THE NORTH LONDON RAILWAY COMPANY.

Railway company and landowner—Compulsory powers to acquire lands—Purposes of the special Act—Unauthorised use of—Later Act for other purposes.

A railway company was, by an Act passed in 1865 empowered to take compulsorily certain lands for the purposes of the Act, amongst which was the stopping up and appropriating A. street. The plaintiff, owner of lands adjacent, had no notice of the intention to apply for this Act, nor were his lands included or referred to therein, or in the deposited plans. By an Act passed in 1864, the company were, however, empowered so to take his lands, but solely for the purposes of that Act, amongst which the stopping up of A. street was not included.

Held, that the company could not avail themselves of the powers of the earlier Act to take the lands of the plaintiff against his will, in order to apply them to the purposes of the later Act, and an injunction granted by James, V. C., was continued by the Court of Appeal.

The company already possessed lands sufficient for the new road, but they were desirous of applying those lands to other objects, and therefore would not avail themselves of them, but it was Held, by Giffard, L.J., that this fact would have afforded no ground for the interference of the court by injunction at the plaintiff's instance, if the company had determined to take his land for purposes duly authorised by the Act under which they were empowered to acquire it.

This was a motion by the defendants, appealing from an order of James, V.C., who had granted an injunction restraining them from taking proceedings for obtaining compulsory possession of certain lands and hereditaments, the property of the plaintiff, and from entering upon or taking possession of the same, or any part thereof.

The hereditaments referred to were freehold messuages, shops, &c., in Islington, near the Highbury station of the defendants' railway, to which the plaintiff was entitled in fee.

The railway company was incorporated in Aug. 1846, and its line has now been for several years completed and open for traffic. At the Highbury station the line passes under Upper-street and Albert-street, in a cutting at a considerable depth below the level of the land on either side.

The company intended to apply to Parliament in the Session of 1864 for additional powers to take new lands and construct new works, and gave notice of their intention to the plaintiff as being interested in the hereditaments referred to, which were among the lands so required. In accordance with their intention they applied for and obtained an Act entitled, "The North London Railway (Additional Powers) Act 1864," which, amongst other things, incorporated the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act. The preamble recited that it was expedient to empower the company to purchase or acquire by compulsion or otherwise additional lands and houses in connection with their undertaking, and that plans and sections showing the lands and houses which the company might purchase under the Act had been deposited with the clerk of the peace. Then by the 6th section it was enacted that, subject to the provisions in this Act, and in the incorporated Acts contained, the company might enter upon, take and use all or any of the lands and other property shown in the plans, and described in the books of reference so deposited, but the power of taking the same compulsorily should not be exercised after the space of three years from the passing of that Act. And by the 19th section it was enacted that nothing in the Act contained should empower the company to stop up or alter the present level or inclination of the public road, numbered 35A, and called Albert-street on the deposited plans, without the previous consent in writing of the vestry of the parish of St. Mary, Islington.

The defendants were unable to obtain this consent to stop up or alter Albert-street, but as, after the passing of the Act of 1864, they required, for the purpose of carrying out a contemplated enlargement of their station at Highbury, to take and use a certain portion of Albert-street, otherwise Swan-yard, they in the following year applied for and obtained the North London Railway Act 1865, which also incorporated the Lands Clauses Act, but not any provisions or clause of the Act of 1864.

The preamble to this second Act recited that the said street or lane, called Albert-street, passed over the railway at Highbury station, and that in order to carry out the contemplated enlargement and improvement of that station, it was expedient to empower the company to stop up a portion of the said street or lane, and to appropriate part of the site thereof for the purposes of their undertaking, and that it was also expedient to empower the company to purchase or acquire, by compulsion or otherwise, and hold, additional lands and houses in connection with their undertaking, and that plans and sections showing the line and levels of (inter alia) the said street proposed to be stopped up, and also showing the lands and houses which the company might purchase under that Act, together with a book of reference to such plans, had been deposited with the clerk of the peace for the county of Middlesex.

This Act, by its 21st section, provided that, subject to the provisions in this Act and in the incorporated Acts contained, the company might enter upon, take, and use all or any of the lands and other property shown on the plans and described in the book of reference so deposited as aforesaid, but that the power of taking the same compulsorily should not be exercised after the space of three years from the passing of the Act.

Then by the 58th section it was provided that—

Subject to the provisions and restrictions in this Act and the Acts wholly or partially incorporated herewith respectively contained, the company may also permanently stop up and appropriate for their use portions of the street or lane in the parish of St. Mary, Islington, known as Swan-yard, otherwise Albert-street, to the extent shown upon the said plans; and the site of so much of the said street or lane as shall be stopped up and appropriated as aforesaid shall, from the time of such stopping up and appropriation thereof respectively, beabsolutely vested in the company; provided nevertheless that the company shall have previously constructed at their cost a new or substituted road of twenty feet in width, and running from the portion thereof cut off and lying south of the railway to Upper-street, Islington, in a direction as near as may be parallel to that of the line of the railway. And the company shall at their cost pave and keep in repair for the space of twelve months, the said substituted road, and the same shall ever thereafter be dedicated to the use of the public, and be maintained, repaired, and regulated by the Vestry of St. Mary, Islington.

The lands and hereditaments of the plaintiff, which were included in the plans deposited in contemplation of the Act of 1864, did not form any part of the lands and houses defined or shown upon the plans, or sections, or book of reference, as lands or houses which the company might purchase under the Act of 1865, and the company never served the plaintiff with any notice of their intention to apply to Parliament for power to purchase or acquire any property of the plaintiff for the purposes of the Act of 1865, and no power was by the later Act given to or conferred upon the company, to take, acquire, or use any of the plaintiff's lands for the purposes of that Act.

The company did nothing with respect to their powers under the Act of 1864 to take the plaintiff's land, until the time for exercising their compulsory powers had nearly expired; but on the 16th May 1867 the company served him with notice, alleging that they required such part of his land as was mentioned in the schedule to the notice, and that they were willing to treat with him for the purchase; and the plaintiff, in the belief, as his bill alleged, that the defendants really and truly required the lands for the purposes of the Act of 1864, entered into negotiations accordingly. These negotiations were, however, protracted, and at the date of the filing of the bill no agreement had been concluded.

The plaintiff recently discovered, and it was the fact, that the defendants did not require the lands for the purposes for which alone, by the Act of 1864, they were empowered and authorised to take them, but that in point of fact the defendants desired to take them for the purpose of constructing the new and substituted road which, under the provisions of the Act of 1865, they were bound to make before they could permanently stop up and appropriate the portions of Albert-street, and for the further purpose of applying such parts as were not required for the new roads for purposes other than those authorised by their Acts, or any of them.

The defendants had, moreover, purchased of other persons lands between the plaintiff's property and the wall of the railway at Highbury Station, which lands were of more than sufficient width for the construction of the proposed new road, and the bill alleged that they might construct the road over those lands; but the defendants did not intend to use these intervening lands for the purposes authorised by the Act of 1864, but for private purposes of their own; for, being owners of the Cock Tavern, they intended to enlarge their station, which lies behind it, by pulling down the Cock Tavern, and they had entered into arrangements with the lessees to erect, or permit to be erected, a new tavern upon the vacant space (the intervening lands), which was to be connected with the station so as to be used therewith as a refreshment room.

The bill, after stating these facts, as to which there was substantially no dispute, charged that no part of the "intervening" lands was ever bonâ fide required for the purposes of their undertaking, and that no part of the plaintiff's lands was bonâ fide required by the defendants for the purposes of the Act of 1864, but that all such lands were alleged to be so required only under colour of the powers of the Act of 1864, to enable them to erect the new tavern, and to construct the proposed new road over the plaintiff's land, and to annex so much of the plaintiff's land as should not be required for the new road to the back premises of the intended tavern; that the plaintiff had accordingly refused to sell, or in any manner to treat for the sale, but that the defendants had, on the 9th March 1869, issued their warrant to the sheriff to summon a jury to assess the compensation to be paid to the plaintiff, and they threatened and intended to take possession of the lands. The bill prayed to the effect already stated for an injunction, which was granted on motion by the learned Vice-Chancellor, against which the present appeal was brought.

Sir Roundell Palmer, Q. C. and Rodwell supported the appeal.

Kay, Q. C. and Woodhouse, for the plaintiff, opposed.

The authorities referred to were:

The Eastern Counties Railway Company v. Hawkes, 5 H. of L. Cas. 331;
The Warden and Assistants of the Harbour of Dover v. The South-Eastern Railway Company, 9 Hare, 489;
Cother v. The Midland Railwoy Company, 2 Ph. 469;
Sadd v. The Maldon, &c., Railway Company, 6 Exch. 143;
Reg. v. The Wycombe Railway Company, L. Rep. 2 Q. B. 310; 15 L. T. Rep. N. S. 610;
Galloway v. The Mayor and Commonalty of London, L. Rep. 1 Eng. and Ir. App. 34; 14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 865;
Flower v. The London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway Company, 2 Dr. & Sm. 330; 12 L. T. Rep. N. S. 10;
Webb v. The Manchester and Leeds Railway Company, 4 Myl. & Cr. 116;
Eversfield v. The Mid-Sussex Railway Company, 3 De G. & J. 286;
The Railways Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, ss. 16, 45, 46.

Sir Roundell Palmer, Q.C. having been heard in reply,

Lord Justice SELWYN said: In cases like that which is now before the court, the burden lies upon those who seek to take the property of others against their will, to show that a compulsory power enabling them so to do has been conferred upon them by Parliament. Such powers are not to be created or extended by doubtful implication, but, as Lord Cottenham observed in the case of Webb v. The Lancashire, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway Company (ubi sup.), it is the duty of the court to keep those companies which possess such extraordinary powers strictly within the limits of those powers.

In the present case, the plaintiff's land is shown on the plans, and described in the books of reference referred to by the Act of 1864, but it is not included in the plans, nor described in the books of reference referred to by the Act of 1865; and in my judgment it is perfectly clear, and indeed the contrary has not been insisted upon in argument, that the company could not, for the purpose of making their new road which that Act did not contemplate, have acquired the property of the plaintiff under the Act of 1864; for although it is true there are no negative words contained in the 6th clause of that Act, still it has been very fairly and properly admitted by Sir Roundell Palmer that the company is necessarily restricted to the purposes of the Act when they come to acquire compulsory land under the powers conferred upon them. I think it did not require the authority of the recent case in the Court of Queen's Bench, Reg. v. The Wycombe Railway Company (ubi sup.), to show that there was no foundation for the argument which was addressed to us by Mr. Rodwell, that, under circumstances such as exist in the present case this company had power to stop up the street called Albert-street, under the general powers conferred by the 16th section of the Railway Clauses Act, limited as those powers are by the words at the commencement and the close of that section, and also by the express enactment of the 46th section of the same Act of Parliament. I think it is perfectly plain that they had no such power, still less had they any power to make another street at right angles with that street, and running into another and entirely different road. I think, therefore, we must proceed upon the hypothesis that under the Act of 1864, taken by itself, the company had no power to take or purchase against the will of the plaintiff this land for the purpose of making any such road.

Under these circumstances, then, if the plaintiff had been able to foresee what the company would require for the purposes of the Act of 1864, excluding from those purposes the formation of this new street, he would have known that a very small, if any, portion of his land would be required for the purposes of that Act, and he might, therefore, reasonably abstain from offering any opposition to the passing of that Act through Parliament. Then he received no notice of the introduction of the Act of 1865, or of any intention to obtain from Parliament any extension of the powers contained in the Act of 1864; and it certainly would be a case of considerable hardship if a person in the possession of land over which no powers were conferred by the Act of 1864, should find himself exposed to the exercise of such compulsory powers without any notice, or any means of opposing the passing through Parliament of the Act conferring those powers. But, nevertheless, if such powers had been clearly given by the Legislature, whatever the hardship might have been upon any individual, it would have been our duty to act upon and maintain the provisions of the Act of Parliament.

But the question which we have to decide is whether, in fact, any such powers have been conferred by the Act of 1865. I think it is upon th construction of that Act, having reference, of course, to the former Act, that the question before the court turns. Now, in considering that Act of Parliament, I think there are three things which are to be observed. The first is, that the two Acts of Parliament are entirely distinct, that there are no words incorporating the one Act with the other; secondly, that the second Act does not continue or extend the powers contained in the Act of 1864; and, thirdly, that in the Act of 1865 there is no reference to the lands authorised to be taken by the former Act; but, on the contrary, the two acts are, as I have said, separate and distinct Acts of Parliament. The powers conferred by each of them are separate and distinct, and the lands which the company is authorised to purchase under the Act of 1864 are quite separate and distinct from those which are authorised to be purchased by the Act of 1865. That is done in a very marked manner by both the Acts of Parliament. It will be sufficient to refer to the second Act, that of 1865, for the observations which I made upon that apply also to the Act of 1864. It contains a recital that "it is expedient to empower the company to purchase, or acquire by compulsion, or otherwise, and hold, additional lands and houses in connection with their undertaking, and whereas plans and sections showing the line," and so forth, "and of the intended new cut from the company's existing railway dock into the river Thames, and of the intended new road in substitution of Grange-road, and of the said street proposed to be stopped up, and also showing the lands and houses which the company may purchase under this Act, together with a book of reference to such plans have been deposited with the clerk of the peace. [His Lordship then read the 21st and 58th sections of that Act, and proceeded:] Now, as I have already said, the construction of this new or substituted railway cannot be considered, in my judgment, as one of the purposes of the Act of 1864 at all; it is a matter entirely collateral to the formation of the railway; it is in fact the price or condition upon which, as between themselves and the public, the company were authorised to stop up and appropriate for their own use a certain portion of the street called Albert-street; but there is no express direction that they shall construct this new street, there are no special powers given to them for purchasing the land which is necessary for the formation of that new street, but it is merely imposed as a condition upon their acquisition of so much of the street called Albert-street as they were entitled to appropriate to their own use. And therefore, in my judgment, if Parliament had intended, for the purpose of this new street, to give powers of compulsorily taking any particular portion of land, that being one of the purposes of the Act of Parliament, the lands which were necessary for that purpose would have been included in the plans and in the books of reference, and also would have been stated to be lands which were to be purchased for the purposes of that Act. Of course if such lands had been included in plans previously deposited, and if they had been comprised in the former Act of Parliament, it would have been very easy to have referred to them without the necessity of requiring any new deposit or any new description of these lands. But we do not find any such reference, nor is there any incorporation of the provisions of the former Act at all. I think, therefore, this being an entirely separate and collateral thing, we must take it that Parliament meant this company to acquire, as they best might, the lands which were necessary for the formation of this new road, only saying that unless you do acquire land necessary for that purpose, and do form this new street, then the condition will not be complied with; and unless you do that, you will not be at liberty to appropriate to your own use that portion of Albert-street which, upon the performance of that condition, is to become the property of the company. I think, therefore, that the 58th section cannot be considered as, either directly or indirectly, conferring the power of compulsorily purchasing these lands, which are the property of the plaintiff. Then an argument was also founded upon the recital in the Act of 1865, to which I have already referred, and which is similar to the one contained in the Act of 1864, namely, the recital that it is also "expedient to empower the company to purchase or acquire, by compulsion or otherwise, and hold additional lands and houses in connection with their undertaking." I agree with the argument that that word undertaking must include the whole undertaking from the commencement of the company to the time when this Act of Parliament was passed. But I think the very collocation of the recitals that immediately follow it will show that it really could not have been the intention of the parties to include the plaintiff's land for the purpose of making this new road; for the next recital after it is this: "Whereas plans and sections showing the line and levels of the proposed widening of the said portion of the company's railway, and of the proposed enlargement and improvement of the said bridges respectively, and of the intended new cut from the company's existing railway dock into the river Thames, and of the intended new road in substitution of Grange-road, and of the said street proposed to be stopped up, and also showing the lands and houses which the company may purchase under this Act have been deposited." Now adopting the argument of Sir Roundell Palmer upon this point, that this was intended to give them, by compulsion or otherwise, the power to obtain additional lands in connection with their undertaking, that power of obtaining by compulsion these additional lands, is one of the express purposes of the Act of 1865. Then the next recital is, that the lands which are to be acquired, and which the company may purchase under this Act for those, amongst other, purposes, are described in the plans and books of reference, and those plans and books of reference do not include the plaintiff's land. Therefore, I think there is no sufficient ground for saying that, by means of that recital or otherwise, any such power can be implied. I think it is clear that no such power is expressed in the terms of this Act. I think, therefore, that the company have failed in showing the existence in either of these Acts of Parliament of any power enabling them compulsorily to purchase the plaintiff's land. In my judgment the company have failed upon the merits, and the consequence is that the appeal motion must be dismissed, and they must pay the costs of the motion.

Lord Justice GIFFARD said:—There were certain subordinate points which were adverted to in the argument upon this case, which I will just touch upon before going to the real questions which arise on this appeal. It was alleged that, because the company had some other land which they might apply to this purpose, and were building, or proposed to build, an hotel upon it, therefore the plaintiff was entitled to the injunction. I am quite satisfied that that circumstance would have afforded no ground for interfering, provided this land was actually being taken for the purposes for which the company might lawfully take it.

Then, again, it was argued that the notice included some land which was taken for lawful purposes, and that the notice was separate, and that at all events the injunction ought not to prevent that, or, at least, that certain terms ought to be imposed on the plaintiff. Now first of all there is no distinction; the notice applies to certain specified lands without any distinction whatever; and, secondly, I cannot see either how it can be separable, or how you can take one part of the notice and disregard another. The fact is, that when the notice is given it is the foundation of all the subsequent proceedings, and all the subsequent proceedings must necessarily accord with it; and if they do not accord with it, it necessarily follows that the notice itself is wrong. That being so, it is clear that there are no grounds whatever for imposing terms on the plaintiff. There is no act done by him which has misled the company, and no reason why terms should be imposed upon him.

That brings me to what is the real question in the case; and that is, whether the compulsory powers of this company extend to taking the plaintiff's land for this purpose. Under the Act of 1864 it is conceded that this particular thing could not be done. The preamble of the Act of 1864 has been read, and in point of fact it recites that it is expedient to take certain lands in connection (that is the widest way of putting it), certain additional lands and houses in connection with the defendants' undertaking. Then those lands are specified, and the 6th clause says: "Subject to the provisions in this Act, and in the incorporated Acts contained, the company may enter upon, take and use all or any of the lands and other property shown on the plans and described in the book of reference, so deposited as aforesaid;" and then the compulsory powers were not to be exercised after a given period.

Now, seeing what the law with reference to these companies is, I can have no doubt but that this company could, of course, only take those specified lands for lawful purposes; that is, the specified lands for such purposes as were authorised by this Act, and that the Act must be taken quite as strongly as if it had said, "You shall take the lands for those purposes, and for no others."

That being so, we then come to the Act of 1865. The Act of 1865 does specify other lands, and does give, with reference to those other lands, compulsory powers, and it in no way refers to the compulsory powers given by the Act of 1864; nor, even if the vestry had consented, do I think that any power was given by the Act of 1864 to make this substituted road. It might well be if the vestry had given power to stop up Albert-street that, even with that consent, there would have been no power to make the substituted road.

Then we come to the 58th section of this second Act; and beyond all question all these compulsory powers are directly in derogation of private rights, and are to be read most strongly against the railway company, and are to be read most strongly in favour of private rights; and you could not imply any extension of the compulsory powers, unless there was a positive and absolute necessity for doing so. In this case there is no positive or absolute necessity for doing so, and it might well be that this company could agree with some one who would sell them land; they might lawfully do that under the Railways Clauses Act, and I think under the implied power which would arise under this 58th section, it might well be that they might have agreed with this plaintiff. If they had agreed, or could now agree, with him they could do that thing which was a condition precedent to their having a right to stop up this Albert-street. Again, if it were convenient to them to apply that land which was in their possession for the purpose of making this road, then they could do that thing which was a condition precedent to their stopping up Albert-street. Upon that, therefore, it is plain that it is not absolutely necessary to imply an extension of those compulsory powers. There was a state of circumstances under which it might be reasonably assumed that it would be possible to do this thing without any extension of the compulsory powers. In terms there is no extension of the compulsory powers, and the compulsory powers being directly and distinctly in derogation of private rights, I am of opinion that it would not be a sound construction of Acts of Parliament of this sort, to imply or to give to any such clause as that which is represented by the 58th section of this Act, any such extensive meaning as would by implication extend these compulsory powers, when they are not so extended in terms. In point of fact if companies want to extend their compulsory powers, they should tell the public so plainly, and they should give the public the opportunity of appearing before Parliament, and opposing them if they think fit.

Upon these grounds the appeal motion must be dismissed with costs, but our order will confine the injunction in effect to proceedings upon the footing of this notice.

Solicitors for the appellant company, Paine and Layton.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, respondent, Langham and Son.

V. C. MALINS' COURT.

Reported by G. T. EDWARDS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

June 30 and July 1, 3, and 5.

MACKIE v. THE EUROPEAN ASSURANCE SOCIETY.

Insurance company—Agent—Temporary agreement for policy—Fire before policy and after agreement and deposit.

W. being the agent of the C. U. Assurance Company, M. insured a mill and warehouse through W. in that office. W., without M.'s knowledge, ceased to be such agent, and became agent for the E. A. Company, and on M.'s application for a fresh policy gave him a printed receipt filled up for a deposit for a month until a regular policy should be made out. M. did not at first discover that the form was on behalf of the E. A. Company, but when he did wrote to W. noting the change, and saying that he knew nothing of the E. A. Company, and should require to be satisfied of their respectability and standing before he could consent to give them over all the sums. Before any policy was made out part of the premises were burned down, and nothing having been communicated to M. by the E. A. office, either as accepting or refusing his proposal, nor several letters from him claiming the sum insured answered, the office sent down a clerk, who viewed the premises, and then refused to pay the insurance, chiefly on the ground that M. by his letter had repudiated the insurance with them:

On bill filed for recovery of the insurance, decree made with costs.

This bill was filed by Robert Mackie to recover 2800*l.* the amount of an insurance on a Scotch bonnet manufactory at Stewarton in Ayrshire, Scotland, under somewhat peculiar circumstances: The plaintiff had for some years carried on the above business under the firm of "Robert Mackie and Co.," the premises consisting of a wool mill, a bonnet factory, and wool store; the two latter portions were not injured by the fire, a steam boiler and chimney being between the mill and factory, and the engine working both; and the wool-store was detached. Previously to Nov. 1866 these premises were insured with the Commercial Union Assurance Company for 2700*l.*, the insurance having been effected through James Waddell (till recently agent to the Commercial Union) in yearly policies. In April 1866, the plaintiff gave Waddell general instructions to insure his stock for an additional 200*l.*, and this was done, and would expire in Nov. 1867. In 1866 the plaintiff enlarged his premises, and during the alterations James Waddell made suggestions as to diminishing the risk. The plaintiff then saw Waddell, and proposed to insure the mill for 1400*l.*, and the bonnet factory for 1300*l.* James Waddell took down the particulars in pencil, and asked the plaintiff for 2*l.*, and said he would give him a deposit receipt which would hold him covered until the policies were arranged, and put them in one receipt. The plaintiff told Waddell that he had insured the mill for 1400*l.* also in another office, when Waddell said he should like to have had all. The plaintiff subsequently met Waddell at Kilmarnock Railway Station, paid him 2*l.*, and Waddell handed him a deposit receipt which he put in his pocket, being pressed for time, and just going by the train, and noticed only that it was a receipt for the 2*l.* It was as follows, in a printed form and stamped:

No. 5966.

THE EUROPEAN ASSURANCE SOCIETY.
(Empowered by special Act of Parliament.)
Chief Offices, London:
Fire, 69, King William-street, E.C.
Life, 2, Waterloo-place, Pall-Mall.

Glasgow, 16th Nov. 1866.

Memorandum of Deposit.

Messrs. R. Mackie and Co., Stewarton, having this day proposed an insurance of 2700*l.* to the European Assurance Society, on property described in their fire order of this date, and having made a deposit of 2*l.* in part payment of premium and duty, it is hereby declared that the property so described shall be held insured in virtue of such deposit for one month from this date, or until notice be sooner given that the proposal is declined. Total, say 2700*l.*

JAMES WADDELL, for the Society.

On the 17th Waddell sent by post to the society fire orders for 11,020*l.*, including the 2700*l.*, and the receipt was acknowledged by the head office, and on the 20th he sent a ground plan of the mill and bonnet factory. On the 22nd the plaintiff wrote to Waddell saying that the other office had behaved shabbily, and refused the insurance, and asking if he would take all, to which he replied that he would, and on the same day he communicated the fact to the office. On the 24th the plaintiff sent a post-office order to Waddell for 2*l.*, the additional insurance (2800*l.*), and on the 26th a stamped printed filled up receipt in the same form as the first was sent by Waddell to the plaintiff, and on the 27th be communicated it to the office. On receiving the second deposit receipt the plaintiff noticed for the first time that the office was the European, and wrote the following letter on the 28th.

Mr. Waddell.

Sir,—I see from your receipt that you seem to change our insurance from the Commercial Union to the European. Now you did not acquaint me of that, and I expected that you were continuing us in the old office. Do they refuse to take it now, if so, do they refuse also to take the bonnet works? I do not want any change in the office if they were willing to take all or part. As for the European, I know nothing about them, and would require to be satisfied of their respectability and standing before I could consent to give them over all the sums. Please write me and say if the old office refuse to take the assurance still, and if they also refuse the bonnet works, which I would prefer not to change at all events, and wait our reply before proceeding with the change.—We are, yours respectfully,

R. MACKIE and Co.

No reply was sent to this letter.

The bill alleged that some of the insurance offices in consequence of the fire at London Bridge had raised the rates on a tariff, but the Commercial Union was then a non-tariff office; but that insurance having expired, the plaintiff considered he had better let the insurance remain with the European. On the 1st Dec. 1866 the woollen mill was burned down, and notice of it was given to Waddell by special messenger immediately, and Waddell having inspected the ruins on the 4th, wrote to the plaintiff, inclosing a copy of the bonnet policy, and asking him to make out the wool claim minutely, and push on the other claims, as the head office was applying for them.

On the 6th the plaintiff went to Glasgow with an estimate of loss, and gave it to Waddell, from whom he understood that it would be settled in due course. The plaintiffs met W. H. Hepper, a clerk of the defendants, at Waddell's, and they went through the estimates, with which Hepper found fault, and suggested a compromise, which the plaintiff declined; when he asked him when he first knew he was insured in the European, to which he replied, not until the 26th Nov., when Hepper said, as it was alleged, very offensively, "I am glad you confess that," and some words ensued, Hepper saying he had discovered something he should not disclose. What followed may be thus summed up. Hepper did not go to Stewarton, and although the plaintiff wrote to the office, sending particulars of his claim, four times he received no reply. He likewise wrote to Waddell three times, who replied on the 11th Jan., wishing to see him, inclosing a letter of the 9th from the secretary (the defendant J. Hamer Owens), written to him, Waddell. This letter stated that the directors had deliberately considered the claim, and were convinced that not the slightest liability attached to the society in connection with it; that the money (4*l.*) paid, not being intended for them, ought to be returned. The result was, that this bill was filed for the recovery of the money with interest, after a letter of remonstrance had been written by the plaintiff to Waddell. There was a great deal of evidence, that for the plaintiffs going to show that Waddell had communicated everything to the office, although there was a conflict on this point, the defendants denying that. With this exception, the facts were hardly in dispute. It appeared, however, that the office had given up their fire business.

Glasse, Q.C. and Macnaghten appeared for the plaintiffs, and argued that the two documents being receipts for the respective sums of 2*l.* each, were quite sufficient alone to bind the office. The terms were distinct; they were to cover the insurance for a month, unless the proposal was declined (that is, before a fire), which it never was. Indeed, it never was declined at all, but a fire having immediately happened, the office, finding that matters had gone against them, sought to escape from the liability, and sent Hepper down to do so in a most unfair way. The letter written by the plaintiff was no repudiation; at all events, he wished to be insured, and considered that he was for the month, during which time he wished to consider whether he would continue with the European by taking a regular policy; nothing more. It was only a question of responsibility of the office. Waddell and the office treated it as a continuing contract, and it never would have been in question if the fire had not so immediately happened, and if the company had not given up their fire business. There were all the elements of a contract, and even supposing there was a repudiation the refusal came too late, after so long an acquiescence:

Wing v. Harvey, 5 De G. M. and G. 265;
Law v. London Indisputable Life Policy Company, 1 K. & J. 223.

Sir Roundell Palmer Q.C. Cotton, Q.C. and Bevir, for the defendants, contended that there was no binding contract. To form a binding contract there must be two parties agreeing to the same thing. Here they disagreed, and it was not the same subject matter; for not only was everything left open by the letter of the plaintiff, but it operated as a distinct repudiation. The plaintiff took a receipt and aid the deposit under an entire misapprehension, and the moment he discovered it threw the whole open, and in distinct terms said that he could not agree with the European until he was satisfied of their responsibility; and while this was pending the fire happened. The company at once declined and disclaimed all title to the money, putting the matter in the right light, namely, that it was never intended for them. No doubt had nothing been said the defendants might have been bound; although that was very doubtful, for their agent had not disclosed the fact that he had made out the deposit as the agent of the European, and he could not bind them, if, without their knowledge and sanction, he had imposed upon a third person. If remedy there were it was as between him and that third person. When the fire occurred both parties were considering the question, and the plaintiff in writing had actually thrown it all open, and therefore it was impossible that there could be any relief.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR, without hearing a reply (after stating the facts).—I do not hear a reply, because I entertain no doubt on this case. This office, which in 1866 was a life office, carried on business at various places, and a large proportion, through the instrumentality of agents, and, not satisfied with business in England, were desirous of carrying on business in Scotland; and in the usual course employed a gentleman, who was highly respectable, and carried on a large business at Glasgow, as their agent, being also agent to another office called the Commercial Union, a fire office, which branch of business the European has discontinued. That he ceased to be fire agent to the Commercial does not appear to have been known to Mr. Mackie; but eventually, the amount of insurance being fixed at 2700*l.*, and some time necessarily occupied in preparing the policy, a receipt was given in a form, as I understand it, not peculiar to this office, but common at other offices. This note, so far as Waddell's authority extended, was an immediate assurance for 2700*l.* and it is agreed that, assuming it was within his authority, if a fire had happened while the letter he wrote the office was in transit, the loss sustained would be covered by the policy, because the regulations most properly provided that "should the directors decline the assurance, the money was to be immediately returned to the assured. During the interim the assurance remains in legal force." In the letter which Mr. Waddell wrote, referring to many assurances, he specifies this amongst others, and the defendants' answer admits it. It was competent for the office by return of post to decline the proposal, without giving a reason, but until such notice was received the insurance would continue, and if a fire happened in the interval this office would have been answerable. But they deliberately accepted it. Mr. Owens, the secretary, admitting in the answer that the fire order was acknowledged in due course, he having the management of the fire business; also, in his letter to Mr. Waddell he says, "I am in receipt of your favour of the 17th instant, and note that you have accepted proposals to the amount of 11,020*l.*, the particulars of which I await." Is it possible that there could be a more distinct acceptance of the proposition, or a more distinct adoption of the contract? It is really "We have accepted." Nothing can be more distinct to my mind than that Mr. Waddell being their agent from the very commencement of this business; having, as he says, effected for them no less than 160 policies; being a man with whom they were perfectly satisfied and as to whose discretion they had no reason to complain—they leave it to him to accept or reject what he thinks fit. There is not in evidence an instance of their having rejected one proposal made to them by him. Here they deliberately accepted it, and it became a binding contract on this company. But Mr. Waddell, knowing that the plaintiffs had got an insurance in another office, and having for some reason, wholly unimportant, ceased to be agent for the Commercial Union Assurance Company, was desirous of obtaining the whole of the plaintiffs' assurance for this office, and therefore, as the defendants admit, on the 23rd Nov. he wrote to Mr. Hepper saying he had a letter from Mackie and Co. giving him the whole of their fire risks; that he had pressed it hard before, and would send particulars by next post. Was that repudiated? Quite the contrary. They are well satisfied and adopt this act. That would be received on the 24th, and on the 26th Mr. Mackie makes his final proposal to increase the insurance to 2800*l.*, and Mr. Waddell gets from him a further 2*l.* by post office order, how he received it being immaterial, and Waddell gave the formal receipt for the increased insurance. He swears, and I believe his statement, that by the post of the 27th he wrote informing the office of the circumstance. Against this statement there is nothing but that the office says they have not got the letter, and they did not receive it; but here is the positive statement by Waddell, corroborated by a document referred to containing extracts from Waddell's books, where this entry appears, "Wrote Hepper that I had got Mackie and Co's additional half on the mill." I am, therefore, satisfied, on the evidence, that Waddell wrote, on the 27th, and that the letter was received by the office. Can I, under these circumstances, have any doubt that that letter being received, they would as readily accept the additional 1400*l.* as they did the original 1400*l.*? Why am I to assume that they would not? They did not know that the place was going to be burnt down in three or four days, and were anxious to get business, and the more Waddell got for them the better agent they considered him. There is in evidence a book of this society containing a solemn address to their agents. The instructions are clearly detailed, and his careful perusal solicited, the advantages of a good agency pointed out, and exertion urged upon him. It means this, "Push your business, seek for, and get as many policies as you can, and the more you get the better agent we shall esteem you." Can I therefore presume in favour of the office that when he got more business they would repudiate it because they tell me so now that the place has been burnt? I presume everything against them, that they would have continued in the usual course, never having before repudiated any of Mr. Waddell's proposals, and I am satisfied that they received the letter; and if they did not it was not the fault of the assured but of their own agent; and if they received it they would as gladly adopt the second proposal as they had the first. This, therefore, completes the contract to cover one month during which the policies were to be prepared; although I agree that during that month it was open to the office on further inquiry to refuse to grant the policy and to terminate the contract at the end of the month. It was equally open to the assured to say he did not like the European office, not thinking the capital sufficient, or for other reasons, or that they had taken the same course before, and that he disliked a repudiating office. It was open to either party during the month. But it is of the highest importance, not only to the public generally, but to that class interested as shareholders in these companies, that this kind of business should be conducted on principles of integrity, and no trickery had recourse to when the risk has gone against the insurers. It is only due to this company to say that their rules seem proper and moderate, and probably such as to suit their transactions. One refers to special risks requiring special descriptions, and there are instructions to agents that no assurance will be held in force unless on prepayment of deposit or premium with printed acknowledgment. Therefore when payment is made, and a receipt given, the risk is incurred. It is also provided that if the insurance is declined the money is to be immediately returned, and "during the interim the assurance remains in legal force." Therefore the proposal having been made and accepted, and the contract, as I think, fully in force against the office on the morning of the 1st Dec., fifteen days after the first proposal, and five after the second, the premises are burned, and thereupon, if the contract was in force, the plaintiff became entitled to the 2800*l.* if he had sustained that damage. [Having considered the correspondence and the steps taken to ascertain the damage, the Vice-Chancellor proceeded:] It turns out that this office, presided over by a gentleman of high position, with a respectable body of directors and firm of solicitors, and a respectable staff, whether by deliberations of the board, which I hope it was not, or circumstances which I cannot get at, did not send the clerk down fairly to ascertain the damage, but to see what holes he could pick in the contract, to enable a repudiation, and leave this poor man, as far as they knew, utterly ruined by the fire, against the perils of which he thought himself protected by the contract. This clerk, whether from overheated zeal or instructions, I know not which, fancied he had made a great discovery, that the plaintiff who wished his property insured, when he wrote to Waddell intended to effect a policy in the Commercial Union. It has been strenuously argued as a fatal objection that to constitute a contract there must be the consent of both parties to the same thing; and in consequence of this discovery, after the fire and this poor gentleman's property had been destroyed, he has been kept out of the money for more than two years and a half, which ought to have been paid within a month. There is no doubt on his evidence that although he received from Waddell, the agent in whom he had confidence, the printed forms, arming Waddell with authority, he put them in his pocket and did not look at them, and it was not until he received the second that he was aware that he was insured in the European. Now, on the 28th, he wrote to Mr. Waddell, and this is part of Mr. Hepper's great discovery, two days before the fire. [The Vice-Chancellor read the letter.] It is contended that this letter was a repudiation; I cannot treat it as anything of the kind. It amounts, in my mind, to this, that he having been satisfied with the Commercial found that Waddell, in whom he had perfect confidence, had handed him over to the European, and that he had a contract for a month with them. I read it thus: "I intend, during the whole month, to consider whether I will accept the European," but can any reasonable man conclude that he meant, "sooner than be insured in the European I will remain uninsured altogether?" He knew that he was exposed to peril by fire every hour, and until he got another document, he could not be insured anywhere but in the European. I must put a rational construction on this letter, viz., that he intended to make further inquiry, and upon making such inquiry, he would have felt himself at liberty to decline further insurance with the European. But he would have made further inquiry of Waddell, and he would have told him truly that he had ceased to be agent for the Commercial Union, but that the European was at least as good, and perhaps better. The advertisement in the Law List states that they never dispute policies, with an income of 300,000*l.* a year. If he had made inquiries, he would have accepted the policy, as accept it he did. He had a perfect right to adopt or repudiate the contract, and he adopted it until he distinctly repudiated. It was not a repudiation by him, but a continuing contract, as if that letter had never been written—as if when he accepted the document, he had been aware that it was the European, and not the Commercial with whom he had contracted. The defence set up on this ground is contemptible and ridiculous. I am told that eminent counsel, I neither know nor wish to know whom, advised the office to resist the policy. I stated when I heard it that I hoped it was accompanied by advice that if on technical grounds they had such a defence they ought not to avail themselves of it. The first objection therefore is, that it was not the plaintiff's intention to insure in this office. My opinion is, that his intention was not to remain uninsured for an hour, and in what office it was was a secondary consideration, provided it would meet its engagements, and was able to do so. This office has the ability, and I am sorry that they have not taken a different view. On the other part of this case, their first objection totally failing, the next is, that Mr. Waddell miscarried by not making such communication to their office as he ought considering the peril. I am perfectly satisfied that between the 16th Nov., and even after the second document and before the fire, there was ample opportunity for the office to complain to the agent and require him to perform his duty; and nothing could be more fatal to the interests of the public in fire and life assurances, which are carried on to such an enormous extent through agencies, than for the court to sanction the idea that the assured is to run the peril of the agent strictly performing his duty. I am happy to be supported in this view by an authority cited for the plaintiffs, and on which the defendants' counsel have made no observation. It is Wing v. Harvey (sup.), which, by arrangement, was an original hearing before Knight Bruce and Turner, L. JJ., in which I and Mr. Glasse were counsel. There a life was insured in the Norwich office, to be vitiated if the assured went beyond certain limits. He went to Canada, beyond the limits; but the agent, knowing the fact, still annually accepted the premiums. I argued for the office that the agent exceeded his authority, and that he could not bind the office unless expressly authorised. But Knight Bruce, L. J., asked how the plaintiff was to know the limits of the agent's authority; and I ask that question here, or how are the public to know them? I cannot imagine anything more fatal to the interests of insurance offices; and in mercy to this and other offices I think I should refuse to accede to such an argument, because it would lead to the annihilation of a great portion of insurance agencies. Turner, L. J. said that the office did not know that the assured was beyond the limits, but the agent did; and both learned judges treated the knowledge of the agent as the knowledge of the office. (The Vice-Chancellor read passages from the judgment.) In that case the policy was void at the office's option, and would have become void, but for the non-communication of the fact of the assured going beyond the limits; but as it had been communicated to the agent it was treated as communicated to the principal. So here I treat Waddell's acts as the acts of the office; if he miscarried, the office has a remedy against him; but if I held this policy vitiated, because in a manner of which the assured is ignorant the agent goes beyond his authority, no insurance effected through an agent would be safe. The agent binds the company, and they can repudiate if he exceeds his limit before the event happens, and afterwards it is too late to set up the defence. It is impossible that an office can escape liability on grounds so frivolous. Upon every ground I condemn this defence, which ought never to have been set up, and has done the plaintiff much injustice, as he relied on the insurance. I think, however, he was wrong in coming to this court, and should have brought an action. There has been considerable delay, not attributable to this court; there is an interval between the answer in April 1866 and the plaintiff's affidavit in Sept. 1868, that is very great. Having raised these objections, fatal to the public and to the success of the office, and most unwisely taken, and frivolous and ridiculous in themselves, I fear I can only make a decree that they are bound to the terms of the policy, and must make reparation for all damage, with interest on the money. I should be glad if I could make them pay damages for the injury which this defence has caused to the plaintiff; it could not have originated with the respectable directors or solicitors, but the miserable officials. There must be a decree, with 5*l.* per cent. interest from the 10th Jan. after the fire. I would give 10*l.* per cent. if I could, with all costs of suit. As to the case in the Exchequer, I think that must have turned upon the usage at Liverpool; it has no application. I follow Wing v. Harvey (sup.).

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Uptons, Johnson, and Co.

Solicitors for the defendants, Eyre and Lawson.

V. C. JAMES'S COURT.

Reported by W. H. BENNET, and R. T. BOULT, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Saturday May 8.

THE KING OF HANOVER v. BANK OF ENGLAND.

Trustee Act 1850—Transfer of fund—Non-corporate body—New trustees.

A fund standing to the credit of a non-corporate body in the books of the Bank of England, ordered to be transferred into the names of new trustees, to be held by them upon the former trusts, and those declared by a certain law and convention of a foreign power.

This was a bill filed by the King and Crown Prince of Hanover, praying that a certain sum of 600,000*l.* standing in the books of the Governor and Company of the Bank of England to the credit of "The Lords of His Majesty's Royal Regency of Hanover" might be transferred into the names of the plaintiff and two of the defendants, the Duke of Cambridge and the Duke of Brunswick, to be held by them upon certain trusts declared by a law and convention affecting the revenue of the Kingdom of Hanover, and also that the dividends accrued since the last payment of same and those to accrue due until the transfer might be paid to the King of Hanover.

Sir Roundell Palmer, Q.C., and Eddis, in support of the application.

Cotton, Q. C., and Kekewich, for the Bank of England, mentioned that the "Royal Regency of Hanover" was not a corporate body in the sense applicable to such a body here, but was a fluctuating body of official authorities. It was true that the Bank of England had been in the habit of dealing with the fund and the dividends thereof under the authority of instruments which purported to have been issued under a seal belonging to the body as above named. The Bank, therefore, did not oppose the application should the court think proper to make the order, but they suggested that the court should appoint two new trustees under sections 32 and 35 of the Trustee Act 1850, and to direct them to transfer the fund. This they asked as a protection to the Bank of England, and which might prevent any question which might arise upon the construction of the Acts of Parliament under which the Bank was incorporated and acted.

Osborne Morgan for the other defendants.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said as there was no opposition, he would make the order in the terms proposed by the counsel for the bank. Two new trustees to be appointed, to be named by the royal personages interested in the dealing with the fund, and empowering and directing them to transfer the fund, and receive and pay over the past and future dividends.

Solicitors, Pemberton and Co.; Freshfields and Newman; Farrer, Ouvry, and Co.

Tuesday, June 29.

PLANT v. STOTT.

Injunction—Mines—Compensation for damage done—Preventing the working of adjoining coal mine.

The proprietors of a coal mine had so worked their mine by opening cuttings to draw off the water therein that they had caused the neighbouring and adjoining mine of the plaintiffs to be flooded, and from such openings the defendants had also abstracted coal from their neighbours' mine, and sold the same for their own benefit.

An injunction was granted to restrain the defendants from further proceeding; to stop up the existing openings and cuttings; from making another further opening which would have the effect complained of; for compensation for what damage had been sustained by the plaintiffs; and for an account of the value of the coal abstracted.

This was a bill filed by the plaintiffs, Thomas Plant, and others, against the defendants, James Stott and James Ashworth, under the circumstances and for the relief after mentioned.

The plaintiffs had been for the last six years before bill filed entitled to all the mines, veins, beds, and strata of coal and ironstone under certain lands called the Jackfields Farm, in the county of Stafford. They had worked this coal to a considerable extent, and had employed a large capital, and made large profits by such workings. The defendants were during the same period the owners of and worked other coal mines, under lands called the Banktop Lands, lying to the east and rise of the said Jackfields Farm.

There were several veins or seams of coal which ran continuously underneath both the Banktop lands, in the possession of the defendants, and the Jackfield land, in the possession of the plaintiffs, with an inclined slope or dip from the Banktop lands to the Jackfield lands.

There was in particular amongst such veins or seams one of valuable coal, called the Rowhurst Seam, which was a seam or vein of such a nature as to allow water to percolate and pass through it, but the stratum or upper boundary of the Rowhurst Seam which formed the roof, and also the stratum which formed the floor upon which the Rowhurst Seam rested were impervious to water—the said other seams or veins were generally of a like character, and had like roofs and floors. The water which entered the Rowhurst Seam on the Banktop lands percolated to the bottom of the same seam in the Jackfield lands. The plaintiffs and defendants had respectively large pumps and engines for raising the water which collected in their respective mines, and they had been in the habit of pumping out such water to the surface, and so getting rid of it.

In Nov. 1867, as alleged by the bill, the plaintiffs discovered that the defendants shortly prior to

Digitized by Google

March 1866, and for some time thereafter continued these workings from their Banktop Mine into and under parts of the Jackfield lands, and partly into the said Rowhurst Seam under the same lands, and excavated large quantities of coal the property of the plaintiffs from under the Jackfield lands, and sold and applied some of it to their own use. That the defendants in continuing the said workings into and under the plaintiffs' mines, opened up deep headings and artificial channels and communications leading from the defendants' workings into the excavations and workings made by defendants in the plaintiffs' land; that such workings within the plaintiffs' bounds were done secretly and without the knowledge or sanction of the plaintiffs; that by reason of such communication a large body of water flowed from the defendants' mines through the headings and channels into such excavations under the plaintiffs' land, and collected there in great quantities; that defendants had also made within their own mines cruts or openings, and channels or pipes, through both the plaintiffs' and defendants' mines, and particularly above the seam called the Rowhurst Seam, so as artificially to let large quantities of water, the contents of the overlaying seams, into the underlying seams or veins, and particularly into the Rowhurst Seam; that such cruts and openings had not been made for the purpose of properly working the coal in defendants' mines, but for the purpose of conducting the water from the upper seams into the lower seams, particularly into the Rowhurst Seam, and for the purpose of thereby drawing the water from the defendants' mines into the plaintiffs' mines; that this had caused much injury to the plaintiffs' property; that such water continually arose from the increases by the ordinary workings and getting out of coal by the defendants within their mines and colliery, and that, so long as cruts or openings, or channels or pipes existed, and no proper barrier was made below the defendants' mines and the plaintiffs' mines, the water arising from such ordinary workings would flow into plaintiffs' mines. That such cruts, or openings, channels, or pipes also increased the flow of water through the workings in the defendants' mines, and which water arose from such ordinary workings and getting out coal, and by means of the openings or communications made by the defendants' mines as aforesaid the plaintiffs' bounds and workings made by the defendants under the plaintiffs' land as aforesaid were deteriorated. That the collection of water by these means in the last-mentioned excavations or workings not only greatly increased the quantity of water that flowed into the plaintiffs' workings, and which had to be pumped out by the plaintiffs, but also prevented the plaintiffs from working the coal within their mines without danger, and rendered a large quantity of such coal valueless. That plaintiffs had lately been compelled to expend large sums in pumping out the water which the wrongful acts of the defendants had sent into plaintiffs' mines, and they would be obliged to continue such expense unless defendants were restrained as prayed by the bill.

The bill also alleged that the damage done by the defendants' acts by the quantity of water flowing in from defendants' workings was so great that the plaintiffs' workings were likely to be drowned out, and irreparable injury would be occasioned if the defendants were not restrained as prayed. That the defendants ought to be compelled to close up the openings or communications so made by them, and to make a proper barrier on their side of the said Rowhurst Seam, to prevent the water flowing through into the plaintiffs' mines.

The bill therefore prayed that the defendants, their agents, &c., might be restrained from further digging any coals or carrying any workings into or under the said Jackfield lands. That they might also be restrained from making any cruts, or openings, or channels, or pipes, or from doing any other acts to conduct water from any of the upper seams within their mines into the lower seams so as to send such water through such lower seams into the plaintiffs' mines. That defendants might also be ordered to stop up the openings and communications made by them from their mines into the plaintiffs' mines, and to prevent by sure and sufficient barriers the water conducted by such cruts, or openings, or channels, or pipes, into the lower seams from passing through such lower seams into plaintiffs' mines. For an injunction to restrain the defendants from getting more coal from said Banktop Colliery; and for an account and compensation.

The defendants denied many of these allegations, and evidence was entered into on both sides in support of their respective cases by surveyors, viewers, and others.

E. E. Kay, Q. C., and E. Chisholm Batten, for the plaintiffs, contended that a sufficient case had been made to entitle them to the injunctions prayed.

Little, Q.C., and W. W. Cooper, for the defendants, contended that although there might have been some degree of negligence in the mode of the defendants working the coal in their mines, still there was no animus furandi, and that the damage done was slight in degree, and the compensation must be proportionate.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said it was quite clear that the plaintiffs were entitled to the relief prayed by their bill. The defendants had not only injured the plaintiffs in their occupation of obtaining the coal from their own mine, but they had actually entered upon their neighbours' property, and obtained coal which in fact belonged to the plaintiffs, and sold it for their own benefit. This, of course, could not be allowed, and the injunction must go in the terms of the prayer of the bill. An account must also be directed of the full market value of the coal extracted. It appearing that the lease to the defendants of their mine would expire in five years' time, and that of the plaintiffs in eleven years, should the defendants obtain a renewal of their lease, they would, of course, be liable to a similar injunction. The plaintiffs would then have liberty to apply to the court. He should also, in addition to the usual costs, direct that the costs properly incurred by plaintiffs in ascertaining the openings in the defendants' mine which had caused the injurious flow of water into the plaintiffs' mine, should be paid by the defendants.

Injunction and decree accordingly.

Solicitors: Wedlake and Letts, for Keary and Son, Stoke-upon-Trent; Sale and Co., Manchester, for defendants.

Monday, Aug. 2.

Re PHENE'S TRUST.

Disappearance—Presumption of death.

A person who has not been heard of for seven years will be presumed to be dead at the end of such seven years, and to have lived during the whole of that period.

This was a petition presented by the administrator of the estate and effects of one Nicholas Phené Mill, who, had he survived the testator, Francis Phené, who died on the 5th Jan. 1861, would be entitled, as one of the nephews of the testator, to a distributive share of his estate.

Nicholas Phené Mill was born in the year 1829. He became a sergeant of marines in the American service. He had been in the habit of corresponding with his mother from time to time up to the 15th Aug. 1858. A letter from him to his mother of that date was proved to have been then written by him. This letter was dated at sea, on board the American ship Roanoke. It appeared by extracts from that ship's books that on the 16th June 1860, a sergeant of marines named Nicholas Mill, left that ship to join some port at Philadelphia. It was suggested that he had perished on his voyage to the latter place. It was certain that nothing was heard of him after the date of the letter to his mother before mentioned.

Francis Phené, the testator and uncle of the supposed deceased, died on the 5th Jan. 1861, and by his will bequeathed a certain sum of money arising from the residue of his estate to be divided amongst his nephews and nieces. If Nicholas Phené Mill survived the testator he was entitled to a share of this residue.

Amphlett, Q. C. and W. H. G. Bogshawe, for the petitioner, contended that the presumption of law was that a person who had not been heard of for seven years was alive during the whole of that period, and that his death had occured at the end of the seven years.

The Vice-Chancellor said he should have considered that the presumption was that the person was dead at the end of the seven years, but that evidence of the date of his actual death within that period was necessary to establish the fact that he had survived a particular person who was clearly proved to have died after the time when the person was last heard of, and within the seven years. He felt no difficulty about the identity of the party in the present case.

F. W. S. Everitt, contra, contended that such evidence was necessary.

C. J. Hill, for the trustees of the will.

G. O. Edwards and Langworthy, for parties who would take in the event of N. P. Mill dying in the lifetime of the testator.

Re Benham's Trusts, L. Rep. 4 Eq. 416; s. c. on appeal (overruling that decision), Dec. 6, 1867, MSS.;

Thomas v. Thomas, 2 Drew. & Sm. 298; 11 L. T. Rep. N. S. 471; were referred to.

The Vice-Chancellor said that he should have agreed with Rolt L. J., in Benham's Trusts on appeal, but for the decisions of Kindersley, V. C. and Malins, V.C. in the other cases cited; and that after those decisions he could not hold otherwise than that it must be presumed that N. P. Mill had survived the testator, and he must declare accordingly. He, however, added, that that part of the fund should be retained in court until next Michaelmas Term, to allow the parties interested an opportunity of taking the opinion of the Court of Appeal if they should think fit so to do.

Order accordingly.

Solicitors, A. C. Briant; M. Pope; Fielder and Co.; Gaussent.

COURT FOR DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES.

Reported by W. Leycester, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

June 2 and 3.

(Before Lord Penzance, J.O.)

St. Paul v. St. Paul and Farquhar (Queen's Proctor intervening.)

Dissolution suit—Intervention of Queen's Proctor—Neglect and conduct conducing to adultery—20 & 21 Vict. c. 85, s. 31.

Held that the wilful neglect or conduct conducing to adultery contemplated by the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85, s. 31, as constituting a bar to divorce is that which conduces to a woman's first lapse from virtue, and not that which occurs after she has committed adultery.

This was a husband's suit for the dissolution of his marriage on the ground of his wife's adultery with the co-respondent. A decree nisi was granted in the first instance, but the Queen's Proctor subsequently obtained leave to intervene, and charged the petitioner with collusion, connivance, conduct conducing to adultery, and suppression of material facts.

The parties were married in 1859, and cohabited first at Clifton, and subsequently at Maidenhead. Early in 1866 the respondent made the acquaintance of the co-respondent, Capt. Farquhar, while residing at Blarney, near Cork. About Easter the petitioner went over to see his wife at Blarney, and there was introduced to the co-respondent, who spent a few days with them by invitation. On the petitioner returning to England, Mrs. St. Paul went to the Isle of Man, where she gave birth to a child in Jan. 1867. As to the paternity of this child the petitioner admitted that he had expressed doubts before his wife's confinement, but they were removed by her explanations. She returned to Maidenhead with the petitioner after her confinement, but shortly afterwards went to visit his mother at Clifton. After she had been there some days she wrote to the petitioner that she had an offer of a return ticket as far as Dublin, and asking to be allowed to make use of it, in order that she might visit her father at Cork. In the same letter she stated that Capt. Farquhar was going to Ireland, and would act as her escort. The petitioner being anxious for business reasons that the respondent should see her father, consented on the condition that she should return from Cork to Bristol, and the respondent accordingly left Clifton with Capt. Farquhar on Feb. 24, 1867. The respondent and co-respondent slept together at Stafford that night, and when she arrived in Dublin she wrote to her husband to say that she should not be in Cork for a week, and requested that all letters and parcels might be forwarded to an hotel in Dublin. To this the petitioner returned the following answer:—

27th Feb. 1867.

My dear Lucy,—I cannot help saying I am vexed much that you did not go straight to Cork as intended. You were well aware a word in season might have been beneficial in a certain matter. You would have been in ample time, since I have not as yet heard from father. I shall blame you greatly if the affair miscarries. If you knew of this before starting, you ought to have informed me. If, on the other hand, this is a new scheme, surely you ought in your letter to have told me with whom you are staying. If at a friend's house I might not see so much objection; but at an hotel, to allow other people to incur expense, is very wrong. I of course assume you are not reckless enough to incur such expense yourself. You keep far too much back from me. I cannot see why (as you are allowed every liberty) you should do so. I had before the receipt of your letter posted one to Cork. I have consequently been obliged to write to your father to explain why you were not with him. Please go at once to him on receipt of this letter. All letters will be forwarded.

Digitized by Google

A few days afterwards he received the following communication from his wife:

Reynolds's Hotel, Dublin, 3rd March 1867.

My dear Albert,—Papa is here, and means to write to you to-night, and I scarcely know if the subject of his letter will surprise you; I think not. When I said good-bye to you on Sunday evening, I meant it then, and I mean it now, to be final. I shall never live with you again. You will have as little to do with me as though I never existed, or that I was dead. This, I feel sure will be some consolation to you, and will enable you to bring your bachelor habits and menage to great perfection; and so I pray you will grant my last request—the necessary separation. This can be soon arranged, in a few days, and so the whole matter settled, unless you really require time for any consideration. Let me hear from you as soon as possible, as any unnecessary delay here will be inconvenient to me, and I presume in this matter I may look for as much courtesy from you as you would vouchsafe to a perfect stranger.

Upon receiving this letter the petitioner went immediately to Dublin, and saw his wife in company with her father. A reconciliation was effected, and Captain Farquhar dined in the hotel with the petitioner and his wife. The petitioner left that night, but Captain Farquhar remained and slept with the respondent. The petitioner stated that when he left he was under the impression that Captain Farquhar had gone back to Newbridge barracks, where the regiment was quartered. He discovered next day that a correspondence was still being carried on between his wife and Captain Farquhar, and he offered to continue cohabitation if she would give it up. but she refused. After further communication, and on receiving a written promise that no damages would be claimed, the respondent and co-respondent confessed the adulterous intercourse. The evidence on behalf of the Queen's Proctor established the fact that adultery had been committed as early as January 1866, and it was also proved that after the suit had been commenced the co-respondent had offered the petitioner 1000*l.* if he would withdraw the petition, which he had indignantly refused to do. The case was heard before Lord Penzance on June 2nd and 3rd.

The Attorney-General (Dr. Spinks and Archibald with him), for the Queen's Proctor, referred to Dering v. Dering and Blakeley (Queen's Proctor intervening), L. Rep. 1 P. & D. 531.

H. Giffard, Q.C. (McIntyre and E. J. Dunn with him), for the respondent.

Pritchard for the co-respondent.

LORD PENZANCE, J.O.—The facts of this case force upon the court a very difficult and very critical duty. I may say, at the outset, that no one who has heard the evidence can doubt that if Mr. St. Paul has suffered both by mental anxiety and by the costs incurred in these proceedings, he has only himself to blame. Because, whatever view the court may take of the legal result of his conduct, nobody can doubt that he was wanting in decision, wanting in firmness, wanting in a manly assertion of his own rights, and I should say also wanting in judgment with regard to the facts that were brought to his cognisance and the course that he ought to take. It is these deficiencies on his own part that have led to these proceedings. Turning from the petitioner to the respondent, it is equally plain from the evidence that she was a very self-willed determined woman, who cared little or nothing for her husband from the outset, who was determined to have her own way, and who appears, as far as I can judge, to have obtained a sort of moral ascendency over her husband, which enabled her to have that way whenever she was so minded. The Queen's Proctor, instigated, it is said, by the co-respondent, or, if not by him, by his father, who wishes to stand in the way of this decree being made absolute, has brought before the court various facts and made certain charges; and I may say, in passing, that it seems to me to be no wrong whatever that a co-respondent or a respondent should furnish to the Queen's Proctor these facts in cases of this kind. It is for the Queen's Proctor when he has the facts to submit them to Her Majesty's Attorney-General, and it is then for the Attorney-General to consider and direct whether in the interests of the public the expense ought to be incurred of proving the facts with a view of stopping the decree. To my mind, therefore, it matters little or nothing from what source the information came. I have to deal with the facts as they are proved and to ascertain to the best of my ability whether they support the Queen's proctor's pleas. The substance of the complaint against the petitioner is twofold. The first complaint against him is that he was guilty of conduct conducing to his wife's adultery. The language of the statute is that the court may withhold a decree where it is satisfied that the petitioner has been guilty of "such wilful neglect or misconduct as has conduced to the adultery." Now that is a most salutary provision. It is salutary as regards the public, because it is some safeguard against a man first throwing his wife into temptation, first allowing her to be exposed to the addresses of other men, and then afterwards casting her aside. But it is also a measure of fairness to the wife herself, because if a wife can come to this court and say, "Notwithstanding that I have sinned, my sins really have been brought about, or very much helped forward, by the carelessness, neglect, and indifference of my husband," that is a matter which clearly ought be taken into consideration, even in favour of the wife, who is herself a sinner. But this is very delicate ground, and the court must be very careful in applying the provision of the section that it is able to see its way pretty clearly to the conclusion that the conduct of the husband did really conduce to the adultery of the wife before refusing a decree. The statute says "conduce to the adultery," but in reflecting upon those words of the statute the conclusion at which I have arrived is this: That the Legislature did not mean that a husband should be deprived of his remedy if his conduct had conduced to any particular act of adultery after his wife's first fall from virtue, but that it meant that his remedy should be withheld from him if he had so acted as to bring about the fall of his wife or the loss of her virtue. What the Legislature appears to me to be pointing at under the word adultery is the lapse from virtue of the wife, and I think the intention was that the husband who had led to that lapse by his own conduct should not afterwards take advantage of it. But it is quite consistent with that that a case might arise in which a husband would be perfectly blameless as to his wife's adultery in the first instance, and that after she had established her adulterous intercourse with another man, the two together might throw dust in his eyes, and his conduct might appear more or less neglectful. It seems to me that the neglect which is followed by a subsequent act of adultery after the loss of virtue by the wife is not the neglect which the statute meant; it must be that neglect which conduced to the fall of the wife. Now the circumstances of this case bring that distinction into prominent relief. The lady went in 1865 or the beginning of 1866 to stay at a hydropathic establishment, about seven miles from Cork, where her father resided. It was at her father's instance that she went to this place; and, looking to the sort of life that the petitioner and his wife had led—her determination to be as little with him as possible—the want of affection that appeared to exist between them, at any rate on her part, and the little control that he had over her, it is impossible to say that allowing her to go to that hydropathic establishment, avowedly for the sake of her health, was a matter that can be imputed to the petitioner as an act of wilful neglect. She goes there, and the court fortunately has a date from the mouth of the groom of the co-respondent which fixes the period of her guilt; it does not, indeed, fix the first time, but it fixes a time at which this adulterous intimacy undoubtedly subsisted. The groom says: "About January 1866 I saw the respondent go to the co-respondent's room at the barracks. After that she used to come with him once or twice a week. Sometimes she came on horseback. She always used to come with the co-respondent. She used to go into his room and remain alone with him for hours." It is quite plain, therefore, that in January 1866 this adulterous intercourse was thoroughly established, and that so far as the wife's loss of virtue is concerned, whenever it first took place, it had taken place long before the period which is afterwards spoken to as the date of the husband's visit. The husband never went to the hydropathic establishment until Easter 1866. Well, what took place? The wife, carrying on at that time this illicit intercourse, persuaded the husband to ask the co-respondent over to the hydropathic establishment as his guest. He did so, and the co-respondent, I think, made himself agreeable to him and offered to take him over to his rooms at the barracks to see some races or some other amusement that was going on. They also used to play billiards together and were apparently on friendly terms. The court has very little doubt that then, at that very time, whenever opportunity offered, the same adulterous intercourse was going on. But it is impossible up to this period to put one's finger upon anything that the husband had either done or omitted to do which led to the wife's misconduct. He had done nothing and omitted to do nothing. His position was that of a man who was hoodwinked for the time—who had no reason to suspect anything, because those who saw the lady and the co-respondent at the time, even the nurse who was constantly in the room with her and living with her, declare that they never saw any signs of familiarity between these two people. Therefore, there really was nothing to show the husband at that time that anything wrong was going on. It is said that he allowed her to go out riding with the co-respondent, but on turning to the evidence of the groom, I find he says he only took the horses over to the hydropathic establishment once while the husband was there, and the husband swears that it was so; that the horses were brought there once, but that he rode out with them, and was by his wife's side the whole day. Therefore, carefully looking at the evidence at this period of the transaction, the court is really unable to discover anything in the charge against the petitioner as to neglect or misconduct. The subsequent history of the case is no doubt very different. In Easter 1866, this visit of the husband was paid. The lady remained at the hydropathic establishment until the month of July following. She then writes to him and says she wishes to go to the Isle of Man I put the question to him and he swears positively that he objected to her going to the Isle of Man. There does not seem to have been any reason for it. The reason that she assigned was that they were badly off, and the Isle of Man was a cheap place; but to the Isle of Man she went, and after she had been there some time, she came back to the mainland and went down to Maidenhead where her husband was living. She then returned to the Isle of Man, and after she had got back, as far as I can gather dates correctly, the co-respondent seems to have come and stayed there three or four days. Now, to show the footing the parties were on at that time, the husband had "asked" her (that was his expression), to be allowed to come and see her at the Isle of Man, and she refused. Well, he seemed to have acquiesced in that refusal, and accordingly went to spend his Christmas with his relatives at Clifton. When he returned to business he again wrote to her saying, "Your confinement is about to take place, and may I come and see you?" She answers by telegraph, "Yes, you may." Thereupon he did so. He arrived a week before her confinement, and stayed with her during her confinement. Now the court is at a loss to see any other object in the petitioner going there at that time, except the pleasure of indulging his affection and being with his wife. She was about to undergo her confinement, and it appears to the court that the petitioner had a most praiseworthy motive in going and remaining by her side on the occasion. When he got there he said at first that he did not learn that Capt. Farquhar had been in the island. It afterwards turned out upon better reflection that he did learn the co-respondent had been there, but then it came out incidentally. It was said he had been there with some other gentlemen, and it arose upon the question how some wine came into the house, which the wife explained in that way. Well, up to this time, the court must bear in mind that there is not a tittle of evidence to show that Mr. St. Paul knew of the adultery that had taken place at the hydropathic establishment while the respondent was resident there. Here is not a tittle of evidence to show that any familiarity had been seen or known to have taken place between her and the co-respondent. We now know that there was flagrant, open adultery carried on from week to week, from day to day, the lady visiting the barracks, where this man lived; but the petitioner did not know that, and the mere fact that she told him that Capt. Farquhar and some other gentlemen had come over to the island, and had called and asked for refreshment, which led her to send for some wine, in the then state of the petitioner's knowledge, is not such a fact as, it seems to me, ought to have led him to take any definite steps with a view to his wife quitting the Isle of Man, or dropping the acquaintance of Capt. Farquhar. She was confined in Jan. 1867; she came over to England on the 18th Feb. in that year. She went down to Maidenhead with her husband. The next thing that happened is that on Sunday, the 24th Feb., or the day before, she announced to her husband her intention of going to Clifton, so he says. She seems never to have been easy and at rest when she was at home at Maidenhead. He combated the idea of going to Clifton, but ultimately yielded, and then she said she had had a return ticket given to her to go to Dublin; and that she should also like to go to Cork and see her father who was said to be unwell. There was likewise a pecuniary matter involved in this proposed visit to Ireland, some bill that had to be renewed or taken up, or an account guaranteed, and the husband was interested in her going to see her father. Well, the court, bearing in mind the position of the parties at that time, that the wife was carrying on this adulterous intercourse, and wanting to get away from her husband in order that she might consort with the co-respondent, and that the petitioner was ignorant of all that, the court can understand perfectly well that the wife might wheedle him into consenting to the proposed arrangement, or if she did not wheedle him into consenting, that she might be strong enough of her own will to force hin into it. His representation is, that he consented reluctantly to her going. She did not seem to have made any concealment as to Capt. Farquhar accompanying her, because she said that Capt. Farquhar happened to be going to Ireland at that time, and that he had consented to escort her. Now no one can doubt that the arrangement by which this young lady was to travel down by the night mail to Holyhead with Capt. Farquhar was a very imprudent one; but supposing that the husband saw no reason to suspect Capt. Farquhar at that time, it is not an imprudence of that kind that would lead the court at once to come to the conclusion that he had been guilty of wilful neglect or misconduct. However, I have already pointed out what the court has to inquire into at this period of the case is not whether there was neglect or misconduct, but whether there was connivance; and in that aspect of the case everything that fell from all three of the parties, every expression used by the wife, by the respondent, and by the co-respondent, appeared to me to negative the idea of a connivance. She was making excuses; she was pretending about a return ticket; she was invoking her father's illness; she was raising this matter about the bill, all for the purpose of deluding her husband, and he was no doubt more or less deluded by it. When I say "more or less," I mean that a more vigilant man, a man of stronger temperament would have probably burst the sort of veil that was thrown over this relation, and would have seen his way clearly to the thing that really existed. She went to Dublin, and there several letters passed between her and the petitioner. He thought she was going straight through to Cork. She writes from Reynolds's Hotel, Dublin, and tells him that she is stopping there; upon which he writes and expresses his displeasure at it, and, in doing so, makes use of an expression about the expense which very strongly attracted the attention of the court in the first instance. He says, "Surely you ought to have told me with whom you were staying" (that is when he finds that she is staying in Dublin). "If you knew before you started of this" (that she was going to stop at Dublin) "you ought to have informed me. If, on the other hand, this is a new scheme, surely you ought in your letter to have told me with whom you are staying—if a friend's private house, I might not see so much objection; but at an hotel, to allow other people to incur expense is very wrong, for I of course assume that you are not reckless enough to incur such expense yourself." The natural suspicion that crosses the mind of the court on reading that passage is this: He knew she had been there with Capt. Farquhar; and who else did he think was paying the expenses except this man with whom she had gone? But that may not have been, I think, what he meant, although it is open to that construction. The court ought to see its way very clearly before it comes to an adverse conclusion on that matter, and when I look at this letter by the light of his subsequent conduct, I see nothing to induce me to believe that he at that time knew that she was under the charge of Capt. Farquhar, and that he was paying her expenses, although, of course, he might have suspected it, and probably did suspect it, from what he afterwards said. He goes to Dublin, and then took place those various meetings that have been referred to at length in the evidence. The sum and substance of them is this: that his wife had before he got there pressed upon her father the necessity for a separation—that appears most distinctly from the father's letter, written at the time. It is equally plain from the father's statement, and from the statement of the petitioner himself, that he opposed a separation. He went to the father, and with the father he went to the hotel and saw his wife. The account he gives of that interview sheds a pretty strong light on the temperament and nature of this lady, and the terms they were upon. The father said that he found upon consideration, and after talking with his son-in-law, that there was no need for a separation, upon which the wife called him an "old weathercock," and got very angry with him for having changed his opinion. When he burst out crying, she said he was an old fool, and that his tears were very near his eyes. That seems to have been a somewhat boisterous meeting, and in the course of it no doubt the petitioner ascertained, by finding a great coat in the room, that Capt. Farquhar had been there. Afterwards he saw Capt. Farquhar. The question is upon all that took place between them, was there anything to lead the court to the conclusion that the petitioner either knew of the adultery, or so strongly suspected the adultery of his wife on sufficient grounds, that he could be said to have connived at or acquiesced in it? It seems to me that the whole tendency of the evidence is the other way. He wanted her back—he was averse to a separation. The father and the co-respondent both tried to persuade him, and succeeded in doing so, that nothing wrong had taken place. He went down stairs to ascertain whether his wife and the co-respondent had been living at the hotel as man and wife, and was told that they had not, that they had separate rooms; and he tried also to ascertain whether the co-respondent had undertaken to pay for his wife, and could get no satisfactory answer about that. The result of the whole is, that there was a good deal of weakness on his part and want, as I said before, of proper spirit and determination in the matter, but I do not think that there was connivance. Well, then, the rest of the history is soon told. He gets his wife back to London, and endeavours, but in vain, to withdraw her from this man, the co-respondent. He more and more suspects her guilt, and charges her with it. At first she admits it, and declares that she will give him the proofs. Afterwards she retracts the confession, and leads him to believe that there was no guilt; and then at last there comes the meeting at Maidenhead, where she and the co-respondent openly and unblushingly tell him that they had been guilty over and over again, placing the first occasion of their guilt at Stafford. Now, here again, if I am asked whether there was connivance—whether all this was taking place with the consent of the husband, I say here is a letter of the co-respondent written on the 8th May, which dissipates the possibility of any such conclusion; because it is an answer to a letter in which the petitioner had charged this man with being guilty with his wife, and in terms desired that he would cease all correspondence with her; and here is the manner in which that communication was answered:—"Cambridge-house, Piccadilly, May 8, 1867. Dear Sir,—I am only just in receipt of your letter dated Maidenhead, 6th May. In answer I beg to say I have no intention to explain what you ask, as I have nothing to explain. For, as an intimate acquaintance with your wife and yourself, and until you give me some reason to withhold correspondence in a friendly way with your wife, I shall always act as I have hitherto done. I can but ascribe your ridiculous epistle as an after-dinner ebullition of temper, and as such I treat it. If your lucid memory had been of any service to you when you penned your epistle, you would have remembered that in Dublin (of which time you speak) you asked me to assist you in inducing your wife to return to England. I consider your conduct somewhat strange, especially as you yourself had made arrangements for me to escort your wife to Ireland. Did not I treat the insinuation in your letter with the ridicule it deserves, I should take matters into my own hands." A high-handed impudent letter, in which the co-respondent is repudiating the slightest insinuation against him, and openly telling the petitioner that inasmuch as he has nothing with which to charge him, nothing which he can put on paper and prove, he shall continue to carry on his correspondence with his wife. It is impossible, unless the court believes that letter to be part of a plan or a scheme to defeat the ends of justice, or to cause a false complexion to be put upon this case—treating that as genuine, it is impossible to imagine that the husband who wrote the letter to which that is an answer, was all the time conniving at the wife's adultery. It seems to me, therefore, that upon the whole facts of this case, neither the charge of collusion nor connivance has been made out against this gentleman. As I have said before, there was much in the case that the court might reprehend. There was much in his conduct in 1867 which, if it had been followed for the first time by his wife's adultery, might have led to a very different result to that at which the court now arrives. There was much in his conduct in the spring of 1867—the visit to Dublin, his conduct at Dublin, and even in his subsequent conduct, which, if it had led to the first adultery and loss of virtue by his wife, might have induced the court to come to the conclusion that the wife's sin had been caused by the husband's neglect or carelessness; but bearing in mind the respondent's adultery, if not seduction, the real loss of virtue by the wife was a whole year before this, of course I can only look upon the matter in this light, that the two people who were principally concerned successfully contrived to throw dust in the eyes of a very weak and not very wise man. It only remains for the court to state what its finding is in the several issues which the Queen's Proctor has put forward. His Lordship then went through the several pleas and found that the petitioner had not been guilty of collusion, connivance, the suppression of material facts, or of conduct conducing to the adultery of the respondent, but added that the Queen's Proctor had done right in bringing the matter before the court.

Attorneys for the petitioner, Messrs. Purkis and Co.

Attorneys for the co-respondent, Messrs. Chilton and Co.

COURT OF BANKRUPTCY.

Reported by A. A. DORIA and JOHN FONBLANQUE, Esqrs. Barristers-at-Law.

Monday, Aug. 30.

(Before Mr. Commissioner WINSLOW.)

Re EVANS and EVANS.

B.A. 1861, sect. 192—Deed of assignment—Inequality—Partnership-deed—Computation of assents.

The trustees of a deed of assignment made by two partners contracted with certain of the creditors to deal with both the joint and separate estate of the debtors in such a manner as to pay all the creditors, both joint and separate, 5s. in the pound; and creditors were induced by the prospect so held out to them to assent to the deed. From the accounts annexed to the deed, it appeared that if this contract were carried into effect the joint creditors would gain an advantage over the separate creditors of both partners, and the separate creditors of one partner an advantage against those of the other:

Held, that such a deed could not be sustained against an adjudication in bankruptcy against the debtors.

The facts are set forth in the judgment.

Mr. Commissioner WINSLOW.—This is an application on behalf of the trustees of a deed of assignment made by the above-named debtors, to dismiss a petition for adjudication of bankruptcy against them. The grounds of the application are that the petition was presented after the execution by the debtors of a deed of assignment of their estate to trustees for their joint and separate creditors which has been duly registered, and that the deed being binding on all the creditors, the petition should be dismissed. Very many objections to the validity of the deed were made on behalf of the petitioning creditor, but I think it sufficient to express an opinion with regard to one only. That objection is, that some of the creditors were induced to assent to the deed by the prospect of obtaining an unfair advantage over other creditors. The deed being dated the 14th May, the trustees, before the deed was registered, entered into contracts to sell a portion of the estate, both joint and separate, and arranged to collect and realise a second portion, and then they, in the month of July, contracted to sell the remaining, or third, portion to the debtors themselves for a sum of 12,500*l.*, or such further sum as should be sufficient, together with the proceeds of the first and second portions of the estate, to pay all the creditors, joint and separate, 5*s.* in the pound by certain instalments. This was proposed at a meeting of creditors, and, it is said, agreed to by the creditors present with only one dissentient. The accounts, filed by the debtors as required by the Act of 1868, show the estates of the debtors divisible under the deed to be as follows: The joint debts amount to 92,452*l.*, and the joint estate to 15,815*l.*, or sufficient to pay about 3*s.* in the pound, after deducting expenses. The separate creditors of J. C. Evans amount to 12,215*l.*, and his separate estate to 3522*l.*, or about 4*s.* 6*d.* or 5*s.* in the pound, and the separate creditors of R. P. Evans amount to 10,395*l.*, and the separate estate to 768*l.*, or less than 1*s.* 6*d.* in the pound. It is manifest that by this contract for a sale to the debtors, if it were carried into effect, the joint creditors would obtain a greater advantage than the separate creditors of J. C. Evans, and the separate creditors of R. P. Evans a still greater advantage than the other classes of creditors, and the evidence shows that creditors were induced to assent to the deed by the existence of this contract. It is contended on behalf of the petitioning creditor that the registration of a deed, which is obtained by the inducement of an unequal advantage given to a class of creditors is invalid, upon the same principle as it would be if the advantage were obtained by a single creditor. This must very much depend upon whether the assents of the separate creditors can be counted as against those of the joint creditors, and thus bind them; and this again depends upon the manner in which the assents to a deed are in the case of partners to be computed. Notwithstanding that there have been so many deeds registered under the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act 1861, there has not, so far as I am aware, been any direct determination of this important point by any Superior Court. It is a point which it must have been of the greatest importance in many cases to ascertain, but it could not be judicially determined before registration, and the only thing the parties could do was to obtain a sufficient number of assents to render the deed binding, whatever might be the mode of computation, a course which necessarily involved great additional expense. It has always appeared to me desirable that there should be some provision by which a judicial determination in such cases could be obtained, the expense being paid, if necessary, out of the court funds, and the same observation applies to matters which, though of constant recurrence, and always giving rise to difficulties, yet are not sufficiently important in any particular case to render it worth the while of any individual suitor to go to the expense of having them determined.

But although the mode of computing the assents has not been directly decided, yet it would appear to follow as a consequence upon the principles laid down in Ex parte Glen, L Rep. 1 Ch. App. 670, and Tomlin v. Dutton, L. Rep. 3 Q. B. 466, 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 815, namely, that one of two partners cannot register a deed between himself and his separate creditors alone, but must include the joint creditors, and that two or more partners must in like manner include each of their separate creditors. The 192nd section makes no distinction, the words are, "a majority in number representing three-fourths in value of the creditors of such debtor," shall assent to or approve of the deed, and the word "creditors" there means the joint and separate creditors, it follows that such creditors must be included in the computation. Then there is no provision for counting each class by itself, but the majority must be the majority of the whole. If that be so, then the members of one class are affected by the assents of members of another class, and a majority obtained by the promise of some advantage to creditors of a class which is not shared equally by other classes, can no more be supported than a majority in the case of a debtor not in partnership, obtained by an undue advantage given to any of the creditors. One case will show the way in which this works. The executors of a former partner of the debtors have assented to the deed as creditors on the two separate estates for a sum of about 10.000*l.*, and they will be entitled under the arrangement to additional dividends, amounting to 4*s.* in the pound, whereas, if they were creditors on the joint estate, the additional dividend would only be 2*s.* in the pound; which would make a difference of about 1000*l.* I am of opinion that a majority so obtained cannot be supported, and that the petitioning creditor is not bound by this deed. It is said that the arrangement was made by the trustees after the execution of the deed by the debtors, and that they cannot be affected by the act of the trustees, but the debtors are parties to the arrangement, and are the purchasers from the trustees, and it would be a mischievous precedent to allow a bonus of this kind to be concealed under the disguise of a purchase by the debtor or his friends of his property. I do not wish it to be supposed that there is any evidence in the present case of a desire to do what was unfair. The trustees, probably considered they were making a good bargain for the creditors, but the principle, if allowed, would be undoubtedly the means of working great injustice in other cases. The deed not being duly registered, the motion to dismiss the petition for adjudication must be dismissed.

Application refused.

Election Petitions.

Reported by F. O. CRUMP, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

NORTHALLERTON ELECTION PETITION.

April 12, 13, 14, and 15.

(Before WILLES, J.)

Scrutiny—Procedure—Bribery—Intimidation—Influence—Promises—Evidence.

Where several points are reserved on a scrutiny, and the scrutiny, allowing that all the votes concerning which decision was reserved in favour of the petition, nevertheless is abortive, it is open to the judge to withhold altogether his decision at his discretion.

It was alleged against the respondent H., that he bribed personally by promising the wife of a voter land and a cow if her husband voted for him. This was denied by the respondent.

Held, that under such circumstances it must be assumed that the wish of the woman was father to the thought, and that she construed the ordinary politeness of a candidate towards the womankind in the house to be an assent not to anything she asked for, but to something that she had very strongly in her mind a desire to get.

It was attempted to prove that a promise had been made to a ragman by an agent that he should have his rags; and general evidence was given of various promises as to land.

Held, that in deciding upon such evidence the judge ought to have reasonable assurance that there really was a bribe held out, or promise of some particular benefit to the voter in case he voted or abstained from voting; and he ought to be sure that general, and very often exaggerated commendations of the wealth and liberality and other qualities of the candidate have not been tortured by the particular witness into a promise of some special benefit for himself.

Everything is corrupt which has a tendency to influence a man's mind with reference to mere lucre.

An unsuccessful attempt to intimidate will defeat an election.

It was alleged that C., a member of the congregation of a dissenting minister, told the latter that he should give up his pew unless the minister voted for the respondent.

Held, that had this been made out, it would have been intimidation within the 5th section of 17 & 18 Vict. c. 102.

Where the agency of any person is disputed, and there is a scrutiny, it should be put forward prominently in the course of the scrutiny, and not left vague, to be considered by the judge subsequently.

This was a petition against the return of Mr Hutton.

For the petitioners there appeared O'Brien, Serjt., and Hugh Shield.

And for the respondent O'Malley, Q. C., and Sleigh, Serjt.

The following are the cases which arose on the scrutiny:—

THOMPSON'S AND STEVENSON'S CASES.

Agreement by voters to pair off—Fraudulent contrivance.

It was agreed between two voters of different politics that neither would vote. Late on the polling day it was falsely represented to one of them that the other had voted and he accordingly went and voted.

By the 5th section of the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 102, anyone who shall by any fraudulent device or contrivance . . . compel, induce, or prevail upon any voter, either to give or to refrain from giving his vote at an election, shall be deemed to have committed the offence of undue influence:

Held, that pairing amongst voters is not contrary to law, and that there did not appear to have been a fraudulent contrivance within the above section:

Semble, the device or contrivance must be one by which a man is prevented from voting or induced to vote contrary to his opinions.

Two voters, named John Thompson and James Stephenson were employed together, and on the morning of the election, not wishing to lose their day's labour, they agreed, it was said, to pair off, Stephenson being in favour of Johns and Thompson in favour of Hutton. Stephenson kept his promise, and Thompson, O'Brien, Serjt., said, would have done so also, but about two or three o'clock he was called upon by three or four men, who, representing falsely and fraudulently that Stephenson had voted, got Thompson to vote for Mr. Hutton. He called attention to the 5th section of 17 & 18 Vict. c. 102, in which are the words, "who shall by abduction, duress, or any fraudulent device or contrivance, impede, prevent, or otherwise interfere with the free exercise of the franchise, or shall thereby compel, induce, or prevail upon any voter, either to abstain from voting or to vote." It was a fraudulent and false pretence that Stephenson had voted that induced or prevailed upon Thompson to vote.

Digitized by Google

O'Malley said it was not under the head of objections as a fraudulent device.

WILLES, J.—Is there any precedent for this, Brother O'Brien?

O'Brien, Serjt., was not aware there was a precedent, but he hoped his Lordship would not hesitate to make one.

WILLES, J. said he should hesitate very much. Although he was prepared to go as far as he could under that section, he understood that the fraudulent contrivance under the section must be a fraudulent contrivance by which a man was prevented from voting, or induced to vote contrary to his political opinions. He had heard of many exaggerations and rumours in electioneering matters, but he had not heard of a single case of that description brought before a committee on elections.

O'Brien, Serjt. put his claim forward on the ground that there had been an agreement not to vote, and the persons who induced Thompson to poll were ware of it.

In the course of a long conversation on the case, it was admitted that the vote tendered was legal, and his Lordship considered that the case was one of a variety in which the man so voting might be regarded as a shifty fellow, but could not legally be punished for his breach of promise. His Lordship agreed to accept the evidence, and if by-and-by the vote should come to decide the election he would ask the counsel to give him further information on the case.

Stephenson and Thompson were then called, and when the latter was giving evidence as to the manner in which he recorded his vote, his Lordship stated that it brought to his mind the case of Sir Frederick Thesiger, where a voter when asked for whom he voted said, "Sir Frederick Thesiger be ——," and before he could give utterance to the curse he intended to utter it was transferred into a blessing, and the vote entered on the poll-book for Sir Frederick Thesiger. That vote turned the election, and was kept on the poll-book before the Parliamentary committee. His Lordship, however, was not satisfied as to the vote in this case, and put a query for after consideration on his notes. He thought there had been a contrivance, but not a fraudulent contrivance under the Act. He gave it as his opinion that pairing off amongst voters was not recognised, and a breach of any such agreement was merely a matter of honour.

JOHNSTON'S CASE.

Residence.

A voter lived at York, but rented a farm in the borough in which he allowed his sister to live. He had rooms at the farm, and owned part of the furniture, paid the rent, and visited the house three or four times a year:

Held, a good vote.

The vote given by George Johnston, who has a farm at Brompton, was questioned, on the ground that he resided for the most part at York. Evidence was given by John Scurr, one of his servants, who said that the farm at Brompton was kept by a sister of his master, and that his master visited it three or four times a year. The voter was called. He said:

He was a legalised citizen of the United States, where he had some property. He lived at York, but had a farm at Brompton, where his sister lived. He paid for the rent of his farm, and allowed his sister to live on the farm for the benefit of her health. He had rooms at the farm, and he owned part of the furniture. The man Scurr managed the farm, and witness paid him his wages. His sister was a widow; when her husband was alive he managed the farm, but did it for his own pleasure, and paid no rent. His nephew occasionally managed the farm now.

WILLES, J. said it was quite as much a residence as that of a nobleman who had a lodge in the Highlands.

The vote was allowed.

It is doubtful whether non-residence after the 31st July is a disqualification. Votes will be retained where the non-residence was before the 31st July, and was not dealt with by the revising barrister.

O'Brien, Serjt. took another class of objections—that of non-resident voters whose names had been retained on the register by neglect of the overseers. These votes he objected to under the Registration Act, because if they had their qualification on the 31st July, and parted with it after that time, they were not entitled to rank as voters.

WILLES, J. pointed out that the decisions given in such cases had been inconsistent, and he referred to the Cambridge case, where it was decided that if a man was non-resident before the 31st July, so that his name might have been struck off by the revising barrister, such votes should be retained. The decisions of committees were that non-residents after the 31st July might be retained, but there appeared to be some inconsistent decisions as to non-residents before the 31st July. On this subject he had consulted with Blackburn, J., but had not had an opportunity of seeing Martin, B. on the question. It might turn out worth considering by and bye. Serjt. O'Brien's contention was that the fact of being wrongfully upon the register on the 31st July could not be a reason why a voter should obtain an advantage which he would not obtain were he rightfully on the register at the time, and afterwards lost his qualification.

In a subsequent case, that of Francis Barker, it was contended that the vote was invalid because the house he held at Romanby had been vacated on the 22nd July. One witness called by O'Brien, Serjt. said, however, that Barker came from Leeds to Northallerton in October last. Francis Barker, who at first could not be found, was at last put in the witness-box, and he admitted that he had left his house on the 22nd July, and had afterwards worked in Leeds for three months, and then came back to Northallerton in October.

WILLES, J. said this raised the question as to non-residence before the 31st July, and he resolved upon reserving his decision, but said his impression at present was against the distinction between non-residence before and after the 31st July.

No decision was given, the scrutiny proving abortive.

Digitized by Google

Residence by a wife.

A vote where the wife only resided in the house sustained.

With regard to a voter named Joseph Bilton, it appeared that Bilton had gone to Lanchester as a platelayer; but it transpired in cross-examination that his wife lived in the house for which he voted, and WILLES, J. observed that the objection must fail, and that committees had retained votes on far less reasonable grounds. Residence by a wife had been construed to be rightful residence.

The vote was retained.

Parochial relief.

The receipt of relief after the 31st July, and before the election, incapacitates.

It appeared with reference to the class of voters incapacitated by reason of their receiving parochial relief, that some of them had received relief during the qualifying year, between July 1867 and July 1868, and others received relief between the 31st Aug. and the time of voting.

WILLES, J. observed that his present impression was that, with respect to relief received before the 31st July nothing could be made of that on the part of the petitioner; but with respect to relief received between the 31st July and the date of election, that might be relied upon as a legal incapacity.

ROBERT SMITH'S CASE.

Cowhouse and land—Separated by fields.

A vote was claimed in respect of a cowhouse and land, the cowhouse, however, being quite cut off from the land by intervening fields. The revising barrister disallowed the vote:

Held, that the decision was right.

In this case Robert Smith wanted a reversal of a decision by the revising barrister. He has a cowhouse and some land, and he had claimed a vote in respect to his occupation under the old Reform Act, but as the cowhouse and the land are separated by intervening fields, Smith's vote was not allowed by the revising barrister, and it was refused for Mr. Johns at the election.

O'Malley contended that there was no right of way across the fields, and that the claim could not be sustained.

WILLES, J. thought the revising barrister was right in his decision, because the house and the land were so far separated that the one part of the qualification was of no use to the other.

HUNSLEY'S CASE.

Parochial relief.

A voter's wife and children were in the workhouse, and the wife had committed adultery:

Held, that this was a good answer as far as concerned the wife, but not as regarded the children.

Objection was taken to the vote of Peter Hunsley, who had supported the respondent, and whose wife and children were said to have been in the workhouse at the time of the election. The answer to the case was that the wife had committed adultery, and that the husband was not, therefore, chargeable in respect of her having received parochial relief.

WILLES, J. said this was a good answer, but it did not apply to the children, for whom the father was by the common law, as well as by the law of nature, responsible.

Sleigh, Serjt. undertook to prove that the husband had sought to retain the children, but that they would not be given up; and WILLES, J. said this would be a complete answer, but nothing short of it would.

The voter himself was called to give this answer. He said:

His wife's name was Sarah Frances Hunsley, and that he was a farmer. He had four children, aged about fifteen, twelve, seven, and three. He had put away his wife because of adultery, and when she went away she took two of the children. He afterwards ascertained that his wife and the two children had been admitted to the workhouse, and he had endeavoured by letter to obtain his children from the workhouse authorities, but had received no answer.

WILLES, J. said he could not satisfactorily decide the case without seeing the letter. If the man sought to obtain his children to support them himself, then, under the peculiar circumstances, the vote must be allowed. He must say that he could find no satisfactory account of the origin of the law with regard to the bearing of pauper relief upon voting. It seemed to him to be a sort of excrescence upon the law, introduced by the good sense of the House of Commons, but when introduced he could not make out. It was settled, however, by the Reform Act, and he must treat it as a positive rule of law.

Subsequently the letter demanded was produced, but it did not clear up the doubt that existed, and his Lordship suspended judgment.

We here give, as perhaps the attempt most nearly successful to prove corruption against a member personally, the evidence of Jane Causfield, the wife of a voter. She said:

That she lived at Brompton, and that in 1868 a piece of land, which her husband had occupied, was taken from him by the owner, Jackson Spiers. Previous to the election last year Mr. Hutton, Capt. Robertson, George Clarke, and Ralph Faucit, came to witness's house. Mr. Hutton asked whether her husband would give him his vote, and witness replied that she would not promise that. Clarke led Mr. Hutton up to witness, and said, "This is the woman that has acted blue; she has got two or three people's votes before, and she will very soon fetch him round." Witness declined to accede, but Mr. Hutton took her hand and said, "Mrs. Causfield, if you fetch him round I will give ye a bit o' land and a cow too." Witness said, "I don't know how my husband will vote;" and she turned to Mr. Clarke and said, "George, do ye want another trip to London?" She had heard that Mr. Clarke went to London on the occasion of the former petition. He replied to her that "it would have to be settled in Northallerton this time."

As to this evidence the respondent was subsequently called and said:

He had never held out any promise to anyone to vote for him; nor had he authorised any person to do this, and was not aware that any person had done so. He remembered calling upon Mrs. Causfield at Brompton, and Mr. Clarke was with him. Mrs. Causfield seemed to be labouring under some grievance, and she tried to draw him into a room as if she wanted to talk it over privately, but he would not go. He did not recollect Mr. Clarke saying, in introducing him to Mrs. Causfield, "This is the woman that is blue; she has got us two or three blue votes before;" and he had never told her that if she would fetch her husband round he would give her a bit of land and a cow too.

In cross-examination, the respondent stated that he dared say Mrs. Causfield might have said that she thought her husband would not vote at all, in consequence of the way in which he had lost a bit of land; but he had never offered to give them a bit of land in return, nor had he made a promise of any kind to them.

George Clarke, farmer, who was present at the interview with Mrs. Causfield, corroborated the evidence of the respondent as to what then took place. He stated positively that no promise was ever made to Mrs. Causfield to induce her to influence her husband.

Digitized by Google

The other evidence sufficiently appears in the judgment:

WILLES, J.—The scrutiny is over in favour, so far, of the sitting member, and it only remains to determine whether the election is void or not. I do not know that I am called upon to go through all those points which were reserved upon the scrutiny, because I have given credit for the purpose of determining whether it would be useful to proceed further with the scrutiny for all the votes that could be obtained by the petitioner upon the most favourable view of the cases presented. I believe that I should not be assisting anybody if I were to express an opinion upon them, although during the evening I passed through my mind the cases, and looked up again those cases before the committees bearing upon them; but I think it would be pedantical to give an elaborate judgment upon a scrutiny which has turned out to be abortive. I can only say, assuming that I were in favour of the petitioner upon all the cases presented in the course of the scrutiny, there would still remain a balance in favour of the sitting member, and the only question is whether the election of the sitting member was void upon any of the grounds which vitiate Parliamentary elections. It is now so well settled, and I think I may say accepted by the profession and the public, that a Parliamentary election is void if the member or any agent of the member is guilty of any corrupt practice in the course of the election, that it is only necessary to state that that is the principle upon which the person sitting here ought to decide the prayer of the petition, that the election should be held to be void. I have already stated my opinion that it is not proved that Mr. Hutton was guilty of any corrupt practice. The corruption charged against him was a promise attributed to indiscretion, but which I could hardly characterise by so mild a name if he really gave it to Mrs. Causfield, that she should have land and a cow if she got her husband to vote for Hutton. Of course, if that promise was given it was grave misconduct, and such as Mr. Hutton, even at his age, I think, must be perfectly aware was grave misconduct, and would defeat the election. But I may say with respect to Mrs. Causfield, that I am perfectly satisfied that her wish was father to the thonght, and not anything that she really heard from Mr. Hutton. The most charitable view towards her would be to suppose that she construed the ordinary politeness of a candidate towards the womankind in the house where he went to canvass, to be an assent not to anything she asked for, but to something that she had very strongly in her mind a desire to get, and either has persuaded herself she asked for, or has made up her mind to assert that she asked for. Her evidence is either evidence inaccurate or evidence false; I am satisfied that it was one or the other, and that the charge against Mr. Hutton of personal corruption in the election altogether failed. Then there was a variety of charges of bribery against agents of Mr. Hutton, beginning with the case of the ragman, who spoke of being promised by a person named George Clark that he should have his rags; and there followed a variety of witnesses who spoke with more or less clearness, either in affirming or in denying, for some of them denied that which they were called upon to affirm, that promises or hopes were held out that benefits might be obtained from Mr. Hutton in the way of land. One of the witnesses was Ann Mark, whose case was disposed of incidentally in the course of the day. But I think with respect to evidence of that class that the judge before defeating an election ought to be very sure. I ought not to say very sure, but ought to be sure; he ought to have reasonable assurance that there really was a bribe held out, or promise of some particular benefit to the voter in case he voted or abstained from voting; and he ought to be sure that those general, and, very often, more often than not, exaggerated commendations of the wealth, and the liberality and other qualities of the candidate, have not been construed or tortured by the particular witness into a promise of some special benefit to himself. Of course the whole constituency ought to choose the best man for their member, and yet they have a right to choose the best man, not only for the council of the nation, but also with reference to the neighbourhood itself, and with reference to the special interest, I may say, of a paternal character, which the member may take in his constituency, which a member often takes, and which displays itself in various ways; in the way of pecuniary benefit for public objects, subscriptions to charities, looking after poor people, and so on; a general benefit to people, whether they were blue or yellow, as soon as the excitement of the election is over; and the judge ought to be satisfied in his own mind that the conversation out of which a bribe is sought to be extracted, the promise of some valuable consideration for voting or not voting, really had a special character; that it was not a mere general commendation of the member as being a good man for the place. I must say, taking the evidence upon the one side and upon the other together, I cannot bring my mind to the conclusion that in any one instance an agent of Mr. Hutton did make a promise of a corrupt character to a voter at the election; it certainly has not been proved to my satisfaction. When I say of a corrupt character; I call everything of a corrupt character that has a tendency to influence a man's vote with reference to mere lucre, instead of honest considerations, including considerations of that legitimate influence which I have already stated it is impossible to exclude, and which the attempt to remove by law I believe would probably turn out, I am sure would turn out, to be very ineffectual, because it is part of the nature of things, which the law has to deal with and to regulate, and which it cannot alter. Then I pass over the head of corruption, which one has had to consider in other places, that of treating, by saying that in only one instance has there been a suggestion of any treating in this place; that glass of beer and cigar which we heard of to-day I think were the only bodily forms which the treating took. There was a suggestion of it at one period of the proceedings, I think, but only a suggestion, in order to withdraw any charge founded upon it. Now I must be allowed to say upon this, that there is moderation in all things, and there ought to be a moderation even in one's desire to sweep away the corruption which is alleged to be so prevalent, but which in many of the places I have visited, certainly including Northallerton, has been rather thought of by the suspicious than established by any proof. There is some moderation, and I think if I were to take serious notice of the cigar and glass of beer given some time before the election, I should not leave a good character for wisdom behind me in Yorkshire. It was no corrupt treating. Then I go on to the case of intimidation, and I quite agree with what was said by my brother O'Brien, as to intimidation. It probably is not the most dangerous form of corruption, because if it is carried into effect, it is sure to be proved by the victim of it, and in two signal instances in the course of these election proceedings, the elections have been set aside upon the ground of intimidation, in the form of workmen being turned away because they chose to have different political opinions from their masters, or from the managers under their masters. That, of course, the law will not tolerate. The law will not tolerate that a man should tyrannise over the opinions of others; and if an agent of the candidate is guilty of the misconduct of doing so, the candidate cannot retain his seat, even though he himself be entirely innocent of any interference in the matter, and even though it should turn out that it had no real effect upon the majority. Corruption in any form is odious, corruption in that form is detestable. Only a rogue, as a rule, can be bribed; he is a rogue by accepting the offer, but an honest man may be intimidated. It is sufficient, however, to say that the law is such that if you prove intimidation by an agent you defeat the election. In this case intimidation is said to have been practised upon the voter, Mr. Stubbings. Mr. Stubbings does not appear to have been intimidated. He appears to have given his vote, as he finally made up his mind to do, for the yellow party. But if a person who tried to intimidate him turned out to be an agent of Mr. Hutton, even though the intimidation were not successful, it would defeat the election. The real question is, whether Curry or any of the other persons who formed part of the congregation of Mr. Stubbings, did cast intimidation upon him. Curry did canvass for Mr. Hutton.

Digitized by Google

O'Malley.—There is no proof of Curry canvassing.

In reply to the judge, Mr. Hutton said that Curry did not canvass.

WILLES, J.—I suppose I rather assumed it in consequence of the evidence not being stopped; but in the view I take it is not material, and probably in the view Mr. O'Malley took it is not material. Certainly this is the first time I have heard that the evidence as to Curry was objected to on the ground that he was not an agent. I was rather assuming him to be an agent, and I thought one of the witnesses had stated that he canvassed.

O'Malley.—It would not be an objection to his evidence.

WILLES, J.—What do you say was the evidence?

O'Brien, Serjt.—I do not say that we affected Mr. Hutton with any agency upon the part of Curry.

WILLES, J.—Then this ought not to have been introduced at all into the first part of the case. This really is disposed of with the scrutiny. It would have been a serious error on my part if I were going to deal with the act done as being an act affecting the election, to take it even upon the silence of counsel that Curry was agent; but I have been rather assuming, as Curry was not stated point blank not to be the agent in the previous part of the case, that he was one of those persons who was said to have gone about canvassing with Mr. Hutton. Then it passed sub silentio. I will finish what I have to say upon the assumption, for argument sake, that he was the agent, because that is the view I have been taking of the case. I have excluded Goldsborough from the case, because I think Goldsborough, upon Stubbings's own account of the matter, did not intimidate him in reference to his vote at all. He objected to his allowing the schoolroom to be used by one political party whether that was a reasonable or an unreasonable objection—I am inclined to think it was a reasonable objection—it certainly does not appear to me to come within the 5th section. But with respect to Curry, assuming that he were an agent for Mr. Hutton, I am called upon to decide that Mr. Stubbings's account of the matter is correct, that Curry, without any reason whatsoever, except the desire to serve the political party to which he belonged, threatened Mr. Stubbings that he would give up his pew in the chapel if he voted, according to his conscience, for the yellows, if he did not sit still. If that were so, I desire to say, as at present advised, I should have held it to be a case of intimidation within the 5th section, and should have thought it necessary to go back through the notes for the purpose of satisfying my mind whether there was, as I had supposed, any evidence which would justify me in holding Curry to be an agent (I think not after Mr. Hutton's statement, to which I give entire credence), or whether, on the other hand, I should take Curry's account of the matter, and conclude that what passed between him and Stubbings was not really an act of intimidation on the part of Curry, or so intended; that it was not a tyrannical interference with another man's vote, but that it was a resolution come to by him in honest anger at Stubbings' for having changed his mind as to sitting still which Curry alleges he had undertaken to do. Curry states that what took place was no intimidation at all on his part, but that it was a thing done in anger, whether reasonable or unreasonable, in consequence of Stubbings, as he thought, behaving in a shifty manner. And without justifying Curry, because a man has quite a right to change his mind as to whether he will vote or not up to the last moment; but without justifying what Curry did, I do not think I ought to come to the conclusion against him that he really meant it as intimidation. It was, I must use the expression, a squabble in the congregation, without any thought of intimidation upon the one side or upon the other. I must deem and determine that John Hutton, the member whose election is complained of by the petition, was duly elected and returned. I must report, that no candidate at the election is shown to have been guilty of any corrupt practices, and that there was no corrupt practice at the election with the knowledge and consent of either candidate. And I must further report that no corrupt practices extensively prevailed, and that there is no reason to suppose that corrupt practices extensively prevailed at the election. With regard to costs, I see nothing to exempt this case from the general rule.

Agents: T. T. Trevor, Guisborough, and W. D. Trotter, Bishop Auckland.

HEREFORD ELECTION PETITION.

March 12, 13, 14, and 15.

(Before BLACKBURN, J.)

Treating—"Corruptly"—Agency—Evidence—Municipal election—Bribery—Practice—Costs.

To act corruptly in connection with an election is to do something which is contrary to the intention to the Act of Parliament.

Therefore the giving of meat and drink to be corrupt must be done with the intention of influencing an election generally, as by acquiring popularity, or by inducing a voter to vote or refrain from voting.

There is no precise rule by which agency can be determined; but every bit of canvassing and acting for a candidate is evidence to show agency. If a particular corrupt act does not come within the category of acts done by an agent the candidate would not be affected, though the persons corruptly acting had been canvassing the town or speaking on his side.

H. was asked by the agent of the candidate to canvas two specific persons:

Digitized by Google

Held, that that would not make him a general agent, so that for anything else he might do the candidate would be made responsible.

H. gave a breakfast before the polling, to which the whole town was invited. Everybody was invited to come and have drink there, vehicles were provided to carry voters to the poll, and some were actually so conveyed. On the day of the election the candidates wrote and thanked H. (one of them in the warmest terms) for what he had done:

Held, that this went a considerable way, though it was not conclusive, to show that H. had been adopted as an agent to a great extent.

H. was also seen canvassing in company with B., a recognised agent of the candidates:

Held that this, taken in connection with the above facts, was not conclusive to establish general agency.

But it was further proved that committeemen brought voters to H.'s breakfast; that B. had spoken of him after the election as having done much good service. And it was Held that all those circumstances taken together so connected H. with the candidates as to cause their election to be voided by reason of the corrupt treating by H.

R., a town councillor gave sums of money to voters who had supported him at the municipal contest. But it appeared that they intended to vote as they did vote.

Held, that although this was an improper practice, it could not be said that the votes had been bought for the Parliamentary contest, and that it was not bribery.

At a meeting of Parliamentary electors held at a public-house, R. gave a quantity of drink. He said that he gave it because he was asked for it and because he had been recently elected councillor of the ward:

Held, that had this stood alone, the conclusion must have been that R. acted with a corrupt intention.

In the bribery particulars 184 cases were put down. On five only was evidence given, and they failed. It was, therefore,

Held, that although the petitioners had succeeded, each party should bear their own costs.

The court refused to separate the costs and to give the petitioners the costs of the cases of treating which had been established.

This was a petition against the return of Messrs. Clive and Wyllie, the Liberal sitting members. Sir R. Baggallay and Major Arbuthnot were the defeated Conservative candidates.

Price, Q. C., Dowdeswell, and G. Browne were for the petitioners;

Powell, Q. C. and Chandos Leigh were for Mr. Clive; and Parry, Serjt. and Rathbone for Mr. Wyllie.

As stated in the judgment the case rested mainly on the allegation of treating, the principal witness being Mr. John Harrison. He said:

He gave a breakfast on the morning of the poll. His marriage occurred on the 25th Aug., when presentations were made to him by the men employed by him, and to his wife by the railway workmen, and on his return in the middle of September he intimated his intention to give the men a feast in return. There was nothing to prevent his giving the feast before Nov. 17, but he fixed that day because he knew it would be an idle day. He told the men they might bring a few friends with them. He expected about forty, but altogether about seventy came. Meat, rum, brandy, and half a dozen of wine were supplied. They began about half-past seven o'clock, and was all cleared away by twelve o'clock. William Lewis was brought to the feast by one of the invited guests. Heard that he got helplessly drunk, but did not see him. The witness added that he ordered a break and three omnibusses on the polling-day and drove some to the poll, remaining on the box of the break while they went into the polling-booth. There were several Conservative voters among his guests. He knew of three who voted for the Conservative party. On his oath he declared that the breakfast was not given to influence the voters to vote for Clive and Wyllie. He was liberal in principle, but did not know either Mr. Clive or Mr. Wyllie personally. Was not on the Liberal committee, and only attended at the committee-room on one or two occasions for the purpose of making inquiries. He received a book from Edwards, the clerk to the Liberal committee, containing the names of such of his men as were voters. He used to refer to it at home to see who were voters, but he did not use the book for the purpose of canvassing. The book had been destroyed some time ago, with other waste paper. He had accompanied Mr. J. Bosley (an acknowledged agent) once or twice when he was canvassing. He received letters from Mr. Wyllie and Mr. Clive, thanking him for the support he had given them at the election. Both letters were destroyed.

Cross-examined:

At the time of the election he employed in Hereford a dozen men, or more, besides those employed out of Hereford (who were more than 100). Besides his own men, some of his private friends joined in the presentation to him on his marriage. One of the vehicles charged to him had been ordered by J. Russell. Witness's brother told him to order it. In everything that he did in reference to the election he acted as a volunteer. Out of the dozen men employed by him at Hereford there were some voters. He never asked the men if they were voters. He wanted to know which of his men were voters, and Mr. Edwards was to ascertain that for him. Besides the letters of Mr. Clive and Mr. Wyllie, he also destroyed two letters of Mr. F. Bodenham on the subject of the election. Drove the break to the Kerry Arms on the day of the poll several times. There were men in the break, and they drank with him there. He did not take them. They were in the break and drove the break. He saw a placard at the Kerry Arms, "Wyllie and Clive's Committee-room," but he did not know that there was a committee-room there. (A photograph of the Kerry Arms with the placard on it produced.) He brought a lot of voters to the poll at half-past nine, a second batch at 11, and took each lot, first to the Kerry Arms and then to his house at Holmer. He took a third lot to the poll, and then took them back to his own house. His house was cleared by 1 o'clock. With regard to the letters from the sitting members after the election, the witness admitted that something like the following passage occurred in Mr. Wyllie's letter:—"If there is one person more than another that I am indebted to for my return, it is you." Mr. Clive's letter was more moderate in character.

Re-examined:

There were about a dozen non-voters at the breakfast. He never received a circular to attend any committee meeting.

Mr. Bostock, foreman to Mr. Harrison, gave some corroborative evidence as to the breakfast.

John Baldwin, one of Mr. Harrison's workmen, said Mr. Bostock told him of the day when the "blow out" was fixed for. He took another man with him.

George Roche, another workman, took friends with him to the feast and did not know their names. They were lodgers.

Two other witnesses gave similar evidence.

George Prosser added to the facts already narrated that at the breakfast the healths of the bride and bridegroom, and of all the election candidates, were given.

The two sitting members were then called to explain the origin of their letters to Mr. Harrison.

Mr. Clive, M.P., said that after the election Mr. Bodenham (his agent) gave him a list of persons who had been active in promoting his election. Mr. Bodenham represented to him that there were some eighteen or twenty persons whom he ought to thank for taking an interest in the election. Mr. Clive asked him for a list of those persons, which Mr. Bodenham supplied, saying it was a list of persons to whom he was under obligation for assistance—"active assistance if you like." He (Mr. Clive) had not paid one farthing more than what had been returned as his election expenses, nor did he intend to pay more.

Price disavowed any intention of imputing personal corruption to the sitting members.

Digitized by Google

Mr. Wyllie, M.P., said:

He never heard of the breakfast at Mr. Harrison's until after the petition was started. He came down to the Hunt Club ball in January, and next day Mr. Bodenham told him that this breakfast was the basis of the petition. He knew nothing of the breakfast at the time that he wrote to Mr. Harrison. The circumstances under which he wrote to Mr. Harrison were different from those when Mr. Clive wrote. After the polling was over there was a dinner at the Green Dragon. At that dinner he heard that a man named Harrison had done him good service, and he was much struck with the fact, as he had never heard of him before. His idea was that he had done it for love of the Liberal cause, and he wrote to him a very warm and very enthusiastic letter.

Cross-examined by Price:

He only heard that he had brought up voters to the poll. That was the only kind of service that he had heard Mr. Harrison had performed.

March 15.—BLACKBURN, J.—I do not think that I need take any further time to consider, because I have had an opportunity of looking over the notes, and having had my attention called to a considerable part of the evidence now on each side in detail, I am now as fully prepared to express my opinion upon this case as I should be at any other time. First of all, I will state at once that there has not been any attempt to show that the candidates, personally, have been parties to anything that has been wrong here whatever; and, indeed, the evidence leads me to the conclusion that this is one of the cases where it is not so much the fact that the candidate comes down to the borough, as that the local interest in the borough brings forward the candidate; so that this really is, as it seems to me, a case in which the candidate is standing on the local influence, and for those who bring him forward, and who are active for him in that way, the candidate is as much responsible as if they were his agents; but, perhaps, it is a more accurate phrase to call them his constituents than to call them his agents, though "agent" is the phrase which has been always used, and which we must therefore take. Now, first, there are complaints made here on the ground of bribery, on the ground of undue influence, and on the ground of treating. As to those complaints relating to bribery, I think that no case of bribery has been made out in a way which would at all justify me in acting upon the belief that bribery has been committed by an agent of the candidate. I qualify it in that way, stating it simply, that I do not think it is made out in such a way as would justify me in acting upon it, because there is evidence, and evidence of great suspicion I think, and in reference to two cases of very considerable suspicion indeed of it, but not such as would justify me in acting upon it. [Having considered the evidence in these cases his Lordship proceeded:] Now, there comes the other matter, which is the really serious matter in the case, and that is as to the treating. Upon that the terms of the Act of Parliament regulating the matter now are clear and distinct: "Every candidate at an election who shall corruptly" (the word "corruptly" means contrary to the intention of the Act, with a motive or intention by means of it to produce an effect upon the election; not going so far as bribery, but with a motive thereby to influence the election), "by himself or by or with any person" (I pass over some words), "directly or indirectly give or provide, or cause to be given or provided, or shall be accessory to the giving or providing, or shall pay, wholly or in part, any expenses incurred for any meat, drink, entertainment, or provision to or for any person in order to be elected, or for being elected, or for the purpose of corruptly influencing such person, or any other person, to give or refrain from giving his vote," shall be deemed guilty of treating. Now, in that case, as well as in others, a candidate is responsible for the acts of agents when they are so far agents that what they were doing they have been employed or authorised by him as agents to do; he is answerable for their corrupt acts although he may be no party to them. Then comes a question which is always a difficult one in such cases; it is a double question. One is, was the meat, drink, and entertainment given with what the statute calls corruptness? I have already said my explanation of that word is, given with the intention of influencing the election—with the intention of influencing an election generally, as by acquiring a popularity, or with the intention of influencing a particular voter to vote or refrain from voting. Another question is, is it given in such a way that the agents of the candidate, those who can be considered as identified with the candidate, were, in the comprehensive language of the Act, either the persons who gave it or were accessory to it? That, of course, raises a very difficult question. What is the degree of agency? What is the relation between a candidate and a particular person which would make the candidate responsible to the extent of losing his seat if that particular person has given meat or drink corruptly? Here we have both questions raised on the two great points to which I have recently directed the attention of counsel. The most important case, the great case, has reference to what took place at Mr. Harrison's break fast, and there I need not say that, as I think, it would be idle to attempt to go through the evidence to show that I am justified in coming to the conclusion, that what Mr. Harrison did give there was given with the intention which the statute calls corrupt, namely, with the intention to produce an effect upon the election. The town is invited, everybody is invited to come who will on the morning to have drink there, and there are breaks and vehicles to carry the people to the poll, and they are actually driven to the poll; and really it struck me that the attempt to say that that was not done with the purpose of influencing the election was not very candid on the part of the witnesses, and did not convey a very high compliment as to their estimation of my common sense. I can entertain no possible doubt upon that point. Now comes the other important question, which is, the amount of agency. That is a difficult question of law and of fact. I have never been able myself to get a precise definition that satisfies my own mind of what is the degree of relation that would constitute a man an agent. Almost everything is evidence of it tending that way, and all that one can do, I think, is to look at the particular acts that are done, and to remember the reasons for which the Parliamentary law differs from the common law in that respect. In the common law a man is not responsible for the act of his agent, except where it is done directly according to an authority which is given to him. In Parliamentary law it is otherwise. A candidate, who has really meant that his agent should not commit a corrupt act, is nevertheless responsible to the extent of losing his seat if the agent does commit a corrupt act. And for that difference in the law so established by Parliamentary committees formerly, and now recognised by statute, it seems to me that there are two principal motives. I will not say that they are the only ones, but they are two principal motives. It would not be possible to unseat a person for corrupt practices if he were permitted, by the means of persons who acted for him, or who brought him forward, either one or the other, to obtain the benefit of their aid, if he were not to be also responsible to the extent of losing his seat for the corrupt practices that were done by them for his benefit. That is one of the great reasons for which, as a matter of public policy, it was thought necessary, in order that it might check corrupt practices, to establish that principle. Another, and a very considerable reason no doubt, was that in all elections where extensive corrupt practices, bribery and the like prevailed, great care was always taken that the candidate should be ignorant about it. The men who had corrupted, who paid money, carefully kept the candidate from knowing anything about it till after the election was over; then they would come forward and say, "Of course, when I advanced this money I took care that you should not know of it. I have spent 5000*l.* or 6000*l.* on your behalf, and now, as a matter of honour, you must repay me, because I was acting for you." And from the loose morality which formerly did prevail at elections, and which I do not say is completely got rid of, candidates did think themselves bound in honour to pay, and did pay. Consequently the Parliamentary election law became established, that a person was responsible for the acts of his agent in that way; and the question very much was, was that agent, when doing the thing in such a position that there would be that claim on the candidate, according to the false morality of Parliamentary election matters, to recoup him for what he had done? Now those are two reasons for the Parliamentary law differing from the common law. They were not the only ones, but they do give two very good guides and assistances. And I apprehend that in a case where corrupt practices are shown which the candidates themselves are not cognisant of, you must bear these two principal reasons in mind; and then exercising what may be called common sense you must see, does the particular corrupt act come within the rule as an act done by an agent? If it does not, then, though the person may have been canvassing the town, or speaking on one side or the other, still we could not say that the candidate should be unseated on that account. Every bit of canvassing and acting for a candidate is evidence to show agency; but the result cannot depend upon any precise rule that I could define. It comes to be a question of degree, of more or less, and of common sense. It happens that from the nature of things when you come to a question of degree, of more or less, and of common sense, and leave it in that way to a jury, if there were a jury, the jury would determine it sometimes in one way and sometimes in another. Unfortunately, where judges are obliged to be judges of that question of degree and of common sense, there is this unavoidable uncertainty, because it is quite clear that the common sense of one judge will differ from the common sense of another. To use the old simile that was used by Mr. Selden many years ago, and which is none the worse for being old, the standard of common sense as determined by a judge's common sense would be as uncertain as a measure of length, the unit of which should be the judge's foot, because one judge's foot would be longer and another's would be shorter. We cannot help that. I wish with all my heart that the Legislature would find out some test to relieve us from that uncertainty. I can only say I have not been able to invent a test; and if I could I would not make it law. I should be excessively glad if anyone else having the power to make it law, would invent it. That being so, let us see what we are to say as to whether Mr. Harrison's breakfast is shown to have been known, and to have been done in such a way as to be fairly considered an act for which the candidates should be responsible. And remembering that in this case, as I have said before, the candidate must be considered as brought forward by the local people rather than the candidate coming forward and standing himself, we have first of all what Mr. Harrison was himself. He is not a voter. I do not think it has been affirmatively proved that he was any more in direct personal communication with the committee than this; that he did go to Edwards at the committee-room on two occasions; that he saw Edwards there, and that he having given Edwards a list of the names of the people connected with the railway, and of those in his own employment, Edwards gave him a list of the names of those who were voters; and I come to the conclusion from that, that Harrison got that book, and that Edwards gave it to him with the intention that Harrison should ask these men for their votes. Then, of course, Edwards filled a very subordinate position, and I am not by any means prepared to say that if Edwards in his subordinate position had asked a person to canvass that would make the candidate responsible for what that person did. It appears also, however, that Mr. Bodenham, who certainly was almost the head of the affair, did ask Mr. Harrison to canvass two particular persons, and wrote to him to that effect; and that goes further to say that Harrison was asked to canvass; but I do not think that being asked to canvass two distinct and specific persons would make him a general agent, so that for anything else he might do the candidate would be made responsible. But then we have to deal with a much more serious matter—that he is seen in company with Mr. Bosley, who is certainly one of the leading men who bring forward the candidates, and one of the persons for whose acts they would be responsible. To what extent Bosley knew that Harrison was acting we have not very definitely shown, Mr. Bosley himself was not pointedly asked upon it; and if, at the time, my recollection had served me, I would have asked him the question myself. I suppose that neither side liked to ask the question for fear they might get an unfavourable answer, and I take some blame to myself for not recollecting that. What Mr. Bosley did know about it we do not distinctly know; but this much does appear, that Mr. Bosley did speak to Mr. Wyllie as to what Mr. Harrison had done, in such terms as to draw forth from Mr. Wyllie the very glowing letter we have heard of, in which Mr. Wyllie thanks him for his services; and that for some reason or other somebody did so speak to Mr. Bodenham, upon which Mr. Bodenham did the same thing to Mr. Clive, though Mr. Clive, having received his information from a lawyer, in a very business-like manner wrote a cooler letter than Mr. Wyllie's. We have this very clearly, that in both cases Harrison's services were, on the very day of the election in the one case, and in the other case the day after, acknowledged by the leading men, and that for these services he was thanked in letters from the candidates themselves. That goes a considerable way, though it is not conclusive, to show that Mr. Harrison had been by them adopted as an agent to a great extent. Then we have this, that he had gone on one occasion with Mr. Bosley (that in itself is not very much), he had been in company with Edwards when he was asking the railway men for their votes; and it was exactly the railway men whom Mr. Harrison would be likely to influence. Then comes what took place at the breakfast. The invitation seems to have gone forth to everybody and everybody's friends; it was the whole town, and everybody that liked to come was to come; that is what it comes to. We have shown that Edwards invited people, and brought them up; that Williams, of the "Sawyer's Rest," who is a committeeman, invited them, and brought them up; that Rowlands, a committeeman, though not a very active one, brought them up; Henry Davis, who has been marked as being a captain, was also shown to have brought them up, and Lloyd, who is a committeman, was shown to have been there; and probably there were others. John

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Russell was there at the time. John Russell I do not so much rely upon, for although he had been originally appointed a captain, yet, at the first meeting at the "Saracen's Head," he seems to have been the worse for liquor, and after that, according to his own account, he kept aloof from them, and he seems to have taken offence; and according to Bodenham's account he kept aloof from Mr. Russell. I do not think that any active agency has been shown on his part for which he was peculiarly responsible. I do not say that any one of these things would satisfy me that Harrison was an agent. Taking simply the fact that he gave this breakfast, or merely that he had gone with Mr. Bosley to canvass, I do not say that that would satisfy me, though it goes strongly to prove it. Nor would the fact that Bosley had spoken of him afterwards as having done such good service; nor yet do I say that the fact that Williams being a committeeman brought people to his breakfast would satisfy me; nor yet that Edwards, who had been employed about these railway men to some extent, brought people up to the breakfast; nor yet that Lloyd was there, nor yet that Henry Davis was there. No one of these things by itself satisfies me that Mr. Harrison's breakfast was one for which the party who were bringing forward Mr. Clive and Mr. Wyllie are to be considered responsible. Yet taking them altogether, a number of little pieces of evidence do produce an effect upon my mind which leads me to say that, according to the usual rules in Parliamentary matters (that this which is certainly an act of corruption is so clearly brought home to the agents and persons in authority as to constitute them accessories to it, and for which the candidates ought to be responsible), I cannot do otherwise than come to the conclusion that this act is one which avoids the election. I am very sorry for both Mr. Clive and Mr. Wyllie, who had no intention to sanction anything which was corrupt. I am sorry also for many of the leading persons connected with them, for I have no doubt that both Mr. Bodenham and Mr. Jay, the unpaid agents, wished very much to prevent such occurrences, and were very much annoyed at them. Still I cannot say that that should affect my decision here. Then there remains to be considered a matter of much less consequence, and which need not be dwelt upon so much, namely, what Mr. William Russell did, and what he is shown to have done, which is, that being a town councillor he did upon the day of the election for the town council, when there certainly had been something of a formal contest, give money to such of his friends as had come to the election to support him, which it would appear was a bad practice prevailing in the city. Such a thing, if it were done in a Parliamentary election, would at once be considered bribery, and would avoid the election. I trust that the Legislature will take steps to prevent its being done in future at municipal elections also. Here it comes to be a question of fact; was the money that was paid to men for their wages for coming to the municipal election, intended to produce the effect of inducing those men to vote in a particular way at the Parliamentary election? In a case which I tried at Taunton, there were very analogous payments made for the registration, and the evidence satisfied me that that money was given with the intention to induce the voters to vote in the Parliamentary election. In the present case there was a smaller scale, and there were fewer of them, and the day's wages seem to have been given without reference to politics. I think most of the witnesses who were called were men who actually did vote upon the Conservative side, and moreover seem always to have intended to do so; they were not bought over, nor were they told that they were behaving ill or treacherously, or anything of that sort, in voting on the Conservative side; and, consequently, I come to the conclusion that so far as regards the payment of the money, though a very wrong and improper practice, it could not be considered as purchasing a vote; it was not (putting it in homely language) saying "If you will vote yellow at the municipal election, I will pay you for it, and then I shall expect you to vote yellow at the Parliamentary election also." I do not think it amounted to that, and consequently it is not bribery. Then comes what took place at the Greyhound inn. That seems to be much more unconnected with the municipal election. There, I think, that if that stood alone I should pause and hesitate. I should be afraid almost to act upon it if it stood alone, but my impression is that if it stood alone I should on that ground also vacate the election; I do not say that I would have done so if it had stood alone, because I should have hesitated a good deal: but I think I should for this reason. It appears that when a Parliamentary meeting was held at the public-house (and all these Parliamentary meetings at public-houses have been followed by treating afterwards, and that is one of the reasons why they should not be held there), Mr. Russell having been at that meeting, came down to where there were people, some who had been at the meeting and some who had not, but people who were all more or less connected with voters, and he did give them a quantity of drink. He states that his reason was that they asked him for it, because he had just been appointed councillor for the ward; but it is impossible not to see that any such thing given at that time, by a leading partisan and supporter of the candidates whose meeting had just taken place, must have had a tendency to influence the votes of those persons. Mr. Price pointed that out in his argument very well, and I think he was quite justified in arguing that it must have had that tendency, and I think it scarcely possible to believe that Mr. Russell was not aware of that tendency. I therefore think that if that had stood alone, I should have been obliged to come to the conclusion that Russell did intend, as a natural consequence of giving that drink, in that manner to influence the election. However, had it not been for the matter of Mr. Harrison's breakfast, I should have felt very much difficulty about it. It is very possible that if I had found such important consequences as the denermination of an election to depend upon it, I might not have avoided the election upon that ground; but at present the result I think is, that owing to these two acts the election is to be declared void. There is one thing further to remark upon. As a general rule, I have in every case considered that the costs of the election ought to abide the result. As a general rule, that is right, and it is particularly right where the petitioners have been successful in avoiding an election, and have therefore done a public service. But in this particular case there is a reason why I think that I cannot do it. When the Parliamentary Election Committees sat they were a tribunal which met on the particular case for the first time, and nothing could be done till they met. The consequence was that they had no control over what happened before, and then the petitioner came before the Parliamentary Committee with such a case as he pleased; and for the first time, when the counsel for the petitioner got up and spoke, the respondent heard what cases would be brought against him, what were relied upon, what votes were to be impugned, and so on. It was also a consequence that followed from that, that a very vicious practice arose on the part of those connected with Parliamentary elections, that they never got up their case, or considered their case. Counsel went before Parliamentary Committees with a loose statement that such and such people were likely to say something, and they were instructed from hour to hour and from minute to minute as they went on. A Parliamentary Election Committee was a tribunal which did not sit constantly, and therefore after the particular occasion had no power to control other cases. Those evils afforded a great reason, as I believe, why Parliamentary election committees did not give general satisfaction. I think that they were quite as competent to decide the questions of facts submitted to them as the judges are; but I do not think that they were so competent to bring the matter to the proper point. Now, in making the rules we took those things into consideration; we had this before us, that it was the very essence of justice and fair play that every man who was accused of anything should have due and sufficient notice of what it was that he was accused of, and of that that only, so that his attention should not be distracted to immaterial matters, but that he should really know what it was of which he was accused. For that reason, and for that purpose, we have established the practice that particulars should be given, stating what it is that the respondents will be required to meet. Those particulars were not required to be given long before. Three days before the time came the other side might know what they were to meet, so that they might then be prepared to meet the case, and might not waste time and trouble in hunting up different matters on which the petitioners did not rely; the object being, as I have already pointed out, partly to secure fair play and partly the saving of waste of costs. And a very important further point is, that fifteen working days' notice of trial having been given, and it not being required till the twelfth of those had gone by, that the petitioners should give those particulars; they should make use of those twelve days in in ascertaining and sifting their evidence; that they should really conduct the case as we do in an ordinary trial, with as much as can be done towards fair play and precision. These being the objects, and the particulars being required for those objects, how have they been complied with here? 184 cases of bribery have been put down, which the respondents must have had to look into. Of those there are five on which evidence has been given, and of those five the petitioners have not succeeded in establishing one to my satisfaction. There are five cases that have come to nothing, with 184 charges in the particulars. It is obvious that that could not have been done except for the purpose of baffling the objects of giving the particulars; and it is obvious that it must have given the respondents a great deal of unnecessary trouble.

Price.—Will your Lordship allow me to mention that all the municipal bribery cases were included?

BLACKBURN, J.—Then it is not so large a proportion as I thought it was; though undoubtedly it was stated by Mr. Powell, and I never heard it disputed till this moment, that the proportion was so. It is impossible not to see that the respondents must have been put to a great deal of useless trouble and useless expense in getting up the defence. It is justice to the petitioners to say that, although I have not known quite so gross a case as this before, yet generally the particulars have been used very much as if they were intended to give no information at all; and the only way to check that is to say, that where that is done we shall follow the spirit of the Act of Parliament, which says that the costs shall be in the discretion of the judge, who shall direct how they shall be allotted, bearing in view whether or no there has been useless expense and vexation caused; that is the meaning of the Act. That being so, I can only say, that though here the petitioners have succeeded, I do not think that it would be right to make the respondents bear their costs. The respondents having failed will not get their costs. In this particular case, and under the particular circumstances, I direct that each side bear their own costs.

Price.—All I wish to ask your Lordship is, whether you would make a distinction as to some of the costs. We proved some of the treating.

BLACKBURN, J.—No, I cannot do that. If we attempted to separate the costs it would require very much investigation, and I cannot do it.

Agents: Jones and Starling; G. J. Durrant.

WIGAN ELECTION PETITION.

March 4, 5, and 6.

(Before MARTIN, B.)

Illegal acts not vitiating an election—Accumulation—Political association—Effect of subscription to on question of agency—Payment of rates.

Some acts may be done at an election of which the judge disapproves, but which do not vitiate it. These may be looked to, however, to explain other acts which are ambiguous, and if upon a future election petition arising out of another election at the same place, acts similar to those of which the judge had expressed his disapproval were proved to have been repeated, the judge who tried the second petition might well take them into consideration to aid his conclusion that the act upon which the validity of the election depended was a corrupt and dishonest act.

There is no partnership privity between the parties subscribing to a political association; nor does the fact of subscribing confer any authority upon the person who manages it to make them responsible for an illegal act done by the manager.

S. was the acting agent and sole representative of a Liberal association, and evidence was given to show that he paid the rates of voters to enable them to be registered. The respondents were Liberals, and subscribed to the funds of the association, but did not interfere personally.

Held, that they were not responsible for the acts of S.

Semble, it is necessary in order to establish that a person had corruptly paid a rate when the rate was in fact paid by a third person, to show that that person was authorised by the person sought to be charged to pay the rate.

Where the candidature has been honest the strictest proof of illegal acts by agents is required.

This was a petition against the return of Messrs. Woods and Lancaster, and contained all the usual allegations, the principal being that they had corruptly paid rates through the agency of the manager of a Liberal association to which they subscribed.

Giffard, Q.C., and Leresche, appeared for the petitioners.

Parry, Serjt., Milward, Q.C., Murphy, and Pope for the respondents.

On the subject of the payment of rates, Parry, Serjt., argued that there must be an actual authorization on the part of the candidate either before or after the act was done, and the payment must be corrupt. A mere payment was not sufficient. A candidate would be liable if an agent of his, within the meaning of the Act of 1854, bribed on his behalf, even though he had prohibited it; yet, under the 49th section of the Act of 1867, no candidate would be liable for the act of a man who paid rates even corruptly except it was proved that he had actually sanctioned or approved it before or after.

Digitized by Google

Milward on the same side, contended that the 49th section was not intended to refer to the time of an election alone, but to all periods of the year, and to all times when registration was being carried on. He, therefore, submitted that to show liability on the part of the candidate it must be proved that he was a party to the act when done. Taking the instance of an election occurring in May or June, was it to be supposed that the validity of that election could be negatived by acts similar to those charged in this petition, done by some individual in the previous July?

Giffard, Q.C., in reply.

MARTIN, B.—The first ground upon which the election is said to be void, is that acts have been done by the agents of the respondents (for no personal misconduct has been imputed to them), which of themselves destroy their candidature, and render their status as candidates not maintainable, and that these acts of themselves have rendered their election void. It is true, that if any act has been done by them or by an agent for whom they are responsible, contrary to the provisions of the Corrupt Practices Act, the operation of the 36th section of the 17 & 18 Vict., and the 46th section of the 31 & 32 Vict., will defeat their election. I have tried several of these petitions, three of which have been similar to the present; that is to say, the candidates were sought to be unseated by reason of such acts as have been alleged. I have laid down a rule to myself, which I have acted upon in all these cases, and upon which, until I am satisfied that it is wrong, I shall continue to act; that is to say, if I am satisfied that the candidates intended honestly to comply with the law, and meant to obey it, and that they themselves did no act contrary to the law, and bona fide intended that no person employed in the election should do an act contrary to the law, their desire and object being that the proceedings in reference to the election should be pure and honest, I will not unseat such persons upon the supposed act of an agent, unless the act is established to my entire satisfaction. I will not act upon anything as to which there possibly may be a mistake or error; I will have it proved; but if it be proved to my satisfaction, and beyond doubt, I must obey the law, and I will obey it. But I think I do right, when an election is sought to be impeached, not because of an act done by the candidates themselves, but for an act which they have forbidden, in requiring to be convinced beyond possibility of error, that the act relied upon by the petitioners which is to unseat the members did actually take place. That is the principle upon which I have acted in the Bradford case, in the Cheltenham case, and in the Westminster case, and I shall continue to act upon it until I am satisfied by some higher authority that it is wrong. I apprehend that my function here is simply to act upon the law as if I were trying a case at Nisi Prius. I have no discretion in the matter; I must act upon the law and the Act of Parliament which imposes the disqualification, and read it according to what its words import. I have no right to go beyond those words. So also it is not because things may have been done at an election of which I do not approve; for instance, having committees at public-houses, hiring a number of carriages, which now, in borough elections is prohibited, or hiring roughs. None of these things of themselves avoid an election, but at the same time they are ingredients which may be taken into consideration. If an act were done by a candidate as to which I was to determine whether it was a corrupt or an innocent act, the conduct of the parties throughout the whole election may be taken into consideration. It may be that evidence is given as to acts done by the candidates which of themselves do not avoid the election. It may be, that although the election cannot be avoided for those acts, yet nevertheless those acts may show what was the real quality and meaning of an ambigious act, which may have one effect or another, according as the judge's mind is satisfied that it was honestly or dishonestly done. It may be that at an election, certain acts may have taken place which the judge disapproves of, but which do not satisfy him that another act upon which the validity of the election depends was corruptly done. But if, upon a futnre election petition arising out of another election at the same place, acts similar to those of which the judge had expressed his disapproval were proved to have been repeated, the judge who tried the second petition might well take them into his consideration to aid his conclusion that the act upon which the validity of the election depended was a corrupt and dishonest act. [Having exonerated the respondents from personal misconduct his Lordship proceeded:]—With respect to the 30 & 31 Vict. it has been argued by the learned counsel for the respondents that the doctrine which has been laid down with regard to the 17 & 18 Vict. does not apply, and that is rather my own impression; I do not mean to give an opinion upon it, because it is unnecessary in this case. The circumstances were these. There is a body in this town called the Liberal Association, and Mr. Giffard has argued that the persons who subscribe to that association are in the nature of a partnership, and that the giving funds to Mr. Stuart for the purpose of enabling him to carry on that association made him their agent, so that the acts done by him would be obligatory upon them, and they would be bound by them. From that view I dissent. There is no similarity to a partnership. It has given to it the collective name of the Liberal Association, but the only person acting is Mr. Stuart. It was stated that Mr. Woods and Mr. Lancaster contribute to it, and that a number of other gentlemen, agreeing with them in politics, also contribute. But this does not make Mr. Stuart their agent, so as to bind them by his acts, either criminally or civilly, no more than the manager of a club to which a gentleman may belong could make him responsible for the acts of that manager. Mr. Giffard, in his observations, referred to the case of Limpus v. General Omnibus Company. This case was governed by the law applicable to the relation of master and servant, which is different from that of principal and agent. The relation of master and servant imposes upon the master a liability for an unlawful act done by the servant in the course of his employment. and notwithstanding a prohibition which may have been given to him by the master; notwithstanding that the instant before an accident occurred he had impressed upon his servant or coachman the necessity for driving with the utmost possible care, if the next moment that man disobeys the order received from his master, and inflicts an injury upon another person the master is responsible for it; and why? Because the relation of master and servant exists between them, and creates the liability. But the ordinary rule with regard to principal and agent is, that the principal is only responsible for that which he authorises the agent to do, and in all other cases of which I am aware, except these Parliamentary cases, when you have a man who is sought to be made liable upon the acts of his agent, the question for inquiry is, did the principal give the agent authority to do the act? If that be negatived, the principal is not responsible. In my opinion, as at present advised, it would be necessary, in order to establish that a person had corruptly paid a rate when the rate was in fact paid by a third person, to show that that person was authorised by the person sought to be charged to pay the rate. The enactment is, that any person corruptly paying a rate on behalf of a ratepayer for the purpose of enabling him to be registered, is guilty of bribery, and my present opinion is, that in order to make a third person responsible for that act you must prove that he gave authority to the person to do the act. However, it is not necessary for me, as I have already said, to express any opinion upon that. I have pointed out what, in my judgment, is the difference between a partnership and this Liberal association; and there is no partnership privity between the parties subscribing, and no relation of principal and agent. In fact, Mr. Stewart is the Liberal Association, unless so far as the subscribers personally interfere, when of course they would be responsible for their own acts. In my judgment, subscribing to the fund, for the purpose of having the registration attended to in the borough, whether it be a Conservative association or a Liberal association, does not make the subscribers to that fund partners, and does not confer any authority upon the person who manages it, to make them responsible for an illegal act that may be done by the manager. I think, therefore, that the case against Mr. Woods and Mr. Lancaster fails so far as regards the payment of rates. The result is that I am of opinion that Mr. Woods and Mr. Lancaster were duly elected, and I shall so certify to the Speaker. The costs will follow the event. So far as the rates are concerned, it was an experiment, and that is a case in which the courts uniformly give costs. Upon the other grounds the petition has signally failed, and therefore the costs ought to follow the event.

Digitized by Google

Solicitors, Sharpe, Parker, and Co.; Cunliffe and Beaumont.

In Parliament.

Reported by Frederick Clifford, and Pembroke S. Stephens Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Thursday, April 15.

(Before Mr. St. Aubyn, Chairman; Sir J. Duckworth, and Mr. Rickards.)

Kew and other Bridges Bill.

Objection to locus standi of The Hammersmith Bridge Company.

Bridges—Competition—Wine and coal duties—Private Bill to accelerate operation of clause in Public Act—Application of public funds to injury of private company.

A public Act passed in 1868 contained a clause authorising the application in 1889 of that year's produce of the wine and coal duties for the purpose of freeing from toll certain suburban bridges. In the following session a private Bill was introduced to anticipate the revenue of 1889, and raise upon that security money which should be applicable to the immediate purchase of these bridges. The Bill was opposed by the proprietors of a toll bridge at H., so situated as to compete for traffic with one of the bridges which it was proposed to purchase:

Held, that the Bill was not such an execution of the Act of 1868 as precluded the H. Bridge Company from being heard in order to show that, having regard to the competition to which they would be subjected, the period fixed by Parliament for the purchase of the tolls ought not to be anticipated.

In 1868 an Act was passed, intituled "An Act to further continue and appropriate the London Coal and Wine Duties," by which the duties leviable by the Corporation of London upon coal and wine imported into the metropolitan police district were continued until 5th July 1889; and by sect. 5 of that Act it was provided that the said duties for the year ending on that date (being the last year for which they were continued) should be applied in the first instance in freeing from toll the following bridges on the Thames, viz., Kew, Kingston-on-Thames, Hampton Court, Walton-upon-Thames, and Staines; and next in making free from toll Chingford Bridge and Tottenham Mills Bridges upon the river Lea; and that if there should be any surplus remaining, the same should be applied as Parliament might thereafter direct.

It appeared that these provisions did not form part of the Bill as originally introduced, but were inserted in committee professedly for the purpose of compensating persons residing beyond the district of the Metropolitan Board of Works, but within the Metropolitan police district for the continuance of duties upon coal and wine consumed by them which would otherwise have been expended entirely upon improvements in the metropolis from which they derived no direct benefit. Moreover, the Bill was introduced and passed as a public bill, without the Gazette and newspaper notices required in the case of private bills; and the petitioners did not become aware of clause 5 until long after the Act was passed. The petitioners, the Hammersmith Bridge Company, were incorporated by 5 Geo. 4, and under that Act and 9 Geo. 4 had made and maintained Hammersmith Bridge, and three or four miles length of road in connection with the bridge, in the counties of Middlesex and Surrey, expending on these works the sum of 85,000*l.* They represented that the tolls leviable on their bridge were moderate in amount, while the annual expense of maintaining the bridge and roads was considerable, and the average interest derived upon the capital expended had been less than 2¼ per cent. per annum. They alleged that Kew Bridge (situate next above Hammersmith Bridge) was in direct competition with their undertaking for the traffic between London and Richmond, Kingston, Hampton Court, and the adjacent district; and that clause 5 in the Bill of 1868 would, if acted upon in 1889, divert a large amount of this traffic from Hammersmith to Kew Bridge.

The petitioners further alleged that, although they "are thus prejudiced by the legislation of last session, which they think would not have taken place without provision for protecting their interests if they had had an opportunity of being heard; and although it does not even carry out the principle upon which it was founded, inasmuch as one half of your petitioners' bridge, and the greater portion of their roads, are beyond the district of the Metropolitan Board of Works, and thus in precisely the same position as Kew-bridge and the other bridges specified in sect. 5 of the Act of 1868, yet, as the moneys applicable to the redemption of the tolls on these bridges will not be available under that Act for a period of twenty years hence, your petitioners would during that period have enjoyed a revenue undiminished by the diversion of traffic which would be occasioned by the removal of the tolls leviable on Kew-bridge, and gradually increasing with the ordinary increase of traffic on your petitioners' road and bridge. They would likewise have had full opportunity of representing their case to the Legislature, and of proving that their bridge should have been put on the same footing at Kew-bridge, for which purpose the coal and wine duties leviable in the year ending 5th July 1889 would afford ample funds.

"That a Bill, however, has been introduced into your honourable House in the present session, entitled 'A Bill for making Provision for the Execution of the London Coal and Wine Duties Continuance Act 1868, as far as it relates to the freeing from toll of the following bridges on the Thames, viz., Kew, Kingston-upon-Thames, Hampton Court, Walton-upon-Thames, and Staines, and Chingford-bridge, and Tottenham Mills Bridges, on the Lea, and for other purposes;' which proceeds upon a recital of the above-mentioned provision of the said Act of 1868, and on the allegation that it is expedient that the freeing of the said bridges from toll should be accelerated, and that accordingly the revenue to arise from the London coal and wine duties in the year ending 5th July 1889 should be anticipated.

Digitized by Google

"That the said Bill proposes to incorporate a joint committee of the Corporation of London and the Metropolitan Board of Works, to vest in that committee the said coal and wine duties for the year ending July 5, 1889; to empower the committee at any time after the passing of the Bill to purchase by agreement, or compulsorily under the provisions of the Lands Clauses Act, the undertakings of Kew-bridge and the other bridges specified in the Act of 1868, and for that purpose to borrow 150,000*l.* on the security of the said coal and wine duties for the year ending July 5, 1889; and to provide that, on the completion of each such purchase, toll shall for ever cease to be levied on the bridge so purchased, and the same shall become a county bridge, and be maintainable and repairable accordingly.

"That if the said Bill should receive the sanction of Parliament, Kew-bridge might, and probably would, be immediately purchased at the public expense, and your petitioners would be forthwith exposed to an unequal and unfair competition with a toll-free bridge, which could only result in a very great diminution of their traffic and revenue, while they would still remain bound to maintain the bridge and several miles of road.

"That the injustice thus inflicted on your petitioners would be further aggravated by their being compelled as proprietors of Hammersmith Bridge, which is heavily rated as real property in the counties of Middlesex and Surrey, to contribute towards the cost of maintaining the Kew and other bridges which are made county bridges by the said Bill, but which would under the Act of last session have remained repairable for the next twenty years at the cost of the persons using them. One of the effects of the Bill thus is, that your petitioners will actually be taxed for the support of an undertaking directly competing with their own.

"That it would be unjust to your petitioners to apply the public funds in question to the acquisition and freeing from toll of the Kew Bridge, without at the same time either compensating your petitioners for the loss thereby occasioned to them, or acquiring their undertaking on similar terms.

"That the effect of the Bill would be further injurious to your petitioners by diminishing so materially the value of their bridge as to enable the promoters hereafter to acquire it at a much diminished price, in the probable event of a demand on the part of the public that it too should be freed from toll. It is an admitted principle of legislation that public funds should not be employed in acquiring the undertaking of one private company so as to depreciate by an unequal competition the value of another undertaking of the same kind, and thus to pave the way for the acquisition of the latter at such depreciated amount."

The following were the objections to the locus standi:

1. That the only object of the Bill is to afford the means of accomplishing what was agreed to and sanctioned by Parliament in the last session by the 5th section of "'The London Coal and Wine Duties Continuance Act 1868"—namely, the freeing from toll of the several bridges named in the said section, Kew Bridge being one, and the objections of the petitioners to the freeing of Kew-Bridge ought to have been made when the said Act of 1868 was before Parliament, and cannot now be raised.

2. That the effect of an opposition by the petitioners would, if allowed, amount to a repeal of a public Act, namely, the said London Coal and Wine Duties Continuance Act 1868.

3. That Kew and Hammersmith bridges are not competing bridges.

4. That if it be admitted that the bridges are competing bridges, it is against the established practice of Parliament to allow the owners of one bridge to object to an Act of Parliament the effect of which may be to render that competition more effectual.

5. That Hammersmith Bridge, having been constructed afer Kew Bridge, became a competing bridge with the latter. The petitioners can have no locus standi to object to a reduction or total abolition of the tolls on a bridge with which they first entered into competition.

6. That the petitioners have no such interest in the provisions and objects of the Bill as will confer a locus standi.

Mundell, Q.C. for the petitioners.—The precedents are uniform to show that where a new bridge seeks to compete with an existing bridge, or any Bill is promoted which interferes with an already existing bridge, sanctioned by Parliament, a locus standi will be given to the latter to oppose the Bill: (Northampton and Banbury Junction Railway Bill 1866, on Petition of Trustees of the Tewkesbury Severn Bridge and Roads, Smeth. 158; Thames Subway Bill, Smeth. 162.) The case of the Albert Bridge (not reported) is a very cogent one. There a bridge was proposed to cross the Thames below Battersea, and the proprietors of Battersea Bridge were allowed to be heard against the Bill.

Mr. RICKARDS.—Did that case occur before the Referees?

Mundell.—No; it occurred before their time; but I have the facts from Mr. Cripps, who was counsel in the case. We have got, therefore, to this point, that competition would be a ground for a locus standi in the event of this being a new bridge. It is not denied that, assuming the Bill of last year to have been a private, not a public, Bill, if the promoters had then sought to throw Kew Bridge open by means of public money, we should have had a right to appear. Again, supposing that a Town Council seeks, by means of the municipal rates, to establish new gasworks, either it must make terms with the company with which it is competing, or the company must be allowed to appear. Or suppose there were two existing gasworks, and a municipal corporation proposed to buy up one of these, the other company would have a right to be heard against such a proposal, and to say, "No; you shall not apply your public funds so as to imperil our interests." If, therefore, the legislation of last year had been by private Bill, we should have been entitled to be heard, to say that public money shall not be so applied. Of course we bow to the decision of Parliament, as embodied in the public Bill, but now that the promoters seek to supplement it by private legislation, and to accelerate the Bill of last year by twenty years, we are certainly entitled to be heard. The money to be devoted to the redemption of the tolls on Kew-

Bridge is public money obtained by taxation over the district of the Metropolitan Board of Works, and as soon as ever Kew Bridge is free our revenue will decrease. The question is, whether we do not sustain such an injury from this legislation as will entitle us to say to the committee that one bridge ought not to be freed from toll unless the other is freed also. As to the objection that we are really asking for the repeal of the Act of 1868, we do not seek to interfere with the throwing open of Kew Bridge twenty years hence; but we object to its being thrown open twenty years before the term fixed by Parliament. It is alleged that Kew and Hammersmith are not competing bridges; but everyone knows better.

Mr. RICKARDS.—What is the distance between the two bridges?

Mundell.—Two miles. Then it is said that, assuming the two bridges to be competing, it is against the established practice of Parliament to allow the owners of one bridge to object to an Act of Parliament the effect of which may be to render the competition more effectual. This is not the case of a railway company doing something to make their route more convenient or shorter. No doubt, if the proposal were merely to shorten or improve the road to a particular bridge, you would not allow the proposers of a competing bridge to be heard. But here this Bill will put it out of our power to compete at all, because everybody will go by the toll-free bridge. Then as to objection 5, no doubt if the trustees of Kew Bridge were to say of their own mere motion, "We will abandon tolls," we could not be heard; but there is all the difference between such a proposal and the application of public money for an object which we say will destroy our property. The effect of the Bill will be that we shall lose the interest on capital expended under a Parliamentary guarantee, and Parliament will not allow our interest to be so prejudiced by means of public money. The tolls are higher on Kew Bridge than on ours. Therefore, if the public go by that route now in preference to ours, they will use it much more frequently when Kew Bridge is toll-free. Private interest is not to be sacrificed to public convenience in this way. Parliament has only said that Kew Bridge shall be thrown open in 1889. We wish to show the committee that it should not be thrown open without compensation to us before 1889.

Mr. RICKARDS.—Was the Bill of last year referred to the examiners? Public Bills sometimes are, when they affect private interests.

Mundell.—No; it was not referred to the examiners, nor did we petition against the clause, for we never heard of it till the Bill was passed.

Shrubsole (Parliamentary agent).—The Act of last year was a public Act. It was brought in at the instance of the Metropolitan Board of Works, the City of London, and Government as represented by the Chief Commissioner of Works, and its object was to continue the coal and wine duties now applied to metropolitan improvements, and to extend the right of the Metropolitan Board of Works and the Corporation of London to those dues for seven years beyond the time Parliament had limited, namely from 1882 to 1889. It was objected by certain persons who paid those dues, but lived beyond the area benefited by metropolitan improvements, that they ought to receive a quid pro quo for this prolongation. Accordingly the clause already mentioned was introduced, and if it had not been so introduced for the benefit of these outsiders, the Bill would never have passed. The only ground upon which Hammersmith Bridge can claim a locus standi is competition, and this Bill creates no such competition. The petitioners say that if Kew Bridge were made toll free they would be, as county ratepayers, contributing to the maintenance of a bridge in competition with theirs; but, being only individual ratepayers, represented by a public body, they would have no right to be heard on that ground. The two cases cited are not in point. They are cases in which private companies sought, for their own benefit, to do that which would divert traffic from an existing bridge or ferry. That is the only kind of competition in respect of which a locus standi could be allowed. But here, if any traffic is diverted from one bridge to another, it is diverted by a public Act and for the public benefit, not the benefit of a private company. There is no such competition as entitles the petitioners to be heard, and they have mistaken their remedy. They should go to Parliament and ask, through the proper authorities, that clause 5 should be extended to them. We only fulfil the intenions of the parties to the Act of 1868 in coming here and carrying out the bargain made with the public.

Mr. RICKARDS.—But you now seek, by a private Bill, to accelerate the period fixed in the public Act for throwing open the bridge.

Locus standi allowed.

Agents for the Bill, Dyson and Co.

Agent for petitioners, Grahames and Wardlaw.

Equity Courts.

COURT OF APPEAL IN CHANCERY.

Reported by THOMAS BROOKSBANK and E. STEWART ROCHE, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

April 17 and 19.

(Before the LORDS JUSTICES.)

Re BARNED'S BANKING COMPANY (LIMITED); ex parte THE BANK OF LONDON.

Companies in liquidation — Advances — Guarantee to induce payment of the advances by company which had given a counter-guarantee.

The bank of L. had made advances to M'H. upon the security of a guarantee by B. and Co. The loan was from time to time renewed, but ultimately the bank expressed its desire to have the transaction closed. M'H. and B. and Co. then induced the I. Association to grant M'H. a credit enabling him to discharge the debt, B. and Co. giving to the association a similar guarantee. Subsequently the bank gave to the association a counter-guarantee, by which they guaranteed to provide funds to meet the liability of the association in the event of B. and Co. making default; and upon this state of facts the bills given to secure the debt were renewed from time to time, and were ultimately met by the bank. All the companies were ordered to be wound-up, and upon the claim of the bank it was Held (reversing the decision of the M. R.), that B. and Co. were liable to the bank for the amount paid, inasmuch as the guarantee given by them entitled the bank which had paid the money to stand in the place of the association to whom it was given, a right which the bank had not in any way released by its counter-guarantee.

The position of the bank was not, by reason of its having been the original guarantor, at all affected; but it stood exactly as any third independent company, from which the association might have obtained such a guarantee would have stood on paying the amount of the advances.

Digitized by Google

This was an appeal by the liquidator of the Bank of London (Limited) against a decision of the Master of the Rolls disallowing a claim made by him as a creditor for 160,000*l.* against the estate of Barned's Banking Company (Limited), which is also in liquidation.

The circumstances were these:—

A gentleman named James M'Henry was, in the year 1864, and antecedently thereto, the financial agent of a railway in the United States of America, called the Atlantic and Great Western Railway Company; and in the course of large transactions between him and the appellant's company they accepted bills drawn by him for 200,000*l.* This sum was guaranteed to the Bank of London by the firm of Barned, Mozley, and Co., who were then carrying on business as bankers in Liverpool, under circumstances which are fully stated in the judgments which follow.

The bills were renewed from time to time at maturity, till Oct. 1864, when the Bank of London expressed their desire that the bills then about to become due should be met, and the transaction closed. Mr. M'Henry then applied to the Imperial Mercantile Credit Association, who agreed to advance him 200,000*l.* to meet the bills, Barned, Mozley, and Co. giving to the association a guarantee to the same effect as that which they had given to the appellants. The circumstances of this guarantee, and the instruments by which it was effected, are fully stated in the judgments.

In the autumn of 1864 a counter-guarantee was given by the Bank of London to the Imperial Mercantile Association, by which the bank agreed that if Barned, Mozley, and Co. made default in repayment of the advances for which their guarantee was given, they (the Bank of London) would provide the association with funds as if the engagement were their own. This counter-guarantee was from time to time renewed, when the bills current under the original guarantee were, on becoming due, renewed; and when the bills finally drawn became due, they were met and paid by the appellant bank out of their own funds, and they debited the Imperial Mercantile Association with the amount of those payments, which was ultimately reduced to the sum of 160,000*l.*

Barned, Mozley, and Co.'s business was in June 1865 acquired by a company incorporated under the Companies' Act 1862, which thereupon continued the old business under the title of Barned's Banking Company (Limited); but that company was in April 1866 ordered to be wound-up. Similar orders were made in the following months of May and June, in the matters of the Bank of London, and the Imperial Mercantile Credit Association. The former of these then carried in its claim for 160,000*l.* against Barned's Banking Company, and the claim was in the first instance admitted, and a dividend upon it was paid, but without prejudice to the right of Barned's Banking Company to dispute the claim altogether. Accordingly when a second dividend became payable, the official liquidator took out two summonses, one of which was to exclude the payment to the Bank of London of that contemplated dividend, and the other absolutely to expunge the admitted claim.

Upon these summonses it was argued on the part of the official liquidator that the counter guarantee was a release by the Bank of London of the original guarantee; and that, inasmuch as this company had given its guarantee, not to the Bank of London, but to the Imperial Association, and as that association had in fact never been called on to pay anything, Barned's Banking Company had not become liable for any amount whatever.

The Master of the Rolls disallowed the claim of the Bank of London, whose liquidator now appealed.

Sir Roundell Palmer, Q.C., and Robinson, supported the appeal, and Sir Richard Baggallay, Q.C., and Kekewich, his Lordship's order.

Sir Roundell Palmer, Q.C., having replied.

Lord Justice SELWYN said:—In this case there is no substantial difference or dispute between the parties now before us, with respect to any of the facts in the case, although there appears from the shorthand writer's notes of the judgment of the Master of the Rolls, either to have been some mistake in that shorthand writer's report, or some misapprehension on the part of his Lordship with respect to the facts, for his Lordship says in one part of his judgment: "It was in point of fact a mere paper transaction as far as they were concerned, to make the books of the Bank of London look more favourable in respect of the advances to Mr. M'Henry." And then his Lordship says, in another part of the judgment, "And now the Bank of London, who have paid nothing, and although they could recover nothing from the association, seek to enforce one of the guarantees given to the association against one of the guarantors viz., Barned's Banking Company."

Now, that which was the foundation of the whole of this transaction, appears very clearly from the 4th paragraph of Mr. Mozley's affidavit, in which he says, "My said firm was in Oct. 1864 liable for 200,000*l.* under certain guarantees which it had given to the Bank of London on account of Mr. M'Henry." Therefore, so far from this having been a paper transaction, and so far from nothing having been paid by the Bank of London, the substance of the transaction is that, whereas in Oct. 1864 the firm of Barned and Co., afterwards transformed into Barned's Banking Company, the limited company, was liable for the 160,000*l.* under the guarantees given to the Bank of London on account of James M'Henry (he having been unable to pay), by means of money paid by the Bank of London that liability on the part of Barned, Mozley, and Co., and the limited company, has been got rid of, and this was a substantial benefit to them in respect of the guarantee given by them, and we have now to decide whether the subsequent transactions have relieved them of their liability.

They being, in Oct. 1864, under the liability so stated by Mr. Mozley in his affidavit, it appears that in Nov. 1864, Mr. M'Henry, the person ultimately liable, writes a letter in which he says, "I shall be obliged by your opening a credit for this railway" (that is the Atlantic and Great Western) "to the extent of 200,000*l.*, for which I engage to lodge securities of this company, at 50 per cent., with the guarantee of Messrs. J. Barned and Company, bankers, of Liverpool, as well as the guarantee of the Bank of London, for the due payment of the amount." That was the proposal upon which was based the subsequent arrangement, and that proposal was carried into execution by letter of the 9th Nov. 1864, in which Messrs. Barned and Company give a guarantee to the Imperial Association. "In consideration of your advancing to James M'Henry the sum of 50,000*l.* (say fifty thousand pounds) on loan for six months, repayable on May 5th, 1865, on the deposit of securities as per note at foot, we guarantee the repayment of the said loan to you at maturity, it being understood that, on the said loan being repaid, you are to hand the said securities to us." That is a clear plain guarantee to the Imperial Association for that sum of 50,000*l.* There were three other sums of 50,000*l.* advanced, making an advance altogether of 200,000*l.*, and, in point of fact, that 200,000*l.* was advanced to Mr. M'Henry, and was so advanced by the Imperial Mercantile Association, or by the Bank of London, at the request of the Imperial Mercantile Association, on the faith of the guarantee.

It is unnecessary to pursue, in detail, the subsequent renewals. On each of those occasions a guarantee was given in the same form, and on each occasion the counter guarantee was given by the Bank of London, with which I will deal presently. That brings us to the last transaction which was with reference to the bills upon which the claim is now made, and which were paid by the Bank of London. That was on the 5th Feb. 1866, which was the date of the last guarantee. That letter is a letter signed by Mr. Charles Mozley, the managing director of the limited company, and it says, "Referring to our letter of the 5th Aug. 1865, guaranteeing four several advances of 50,000*l.* each made by you to Mr. James M'Henry against certain securities deposited with the Bank of England, in consideration of your continuing such advances to the extent of 160,000*l.* for a further period of six months from the date on which each advance matures, say 10,000*l.* due Feb. 5th continued to Aug. 5th 1866; 50,000*l.* due March 9th continued to Sept. 9th; 50,000*l.* due March 27th continued to Sept. 27th; and 50,000*l.* due April 4th continued to Oct 4th; in all 160,000*l.*, we guarantee the repayment of such renewed advances on the dates they respectively become due. Annexed we specify the securities deposited at the Bank of England, and it is understood that against these securities, or such other securities as may be created in respect of them, say certificates of debenture, equipment mortgage bonds, or consolidated bonds, we hereby give you full lien thereon to secure payment of the amounts at maturity. The securities are to be delivered to us on the said securities being repaid." There again is a clear express guarantee given by the limited company; in fact, a renewal of that guarantee which had existed, as stated in Mr. Mozley's affidavit, in Nov. 1864 and previously; and, in point of fact, it appears that by reason of some of these transactions, that original liability had been considerably reduced. All that the limited company did was to give this guarantee for 160,000*l.*

Then the question which we have to decide is a question of fact, viz., was a sum of money advanced by the person to whom that guarantee was given on the faith and by virtue of that guarantee? Upon that I entertain no doubt whatever. In fact, his Lordship the Master of the Rolls, in another passage of his judgment, says: "The bills were paid, and it was the Bank of London who paid those bills." In point of fact, the bills were paid. By whom were they paid? They were paid, it is admitted, not by the Imperial Association by their own funds, but, at their request, by the Bank of London, and they were debited by the Bank of London for every shilling of that 160,000*l.* As I suggested in the course of the argument, supposing the Imperial Mercantile Association, instead of going to the Bank of London, who had been mixed up in these transactions before, had gone to another company, or some private bank, and had requested them to accept and to meet these bills for 160,000*l.*, and that had been done at their request, and they had been debited with that sum of money, could it then be said that the Imperial Association were not entitled, having in fact found the money, in consequence of their request, to sue Barned's Banking Company upon that? I think they would be entitled to sue in that way. It is admitted that there is no distinction to be drawn between the proof made nominally by the Bank of London and the Imperial Association. If the Imperial Association is entitled to such proof, then the proof of the Bank of London ought to be allowed to stand.

The only remaining question is, whether the existence of the counter guarantee which was given by the Bank of London to the Imperial Association makes any difference? It fortunately happens that that transaction has been four times repeated in four different forms. We have no difficulty, therefore, in ascertaining what was the real object and intention of that transaction and the real meaning of the parties; because, although these letters are written in a mercantile form, they are free from ambiguity. Take, for instance, the first one, which is the counter guarantee given at the date of the 9th Nov. 1864, and is in these words: "We guarantee to you the due fulfilment of the enclosed obligation." On the second occasion, on the 13th May 1865, it is in these words, "In default of repayment by Messrs. Barned and Co. of the several amounts specified in their guarantee, endorsed hereon, on the several days of payment on which the same become due, we hereby undertake to provide you with funds as if the engagement were our own." On the third occasion, which is on the 5th Aug. 1865, it is expressed in these words, but exactly to the same effect: "In the event of Messrs. Barned and Co. failing to pay the various instalments of the above advance of 200,000*l.* at the dates at which they severally fall due, we hereby undertake to do so." And on the last occasion, that being the most material as being the one actually in existence, the 10th Feb. 1866, it is expressed thus: "In the event of Messrs. Barned and Co. failing to put you in funds to meet the several sums, amounting in all to 160,000*l.*, on the dates they severally fall due, as detailed in this letter of guarantee, we hereby undertake to do so."

It being, as I have already said, clearly established that the money was paid at the request of the Imperial Association, and that, if they had obtained that money from any other bankers, they would be clearly entitled to sue in respect of the moneys so obtained and so paid, we have to decide whether this counter guarantee is a release of Barned's Bank. So far from there being any sort of intention to release them from the obligation, in each one of the counter guarantees, in the four forms in which they appear, the existence and continuance of that obligation on the part of Messrs. Barned and Co. is most plainly and clearly expressed. So far from there being any intention to put an end to it, it is the foundation of each of these counter guarantees that that liability is to continue; but in the event of that liability becoming incapable of being enforced, either wholly or in part, there is a counter guarantee given by the Bank of London. There is no agreement to release Messrs. Barneds, and there was no intention to release them. The existence of such guarantee by the Bank of London was wholly unknown to Messrs. Barneds; for Mr. Mozley says, "I and my said firm were in no way party to, and knew nothing of, the subsidiary arrangement, which, I have since learnt, was made between the Imperial Association and the Bank of London." There was, therefore, no intention or agreement to release them, and no communication of the instruments which are supposed to amount to a release.

The only remaining question is, Is there in point of law any such release? No such rule of law has been referred to, and I am at a loss to imagine how it could be supposed to exist as applicable to such a case. A counter guarantee was given by the Bank of London. It was a transaction they might have put an end to; it was not communicated to Barned's Banking Company at all, and cannot amount to a release of the obligation previously existing on the part of Messrs. Barned and Co.

Digitized by Google

Therefore, the whole of the case appears to me to be in accordance with what my learned brother has, during the argument, called the substance of the case. Messrs. Barned and Co. having come under serious liability, and that having been continued and undertaken by the limited company succeeding Messrs. Barned, they have been released from that to a very considerable extent at the expense of the Bank of London, who advanced this sum of money at the request of the Imperial Association. I think the proof ought to be allowed to continue, and that, therefore, the order made by his Lordship upon this application should have been, and must now be by us, an order refusing both the applications on the part of Barned's Bank with costs. There will be no costs of the appeal.

Lord Justice GIFFARD said:—As to the facts of this case there is no dispute whatever, and, so far as it is necessary to advert to them, they may be stated shortly. [Having stated the facts he proceeded:] Assuming that there had been no counter guarantee by the Bank of London, I cannot conceive any question could have been raised, because there was the simple transaction tion of the Imperial Mercantile Association requesting the Bank of London to make advances, which would, in point of law, be advances by the Mercantile Association to Mr. M'Henry, and there is no question but that those advances were made. Can such a transaction as that be affected by the fact of there being this counter guarantee. For that is really the substance of the case. The counter guarantee (I read only the last one, for they are in substance all the same), is in these words: "In the event of Messrs. Barned and Co. failing to put you in funds to meet the several sums, amounting in all to 160,000*l.* on the dates they severally fall due, as detailed in this letter of guarantee, we hereby undertake to do so." I confess I cannot by possibility understand how that guarantee could have prevented the Mercantile Association from recovering from Barned and Co. every sixpence which had been advanced at their request by the Bank of London and M'Henry. It seems to me that the transaction is precisely the same as though no such guarantee as that ever existed; and, that being so, the result, of course, must be that the application on the part of Barned's Bank must be dismissed, and must be dismissed with costs; and I have no hesitation in saying that a contrary decision would be most unjust. It would in point of fact be releasing Barned and Co., from a liability under which they were beyond all question (I mean the original liability for 200,000*l.*, when they gave the direct guarantee to the London Bank), although they have got the full benefit of all the subsequent transactions, and although the intention of every party was that they should be liable.

Solicitors for the appellants, the Bank of London, Cotterill and Sons.

Solicitors for the official liquidator of Barned's Banking Company, Freshfields.

April 24 and 26.

(Before the LORDS JUSTICES.)

HOLLAND v. HOLLAND.

Trustee—Acceptance of trust by deed—Breach of trust—Simple contract debt—Specialty.

Where there is an acceptance of a trusteeship under seal, and nothing more, that does not amount to a covenant by the trustee.

And consequently cestuis que trust of a defaulting trustee who had been appointed by a deed which merely contained a recital that it was desired to appoint him, and in the operative part, his appointment in pursuance of that desire, were Held, differing from Stuart, V.C., not to be specialty creditors in a suit to administer the trustee's estate.

This was an appeal by certain simple contract creditors of a Mr. Cooke, deceased, the testator in the cause, against an order of Stuart, V.C., which decided that the respondents, who were interested in a trust estate to which Mr. Cooke was a defaulting trustee, were entitled to such as specialty creditors against his estate.

The hearing before His Honour is reported ante page 58, where all necessary statements will be found.

Charles Hall and Speed supported the appeal, and Dickinson, Q. C. and Davey supported the order of the Vice-Chancellor.

The authorities referred to were
Adey v. Arnold, 2 De G. M. & G. 432;
Wynch v. Grant, 2 Drew. 312;
Isaacson v. Harwood, L. Rep. 3 Ch. App. 225; 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 622;
Giffard v. Manley, Cas. temp. Talbot, 109;
Turner v. Wardle, 7 Sim. 80;
Wood v. Hardisty, 2 Coll. Ch. Cas. 542;
Benson v. Benson, 1 P. Wms. 130;
Richardson v. Jenkins, 1 Drew. 477;
Marryat v. Marryat, 28 Beav. 224; 2 L. T. Rep. N. S. 531.

Lord Justice SELWYN said: The first question which arises in this case is a question upon the construction of the deed of the 10th Dec. 1859, by which the testator, whose estate is being administered in this suit, was appointed trustee; and the question is whether that deed is to be construed as containing anything more than an appointment of the testator to a certain trusteeship on the one hand, and an acceptance by him of that trusteeship on the other, or whether it ought to be construed as containing a covenant, or words equivalent to a covenant, on his part to do some special act, or to perform some duty. It has been argued that, as the acceptance of the trust is twice referred to in the deed, it must be construed as if something more than a mere acceptance of the trust was intended, and that something more than such a mere acceptance must be implied. If that acceptance had been twice referred to in the recital, or twice in the operative part of the deed, there would have been considerable force in that argument. But we find that it is only mentioned once in the recitals and once in the operative part of the deed, the effect of the recital being that the parties beneficially interested under the trust were desirous that Frederick Cooke should be appointed a trustee in the room of Millington, the deceased trustee, and that Frederick Cooke had consented and agreed to become a trustee; and then the operative and the material part of the deed is "that the said Frederick Cooke did thereby testify and declare his acceptance of the trusteeship."

Digitized by Google

We find, therefore, in this recital one and the same thing referred to as a thing proposed to be done, and then, according to the usual form adopted by conveyancers, that one and the same thing is witnessed to have been done by the operative part of the deed. I think that both the recital and the operative part have one and the same object and effect—viz., the appointment to the trusteeship on the one hand, and the acceptance of it on the other. But there is no express covenant to do any special act nor to perform any duty, and I think that no such covenant can be implied. The case of Courtney v. Taylor, 6 M. & G. and the case of Marryat v. Marryat (sup.) are the authorities which go in support of this conclusion.

Assuming then this to be the true construction of the deed, the next and the only remaining question is whether, in consequence of the acceptance of the trusteeship by an instrument under seal, the present debt and (as the argument has been properly and necessarily put) every other debt which could be proved against Cooke's estate, in respect of this trusteeship, ought to be considered as a specialty debt. In my judgment it is concluded by authority. The case of Adey v. Arnold was decided by Lord St. Leonards in 1852 when sitting in the Court of Appeal, and it therefore possesses, as I need not say, very great weight. In that case the deed was executed by the trustee, and therefore in my judgment that clearly amounted to an acceptance of the trust by him under seal, and that decision, so far as I know, has never since been questioned. But in the present case the learned Vice-Chancellor has not in any degree impugned the authority of Adey v. Arnold; for his Honour appears to have been misinformed upon a matter of fact, and to have supposed that, in the case of Adey v. Arnold the deed was not executed by the trustee; and, but for that misapprehension, I think it probable his Honour's decision would have been opposite to what it has been.

On the other hand, the decision of Adey v. Arnold has been followed by Kindersley, V. C. in the case of Wynch v. Grant, by the Lord Chancellor of Ireland in Newport v. Bryan, 5 Ir. Ch. Rep., and by Lord Cairns in the case of Isaacson v. Harwood (sup.). I think that the case of Wood v. Hardisty cannot be considered as an interruption to the line of authorities, nor as in any degree questioning the authority of Adey v. Arnold; for in that case there was this express declaration, as appears in page 542 of the second volume of Collyer's Reports: "Subject to the trusts aforesaid, the said William Forbes, his executors, administrators, and assigns, shall stand possessed of the said policies of assurance, and of the moneys, bonuses, and accumulations to be received in respect thereof, and of all others the premises hereby assumed, or intended so to be, upon trust for the said Susan, her executors, administrators, and assigns, for her and their own absolute use and benefit." In that case Adey v. Arnold does not appear to have been cited, but the able counsel who argued the case for the defendants is stated simply to have argued that "a breach of trust generally created a simple contract debt: Vernon v. Vawdrey, Cox v. Bateman; but he was not prepared to say that it might not be otherwise when the trust was declared by an instrument under seal." And in that case the learned Vice-Chancellor says: "Unless any further authorities were cited for the defendants, he should yield, though somewhat reluctantly, to those which had been cited for the plaintiff." Wood v. Hardisty was before Adey v. Arnold, but I think that, under the circumstances which I have mentioned, it cannot be considered a case in opposition to Adey v. Arnold; and if it were, of course the previous decision of the Vice-Chancellor must be treated as subordinate in point of authority to the subsequent decision of the Lord Chancellor sitting in the Court of Appeal. I think, therefore, that we may take it that since the decision of Adey v. Arnold, there has been a stream of authorities flowing in the same direction, never in any way interrupted or questioned.

I think, therefore, both upon principle and authority, that it must be held that the mere fact of a trustee being a party to and executing a deed by which he is appointed trustee, and accepting the office, is not of itself sufficient to justify the court in holding that the debt is of such a character as to constitute a specialty debt. I am of opinion, therefore, that the order of the Vice-Chancellor should be discharged, and we must reverse it with the costs of the application in the court below to vary the certificate of the chief clerk. I think also that the costs of the application ought to be costs in the cause, but the respondents to this appeal must bear their own costs.

Lord Justice GIFFARD.—This case has been very ably argued, and I am quite satisfied that we have heard everything that could be said in support of the decision of the court below, and the utmost that ingenuity could have imagined; but I must say that to me it appears a very plain case, both upon authority and upon principle.

Now, as regards the authorities, I do not think it necessary to refer to more than two cases—the one before Lord St. Leonards, and the other before Lord Cairns. I quite agree that the case which was before Lord Cairns is not a case similar to this; but he laid down the principles which are applicable to these cases, and he put it simply in this way, namely, that you are to inquire what it was that the parties meant. In Adey v. Arnold what Lord St. Leonards said was that the court would not raise a covenant without necessity, which I apprehend meant this—that if, from the nature of the transaction, you infer that a covenant was intended, you will raise it, although there are not apt words such as are usually found when a covenant is intended. But, on the other hand, if from the nature of the transaction, you do not infer that a covenant was intended, then you will not imply it.

Now, what is it we have to deal with in this case? First there is a power to appoint new trustees in the ordinary form, and then there is a power (these being tenants for life) to consent, and the continuing trustee is to appoint. That power is executed in this way. There is a deed to which the tenants for life are parties, to which the continuing trustee is a party, and to which the intended new trustee is a party; and the object of that deed is twofold—first of all, to appoint a new trustee, and, secondly, to convey the property to him. It has no other object or purpose whatever, and if you look at the deed I must say that anything less likely or less to be inferred from the deed than that the one trustee should covenant with the other, I never saw on the face of any deed. That was not by any means the purpose of the deed: it was simply the appointment of a new trustee, and a simple conveyance of the trust property to that new trustee; and I cannot see that the witnessing part of the deed goes at all further than the recital. There is a recital that the new trustee has consented and agreed to become a trustee, and the witnessing part of the deed is that the trustee testifies and declares his acceptance of the trust; and these, in my opinion, amount to nothing more or less than that, by executing that deed, he precludes himself from saying afterwards that he did not consent to become a trustee.

Well, then, what is the clear conclusion to be drawn from the case of Adey v. Arnold? It is simply this and nothing else: that where there is an acceptance of a trusteeship under seal that does not amount to a covenant. Here this deed, if you look at it fairly to see what the object and intent of it were and what was really done, amounts, you will find, to nothing more or less than the mere acceptance of the trusteeship under seal, and that being so, no covenant is to be implied, and I am satisfied that no covenant was intended.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the decision of the court below must be reversed. The costs, as my learned brother has said, of the appeal as regards the appellants will be added to their costs in this cause; the respondents will have no costs of the appeal, and they must pay the costs in the court below of this application.

I have only one word to add: It has been suggested that there may be such a thing as a specialty in equity which is not a specialty at law; but I do not hesitate to say in the plainest possible language that if there be not a specialty at all, and not a state of things such that an action at law can be maintained, in equity all debts rank pari passu, and there is no distinction between one description of debt and another, whether they be or be not specialty debts.

Solicitor for the simple contract creditors appealing, Alger.

Solicitor for the respondents, Kearsey.

Friday, July 9.

(Before Lord Justice GIFFARD.)

Re THE JOINT STOCK DISCOUNT COMPANY (LIMITED);

DR. FYFE'S CASE.

Winding-up—Transfer—Non-registration at commencement of winding-up—Delay of transferror.

F., on the register of the company for twenty shares, executed a transfer of them to S., by whom it was also executed, and it was left at the company's office for registration on the 15*th Feb.* 1866. A board meeting was held on the 1*st March, but from some unexplained cause the transfer was not then registered. On the* 7*th March* 1866 a petition to wind-up the company was presented, and on the 17*th a winding-up order was made. F.'s name continued on the register, and he was summoned in June* 1866 to show cause why his name should not be placed on the list of contributories. According to his affidavit he "successfully resisted" the summons, but his name was not removed, nor did it appear to have been settled on the list, as in April 1869 a summons to settle him finally on the list was served on him on the part of the official liquidator. Upon this he applied to have his name removed, and it was Held (reversing the decision of the Master of the Rolls), that as the delay in registering the transfer was the fault of the company, and as it was not incumbent on F. to procure the substitution of S.'s name for his own, and as there had been no delay at all on the part of F., his name must be removed from the list.

This was an appeal against a decision of the Master of the Rolls, whereby the name of Dr. Andrew Fyfe, the appellant, had been settled on the list of contributories of this company, which is now being wound-up in his Lordship's chambers, in respect of twenty shares.

The main circumstances upon which the liability of Dr. Fyfe depended were brought before the court on the admissions by the parties to the following effect:—

That on the 7th March 1866 a petition to wind-up the company by the court was presented, and that an order in conformity with its prayer was made on the 17th March. That Dr. Fyfe was, prior to the winding-up, the duly registered holder of twenty shares, and that before the commencement of the winding-up, he executed a proper transfer of them to one James Strawbridge, by whom the transfer was also duly executed. That this transfer was lodged with the company for registration on the 15th Feb. 1866, but that it was never in fact registered. That James Strawbridge had died on the 28th June 1867 intestate, and that no administration to him had ever been taken out.

It also appeared that on the 1st March 1866 a meeting of the board had been held, at which, in the ordinary course of business, the transfer ought to have been registered, and it was not explained why this was not done.

In June 1866 a meeting was held to settle the list of contributories, and according to Dr. Fyfe's statement, he attended that meeting, and "successfully resisted" the insertion in that list of his name. From that time he took no steps in the matter, and was not applied to again on behalf of the official liquidator, until he received notice of a summons for the 22nd April 1869, calling on him and numerous other alleged contributories to show cause why they should not be finally settled on the list. He then applied by summons to have his name removed, and the summons was adjourned into court, when, on the 11th June, the Master of the Rolls decided that his name must be retained on the list. His Lordship came to that conclusion on the ground that in June 1866 Dr. Fyfe was aware that his name, the transfer notwithstanding, was still on the register of members, and that he had done nothing to substitute the name of Mr. Strawbridge for his own, although Strawbridge had not died for upwards of a year after that time.

The articles of association of the company provided (8) that until substitution on the register of a transferree, the transferror should continue to be deemed a shareholder, and (10) that the directors should have power to refuse to register a transfer presented to them for that purpose.

Jackson, for Dr. Fyfe, contended that it was by default of the company that the transfer was not registered in the first instance; that there was no delay on the part of Dr. Fyfe, who had, as he believed, resisted with success the insertion of his name in June 1866, and was entitled to rest content with that; that it was no part of his duty to procure substitution of another name when he sought to remove his own.

Lord Justice GIFFARD.—Has the court ever removed one name without substituting another for it?

Dickinson, Q. C. as amicus curiæ, referred to Re The Asiatic Banking Corporation; ex parte The Royal Bank of India, 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 805.

Jackson also contended that the summons in April last of the official liquidator showed that the matter was not concluded against Dr. Fyfe, and consequently that he had not acquiesced in the insertion of his name.

Locock Webb (with him Jessel, Q. C.) supported his Lordship's order, relying principally upon the above mentioned clauses of the articles of association, on the delay from June 1866, and on the absence of any representative of Mr. Strawbridge. He contended that it was Dr. Fyfe's duty if he claimed immunity for himself to procure the substitution of the name of his transferee.

The authorities cited were,

Digitized by Google

Nation's case; Re Joint Stock Discount Company, L. Rep. 3 Eq. 77; 15 L. T. Rep. N. S. 308;
Hill's case, unreported;
Shepherd's case; Re The Joint Stock Discount Company, L. Rep. 2 Ch. App. 16; 15 L. T. Rep. N. S. 198;
Shercell's case; Re Mexican and South American Company, L. Rep. 2 Ch. App. 387; 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 194;
Sichell's case; Re Joint Stock Discount Company, L. Rep. 3 Ch. App. 119; 17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 363; Shipman's case; Re Joint Stock Discount Company, L. Rep. 5 Eq. 219.

Lord Justice GIFFARD said:—I am of opinion that in this case Dr. Fyfe's name ought not to be on this list of contributories. Reference has been made to the 8th article and the 10th article of the deed of settlement of this particular company. Those articles would, I think, have affected Hill's case, if not Nation's case, but it is enough for me to say this, that as this transfer was made on the 15th Feb. 1866, and there was a meeting on the 1st March, at which this transfer ought to have been registered, unless objection was made, and no objection was made, and bearing in mind besides that Mr. Strawbridge was actually a shareholder in this company, I do not think that those articles have any application. There was plain delay and plain laches on the part of the company in not registering the transfer on the 1st March. I cannot doubt that, if this application had been made immediately after the winding-up, the Master of the Rolls would have considered that this case would have stood on the same basis as Nation's case and Hill's case, and he would have taken Dr. Fyfe's name off the list of contributories. The ground on which he proceeded was Dr. Fyfe's delay. In my opinion there has been no delay whatever on the part of Dr. Fyfe, nor do I think this case in the least degree affected by Sichell's case. I take Sichell's case to be this, and nothing else—that if you have a name on the register it may be the name of a person who has a right to have some other name in its place; but if that person is content that his name shall remain on the register, the official liquidator cannot come forward and ask that that name shall be taken off the register, and to substitute some other person's. That is the whole of Sichell's case, and it does not at all follow from Sichell's case that, if two persons went to the official liquidator without any improper delay at all, and said, "This case comes within Hill's case or Nation's case," that the official liquidator must necessarily have an order for the purpose of removing the name of the transferror.

When we come to the facts of the case the matter seems to me to be entirely concluded by the course taken by the official liquidator himself, because by his summons as late as the 22nd April 1869, he calls upon a number of persons, and amongst others on Dr. Fyfe, to show cause why his name should not then be settled on the list of contributories. If that is so, can I hold because Dr. Fyfe's name was, owing to the laches of the company, on the list of shareholders, that, therefore, it was on the list of contributories up to the date when that summons was served? Clearly it was not on the list of contributories, because, if it had been, this summons would have been wholly erroneous; but this summons was made the foundation of the proceedings, and is the summons upon which Dr. Fyfe's name has been put on the list. That being so, there being no delay, I hold this case to be precisely in the same situation as if Dr. Fyfe had made this application immediately after the date of the winding-up. If he had made this application then, it would have been impossible to raise any distinction between this case, Hill's case, and Nation's case, and the principle laid down in Shepherd's case. I consider those cases binding, and that the question raised by them is not now open to be considered by this court, and, that being so, that Dr. Fyfe's name should not be on the list of contributories.

The only other point is the absence of Strawbridge's executors. That is not material. It is not essential to Dr. Fyfe's case that he should put any other name on the list: it is enough for him to say, "I have been put improperly on the list." I am of opinion that he is improperly on the list. As regards the costs Dr. Fyfe will have his costs in the court below, and there will be no costs of the appeal, but the official liquidator will have his costs below, and in this appeal out of the estate of the company.

Solicitors for the appellant, Walker and Sons.

Solicitors for the official liquidator, Lawrence, Plews, and Boyer.

V. C. MALINS' COURT.

Reported by G. T. EDWARDS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Thursday, June 24.

Re MORLEY.

MORLEY v. SAUNDERS.

Set-off—Charge for younger children—Tenant for life in possession—Legacy left to him—Interest on charge unpaid.

M., being entitled (as a younger child) to a portion of a charge upon an estate, the tenant for life only partially kept down the interest, and M. by her will left him 1000l. On his death more than that sum was due to M.'s estate in respect of the unpaid interest, and the question was whether there was a right of set-off:

Held, there was not.

This suit was instituted by administration summons by a legatee under the will of Mary Morley, the question being, whether Mary Morley, being entitled to a charge on property of which Francis Morley was in possession, and of which he had not kept down the interest, and she having left him 1000*l.* by her will, as between her representatives and his, there was a right of set-off. The matter came on upon a claim by Charlotte Morley, administratrix of Francis Morley, as a pecuniary legatee of Mary Morley. The chief clerk by his certificate found that the defendant, William Allen Francis Saunders was the executor of Mary Morley, whose debts and funeral expenses were paid, and who by her will gave the sum of 1000*l.* to Francis Morley (her brother), 2500*l.* to her sister Dorothy Saunders (wife of the defendant) and other legacies to be paid out of 4500*l.* to which she was entitled under the will of her father Josias Readshaw Morley. By his will the testator devised to Gabriel Fielding and Octavius Leefe, their heirs and assigns, the Marrick estate, in the county of York, to the use of the testator's brothers, John Readshaw Morley, and Matthew Morley, their executors, administrators, and assigns, for the term of 500 years, and subject thereto to the use of his son Francis Morley (who was then sixteen years old) for his life, with remainder to his children in tail, with remainders over. The trusts of the term of 500 years were to raise by mortgage, sale, or otherwise, 9000*l.* with interest at 4*l.* per cent. from the date of the testator's death, and to receive the rents of the said Marrick estate, and after keeping down thereout the interest on the said charge of 9000*l.*, to pay an annuity of 100*l.* to the testator's son, John Morley for his life, and an annuity of 300*l.* to the testator's wife, Jane Morley, for life, and to permit the residue of the rents to be received by the person or persons for the time being entitled to the reversion expectant on the determination of the said term of 500 years. And the testator declared that the said sum of 9000*l.* so directed to be raised should be for the benefit of the testator's son Thomas Morley (since deceased), and his daughters, the said testatrix Mary Morley and Dorothy Saunders, in shares of 3000*l.* each, to be vested interests, on their attaining twenty-one, or, as to the daughters, on their marriage under age, with benefit of survivorship.

Digitized by Google

John Morley died in March 1829, and his annuity then fell in. Thomas Morley died on the 9th Nov. 1855, under age and intestate, and his share of the 9000*l.* accrued to the testatrix Mary Morley and Dorothy Saunders. On the death of the testator, Josias Readshaw Morley, in Feb. 1827, the trustees entered on the Marrick estate, but the 9000*l.* had never been raised. In 1832 the eldest son, Francis Morley, attained twenty-one, and was allowed to enter into possession of the estate by the trustees of the term as tenant for life. He made some payments to Mary Morley on account of interest in respect of her share of the 9000*l.*, but did not pay it in full, and at her death there was due to her from him more than 1000*l.* Francis Morley died in Aug. 1854, and his eldest son succeeded as tenant in tail. Under these circumstances, the administratrix of Francis Morley claimed the legacy of 1000*l.*, and the question was whether, there being more than 1000*l.* due to Mary Morley in respect of his default in paying the interest on the 9000*l.*, one could be set off against the other.

Cotton, Q. C. and Joliffe, for the executors of Francis Morley, insisted that there was no right of set-off. The remedy of Mary Morley's representatives was against the estate, and whatever question there might be as between the executors of Francis Morley and those entitled in remainder, there was none as between them and the estate of the testatrix. There must be two parties to a set-off; and there being a clear right on the part of the executors to the legacy, if the doctrine of set-off applied, there must also be an equally good legal and equitable right by the representative of Mary Morley, which there was not. It might be said, perhaps, that there was a moral obligation to keep down the interest on the part of a tenant for life who was in the possession of an estate upon which there was a charge, but it was nothing more; and admitting that Francis Morley was in the possession, clothed with that obligation, that did not confer a right of set-off nor retainer, and the claim for the legacy must be sustained.

Glasse, Q. C. and North, for the representative of Mary Morley, contended that although this might not be a case of set-off proper, there was a right of retainer. The obligation must be taken to have been known to the trustees and to Francis Morley: (Courtney v. Williams, 3 Hare, 539; 15 Jur., N. S.) The object here was to throw the executor of Mary Morley upon the remainderman, when he would get nothing, the statute having run. What had been done was a breach of trust, and a bill might have been filed, and a decree made for the payment of the money, therefore it was a personal demand, which would extend even to an agent. It was not the case of an outsider, but a direct trust to raise 9000*l.* with interest at 4*l.* per cent., and to receive the rents after keeping down the interest, and paying annuities, and permit the residue to be received by the reversioner of the term:

Dixon v. Peacock, 3 Dr. 288;

Makings v. Makings, 1 De G. F. & J. 358.

The whole rents were received with notice of the trust and bequest in favour of younger children.

Cotton, Q. C. in reply.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—This question involves a claim by the legal personal representatives of Francis Morley to a legacy of 1000*l.*, given to him by the will of Mary Morley, and it is rested on the ground that Mary Morley had a charge of 4000*l.* on a real estate in Yorkshire, of which Francis Morley was tenant for life. As soon as Francis Morley came of age the trustees of a term of 500 years, who were in possession, let Francis Morley into possession, and it is admitted that that was clothed with the obligation upon the part of Francis Morley to keep down the interest of 9000*l.*, a charge created by the term, of which Mary Morley was entitled to 4000*l.* The chief clerk has found that Francis Morley made some payment on account of such interest, but that there was more than 1000*l.* due on such account at the time of his death. Now, if Francis Morley had been indebted to Mary Morley for the amount of arrears of rent so received and retained, instead of being applied in payment of the interest, it would necessarily follow that being so indebted, and having a claim on her estate, one can be set-off against the other, and the legacy of 1000*l.* would be thereby annihilated. But was he indebted to her estate? if so, the consequence would be, if he owed her 1000*l.* his claim, whatever it was, must be 1000*l.* less. But it is clear on principle that Mary Morley not having received interest on the charge of 4000*l.* to which she was entitled, was an incumbrancer on the estate for the 4500*l.* and arrears of interest found due to her and not paid. It is clear on the principle which I must have acted on, even if the chief clerk had not found 4500*l.* due to her and all arrears of interest, that if she was entitled to the whole 4500*l.*, her estate has not been diminished by this claim against her estate, nor did Francis Morley receive money to her use; my opinion is that he did not, merely because he was let into possession. It is true that the trustees of the term being in possession let him into possession; but as tenant for life in possession, who does not keep down the interest of a charge, cannot be sued either at law or in equity by the person entitled to the charge, for this reason, that he may be stopped from receiving the rents, and a bill may be filed to restrain him from so doing, without keeping down the interest on the charge. But a person who has a mortgage on an estate cannot sustain a personal demand, and money due to him cannot be sued for either at law or in this court. In the present case there was no debt of Francis Morley's. It was a charge created by the original testator, for which, therefore, there can be no mere personal liability, although there may be a moral obligation to keep down the interest of the charge; but I am unable to see that the representative of Mary Morley can sustain any claim either at law or in equity against Francis Morley or his representative for rent received by him. With respect to the suggestion as to Courtney v. Williams (sup.) having decided that an executor has a right of retainer, there there was once a debt, and that being so, there was still a debt, although not recoverable at law by reason of the statute. But here there was no debt at all, although morally, as Mr. Cotton admitted, it might be said that there was some claim in respect of the 180*l.* which ought not to have been received, on the result of the account, but as the estate of Mary Morley does not suffer, although I regret having so to decide, on the technical point, I cannot regard Francis Morley as indebted to Mary Morley, nor his estate to her estate, there being, I am of opinion, no case of set-off, or even a right to retain. There will therefore be a declaration to that effect, namely, that the 1000*l.* legacy and interest are still payable to the executors of Francis Morley. It is certainly very much like the case of a mortgagee allowing the mortgagor to receive the rents.

Solicitor for the claimants, Tomlin.

Solicitors for the representative of Mary Morley, Norris and Allen.

Wednesday, July 7.

BOWERS v. BOWERS.

Will—Construction—Period of distribution—Direction to divide the whole equally—"In case they shall die."

A testator gave all his property to trustees absolutely, and to divide the whole amongst his four children equally, with benefit of survivorship, in case any of them should die without issue: and in case any of them should die leaving any child or children, the shares original and accruing to be divided between such children equally, if more than one, and if only one, then the whole to such one. All four survived the testator, attained twenty-one, and three had families:

Held, that the period referred to was the death of the testator, and the four children took absolutely as tenants in common.

The question in this case arose upon the construction of the will of Richard Bowers, dated the 25th Sept. 1855, whereby, being at the time of his death possessed of leasehold houses in London and elsewhere in Middlesex, and personal property of considerable amount, and seised in fee of freehold houses in Northamptonshire, and other real estate, he directed payment of his debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, out of his personal estate. The testator then devised all estates vested in him by mortgage or otherwise, to his two sons, William Bowers and Henry Bowers, and his son-in-law, John Haigh, to hold to them, their heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, upon trust, to convey, assign, or dispose of the same, so far as he was beneficially interested, as part of his personal estate; and, after a specific gift, he gave, devised, and bequeathed unto his trustees, their heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, all other his real and personal estate whatsoever and wheresoever, and of what nature and kind soever, to hold to them, their heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, upon trust, to collect and get in such part of his personal estate as should consist of money and securities for money, and other his debts and effects, and he proceeded as follows: "And then to divide the whole unto, between and amongst my four children, William Bowers, Elizabeth, now the wife of the said John Haigh, and Henry Bowers and Richard Bowers; share and share alike, as tenants in common, and not as joint tenants, with benefit of survivorship, in case any of them should die without issue; and in case any of the said children should die leaving a child or children, then I direct that the share, whether original or accruing, of him, her, or them so dying, shall go, belong, and be divided between such children in equal shares, if more than one, and if only one, then the whole to such one and only child." And he appointed his trustees executors. The testator died on the 1st Feb. 1856, and all his children survived him, and were now living. John Haigh took upon himself the active execution of the trusts, paid the debts, and received and admitted assets. William Bowers, the eldest son and heir-at-law of the testator, had two children; Henry Bowers had been married for ten years, and had none; Richard Bowers had two children; and Elizabeth Haigh, had four; and all the eight grandchildren were infants. A question having arisen whether the gift to the testator's children was absolute, or gave a life interest only, the bill was filed by Richard Bowers for the administration of his father's estate, and that was the point now to be decided.

Shapter, Q. C. and Vincent for the plaintiff, contended that it was an absolute gift.

J. Pearson, Q. C., for some of the grandchildren, insisted that according to the authorities, and on the construction of the language, nothing but a life interest was given. If there had been a gift simply to the children equally, with benefit of survivorship in case they should die without issue, there might have been an absolute gift; but there was a gift over providing for the event of either of them dying with or without issue or leaving children, and that cut it down to a life interest:

2 Jarm. 730, 3rd edit.

Shapter, Q. C. referred to

Gee v. The Mayor of Manchester, 17 Q. B. 737; 21 L. J. 242, Q. B.;

Whitworth, for parties in the same interest, referred to Gosling v. Townsend, 2 W. R. 23. Woodburne v. Woodburne, Ib. 131; 19 L. J. 88, Ch., was no authority, because there was a decision of the Court of Appeal the other way:

Farthing v. Allen, 2 Mad. 316.

Hardy, Q. C. and Humphrey appeared for two of the trustees.

Brodrick for the acting executor.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR (without hearing a reply).—The question in this case is whether the four children of the testator who survived him took life estates originally, or in substitution for the gift to their children, or an absolute interest. The facts that have happened are these: At the testator's death he had four children, who are all now living, and have all attained the age of twenty-one, and are therefore competent to give effectual discharges to the executors for their shares, if they are absolutely entitled. The words of the will are few. [The Vice-Chancellor read them.] There is a gift of the whole corpus of the estate to the trustees, upon trust to collect and get in such part of his personal estate as shall consist of money and securities for money, and other his debts and effects, and to divide the whole (there being a gift of the whole to the trustees) unto, between, and amongst his four children (living then), share and share alike, as tenants in common, and not as joint tenants. No one would dispute that if he had stopped there that would have been an absolute gift to the four children as tenants in common. But he goes on, "with benefit of survivorship in case any of them should die without issue, and in case any of my said children should die leaving any child or children, then I direct the share, whether original or accruing, of him, her, or them so dying shall go, belong, and be divided between such children in equal shares, if more than one, and if only one then the whole to said one and only child." Now, there are two views to which this will is open. If it means that there shall be a gift over whenever any child dies without leaving issue, to the survivors; or dying leaving issue to their children, that would be inconsistent with the absolute gift which precedes it; and instead of the trustees dividing the property according to the direction in the will, they can do nothing but pay the interest of the fund representing the shares of those who are dead to those who survive for their lives only; if the word "die" means dying generally. On the other hand, if it is meant to operate at the death of the testator, and therefore an absolute gift, the testator having clearly given the whole to the trustees to divide and pay it to the children, then the whole is consistent by reading the words if any of them shall die "in my lifetime," because here are the parties competent to receive their shares; and this will be a rational construction, the further words being merely a provision against lapse, for the words are "in case any of them should die without issue," or if they died leaving issue, that such children should be substituted for their parents. That makes the whole clear, and that is the conclusion at which I should have arrived in the absence of authority, and if I found such cases as Farthing v. Allen (sup.) only in my way, I should have decided in direct opposition to them, in order that the law might be put upon a rational footing, instead of such an irrational one as they have put it upon, whereby the intention of the testator is defeated. But I am happy to say that it does not rest upon that class of cases; for in Gee v. Mayor of Manchester (sup.), where the testator directed a division of his property into shares, and gave to each of his children a share absolutely, and provided that if any of them should die without issue, he gave it over, that was held to mean dying in his lifetime. That was also the decision of the court in Woodburne v. Woodburne (sup.), before Stuart, V.C., and in Ware v. Watson (sup.), where the Court of Appeal decided precisely the same thing, and in that case every authority upon the subject was cited, commented upon, and dealt with. I consider, therefore, not only that these cases decide the question, but Home v. Pillans, 2 M. & K., where the bequest was to the testator's daughter at twenty-one, and if she should die without issue under twenty-one, to other persons, if that referred to dying generally, it was inconsistent with the previous language, but if it meant under twenty-one in the testator's lifetime, that would be consistent and rational. Therefore I desire to lay it down as a rule, that wherever there is a bequest of property to children or a class in terms, showing an intention that the capital shall be paid, simply to one or divided into many shares with benefit of survivorship, in case of death without issue, that is merely a provision against lapse, and the bequest is absolute, and that provision fails. Here, there being a gift of the whole capital to the trustees to be divided equally amongst the four children, and all having survived the testator, on his death, they became absolutely entitled.

Digitized by Google

Solicitors for the plaintiff, R. Metcalfe, for Beck, Northampton.

Solicitors for the other parties, Bell and Brodrick.

Monday, July 12.

SOUTHWELL v. MARTIN.

Trustee—Vexatious refusal to hand over fund—Costs.

A testator left all his property to trustees on trust for his wife for life, and all the residue to A. H., daughter of his brother W. H., absolutely. The testator's brother W. had three daughters, E., M., and M. A., the plaintiff, who had long prior to the will been Mrs. S., and on the ground of the doubt of identity the trustees refused to pay over the residue:

Held, that the refusal was not warranted by the circumstances; that the plaintiff's second name being A., and she being a daughter of the testator's brother W., was sufficient, and, on bill filed for payment, decree, with costs.

This bill was filed by Mary Ann Southwell against the trustees of her uncle's will, seeking payment of 340*l.*, representing the residue of his estate, and asking the costs of the suit against them. The will was dated in 1861, and thereby the testator gave all his property to the defendants, in trust for his widow for her life, with various legacies. The testator then gave as follows: "All the rest and residue of the said trust moneys, stocks, funds, and securities upon trust to pay the same to my niece Ann Haslop (daughter of my brother William Haslop), for her absolute use and benefit." The testator's brother, William Haslop, had three daughters, Elizabeth, Martha, and the plaintiff, Mary Ann, who for many years anterior to the date of the will had been Mrs. Southwell. In the events which had happened, the residuary legatee becoming entitled, the plaintiff had made various applications to the defendants for payment, but they had been disregarded on the ground of want of identity. It was said that the testator had several grandnieces, and one of them might have been meant; it being impossible that the plaintiff, known to the testator as Mary Ann Southwell for many years, could have been intended by the words "Ann Haslop." It appeared that the plaintiff had offered her personal indemnity as well as that of one Brett, a cricket bat manufacturer, to the trustees, but that they had refused it.

Ince appeared for the plaintiff, and contended that she being the daughter of the testator's brother William, and one of her names being Ann was quite sufficient. The testator had simply forgotten; it being very common to call a party by her maiden name by inadvertence; and also by the second name instead of the first. There was no justification whatever for withholding the legacy, and the plaintiff ought not to pay one penny for being forced to apply to the court to obtain it.

Glasse, Q.C. and Busk for the defendants, insisted that there was quite sufficient doubt to warrant the trustees in refusing to pay over this legacy. Not only was there this discrepancy in the christian name, but the surname, the testator being aware for years that she was Mary Ann Southwell; it was not a trifling but a very serious discrepancy. The testator must be assumed to be almost incredibly inaccurate to entitle the plaintiff to this legacy. The description of the person was probably accurate, but there might be an inaccuracy in stating whose daughter she was, and that would make it intelligible; at all events, the trustees were in doubt and that was enough, and they simply wished to be sanctioned in handing it over, and therefore the court would never under such circumstances order them to pay the costs.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR (without hearing a reply).—This is one of the clearest cases possible in which the trustees ought to pay the costs. Here is a simple gift to the testator's widow for life, and all the residue to the defendants in trust for "my niece Ann Haslop (daughter of my brother William Haslop), for her absolute use and benefit." Now the testator's brother William had three daughters, Elizabeth, who of course could not answer the description, Martha, nor could she, and Mary Ann (the plaintiff) who might very probably have been called "Ann," her second name. It is said that there might be a grandniece or some other person answering the description of "Ann Haslop," it not being pretended that there is. There might be a thousand, but none could take by the description of "daughter of my brother William Haslop;" that is distinct at all events, and the plaintiff is the daughter of the testator's brother William, and her name, or one of her names is "Ann." It is the most absurd objection that I ever heard raised. The testator had forgotten the marriage and still called her by her maiden and second name. A statutory declaration was made by one of the other daughters as to the state of the families, and the trustees having employed a solicitor, that ought to have been perfectly satisfactory. If there was any doubt, the trustees, I assume, desiring to do what was right, were bound by their solicitor to know, and he having consulted counsel, that counsel was bound to know, that under that most beneficial statute brought in by Lord Cottenham, the Trustee Relief Act, for the especial relief of trustees, the money could have been paid into court; although I am bound to say that this case is so free from doubt that had the money been paid in under that Act, and the matter had come before me, I should have made the trustees pay the costs of paying it in. There might be cases in which—although as a judge I should see no reason to doubt—there might be a fair case of uncertainty. But this is a most ridiculous question, and it is the duty of trustees to excercise a fair discretion, and not to keep poor people out of their money upon such frivolous pretexts. Not only has the plaintiff been obliged to file a bill, but evidence has actually been gone into, and if I allowed the defendants their costs this 340*l.* would be mulcted down to 100*l.* There must be a decree for payment of the principal with interest, and the defendants must pay the costs.

Digitized by Google

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Spyer and Son.

Solicitors for the defendants, Tompson, Pickering, and Styan.

Wednesday, July 14.

BOUSFIELD v. BOUSFIELD.

Will—Construction—Separate use with testamentary power—Absolute interest.

A testator, after giving annuities and legacies, gave all the rest and residue of his property to his three children, naming them, equally, wishing his daughters' shares to be vested in the hands of trustees in Government securities, the interest only to be payable to them, and neither they nor any husband they contracted marriage with, to have any control over the principal, except that his daughters should have power to will at their decease, the son to receive his share on attaining twenty-five, with clauses for maintenance.

Held, that the daughters took an absolute interest.

This suit was instituted for putting a construction upon the will of William Bousfield, dated the 28th Oct. 1848, the question being whether on the terms of that instrument, and in the events that had happened, his children took an absolute interest or for their lives only with remainder over. The will, which was extremely short, was as follows:—

I will and bequeath to my beloved wife the sum of 500*l.* per annum during the term of her natural life, and at the death of my dear mother a further sum of 100*l.* per annum also during the term of her natural life, but should she contract marriage she is only to be entitled to the sum of 300*l.* per annum also for the term of her natural life; which is to be at all times independent of her husband; and at her decease the principal to fall back to and form part of the residue of my property divisible among my children as is hereafter stated. I bequeath to my son William my share of the freehold property in St. Mary Axe coming to me according to the will of my late father. I give unto my dear wife the whole of my household furniture, plate, pictures, horses, and carriages, &c. that may be found at Streatham Hill, &c. at the time of my decease, and as to the rest and residue of my property I bequeath it to my three children, William, Hannah, and Edith Eliza share and share alike. I wish my daughters' shares to be vested in the hands of trustees in the Government securities of Great Britain, the interest only to be payable to them, and neither they nor any husband they may contract marriage with are to have any control over the principal moneys except that my daughters are to have power to will them at their decease. I wish my son William to receive his share of the property on his attaining the age of twenty-five, but should my executors deem it fit for the purpose of his advancement in life, I hereby authorise them to advance any sum not exceeding 2000*l.* for that purpose. I herewith empower my executors to pay over to their mother or their guardian for the time being such proportions of the incomes of the children as may be required for their maintenance and education at their discretion. I wish my executors, as they can get in the money to invest it in the Government securities of Great Britian. I will and bequeath unto my dear wife, Hannah Bousfield, the sum of 500*l.* as soon after my decease as may be convenient to my executors.

The testator died on the 1st April 1851, leaving his widow and three children surviving him, namely, the plaintiff, Hannah Bousfield, the defendant, William Bousfield, and Edith Eliza Bousfield, all infants. The testator at the time of his death was not seised of any real estate, except that specifically bequeathed to the defendant, William Bousfield; but considerable personal estate, which, except a reversionary interest, amounted to about 20,000*l.*, a great part of which had been invested to meet the annuity of 500*l.* a year, and the residue was divisible. Edith Eliza Bousfield died on the 16th Oct. 1858, an infant and intestate and unmarried, leaving her brother, mother, and sister the sole next of kin surviving. In March 1859 the executors were advised that Edith Eliza Bousfield took a life interest only in one-third of the testator's residuary estate, and that he died intestate as to the ulterior interest in such one-third, which therefore became divisible amongst the widow, the two children, and the personal representatives of Edith Eliza Bousfield deceased, according to the statute, and that the share of Edith Eliza Bousfield such one-third, as next of kin of the testator was divisible amongst her mother, brother, and sister as her next of kin. William Bousfield attained twenty-one on the 9th July 1863 and the plaintiff on the 1st Jan. 1865. On the 29th May 1865 the widow, son, and daughter executed a release to the executors on the footing of the said Edith Eliza Bousfield taking only a life interest, and of the consequent intestacy, which were recited, and the deed dealt with the property, having regard to the provisions of the will, and on the footing of Edith Eliza Bousfield only having taken a life estate and never having been able to execute the power of appointment, in detail, and the deed was acted upon as to said details. The plaintiff, however, and the other parties having been since advised that the testator's children took an absolute interest, the bill was filed to determine that question, it being stated that both said conflicting opinions had been given by counsel of the highest eminence. The bill alleged that the indenture of release having been executed under a common mistake, was not binding in equity, and should be set aside. The widow had administered to the estate of her deceased daughter, and one of the trustees being desirous of retiring, and there being no power in the will to appoint a new trustee, such appointment was also prayed by the bill; and that it might be declared that the children took absolute interests, and to set aside the release.

Speed, for the plaintiff, contended that in the events that had happened the testator's children took absolute interests, and that the interest of Edith Eliza Bousfield, on her death, went to her legal personal representative:

Coombe v. Hughes, 2 De G. J. & S. 663;
Meyer v. Townsend, 3 Beav. 443;
Whittel v. Dudin, 2 Jac. & W. 279;
Co le v. Scott, 1 M. & G. 518.

Wickens, for the trustees, insisted that although up to a certain point there was an absolute gift, that had been cut down by the subsequent words. The testator had given his property absolutely to his three children in equal shares, but he explained that as to the daughters' shares nothing was to go to them, but he vested it in the trustees, the interest only to be payable to them, and that neither they nor any husband they might contract marriage with should have any control over the principal. If it had stopped there it was obvious that that was a diminution of the previous gift; and all that he subsequently did was to give a power of appointment to be executed exclusively by will. There could be no doubt that that did not operate to enlarge the life interest, it was a mere power. They were, therefore, tenants for life with a testamentary power of appointment. That construction did not conflict with Whittel v. Dudin, and the other cases cited.

Digitized by Google

Streeten, for William Bousfield, took no part in the argument.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR (without hearing a reply).—The object of the testator in this case was to give his property equally amongst his children, a son and two daughters, and he makes his will in these terms [the Vice-Chancellor read the will]:—It is evident that he had no intention to die intestate as to any part of his property for he says, "as to the rest and residue of my property," that is, "all my property," "I bequeath it to my three children," naming them, "share and share alike." Nothing can be clearer, and if he had stopped there the children would have taken the whole property absolutely; and the son at all events without any question does so take it. But then comes the wish as to the daughters' shares. [The Vice-Chancellor read the clause.] The obvious object was to retain the daughters' share to their separate use, with a testamentary power of appointment to them. But, he does not say, if such power is not exercised that it shall go over in default; there is no provision for that event, and therefore the effect is to leave the original gift, which is without any doubt an absolute one, untouched, and it is not a case in which the interest of the daughters is to be diminished, but simply he directs that their shares shall be held for their separate use with a testamentary power of appointment. Therefore the question depending on the original gift, and that, in my opinion, not being cut down by any subsequent provision, the effect is that they took absolutely for their separate use. The case is the same in principle as Coombe v. Hughes (sup.) and Meyer v. Townsend (sup.), and quite as strong as those cases, because there a sum of 5000*l.* was given to the daughter to be invested for her life, and it was argued, therefore, that she took a life estate only for her separate use; and the question was whether it was not a tenancy for life, with power to dispose of the capital by will, but leaving the fund otherwise undisposed of, and it was held that the original gift remained, and was only cut down as between her and the children to a life estate. That was a decision that, subject to the interest given to the children, she took an absolute interest, and as she died unmarried that the personal representative was entitled. In the present case there is not a gift of the capital during her life, but as between her and the estate of the testator the gift is an absolute one. The same principle, therefore, as was recognised in Meyer v. Townsend applies, and the original gift remains, which was an absolute one. A case directly in point also is Whittell v. Dudin (sup.), which settled the law on the subject, that where there is a gift of a legacy or residue, in terms absolute, and there is a qualification or cutting down as to particular objects, the original gift remains, and the deceased daughter, therefore, in this case took absolutely, and in the events that have happened her interest on her death intestate and unmarried was transmitted to her personal representative.

Solicitors for all parties, Lindsay, Mason, and Greenfield.

V. C. JAMES'S COURT.

Reported by W. H. BENNET and R. T. BOULT, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Friday, April 16.

Re DAVIS'S TRUSTS.

Practice—Notarial act—Verification of signature.

The signature of a notary to an act done by him in a foreign country must be duly authenticated by a person in England.

This was a petition for the payment of money out of court.

Some of the parties entitled were resident in America.

The affidavit verifying the petition had been written and signed by the deponents and the signatures certified by a notary public in America, headed "United States of America, State of West Virginia, Kanawha County," and it stated that Romeo Freer, a notary public in and for the county and state, thereby certified that the five persons, all of whom were to him well known, had that day personally appeared before him, and each of them had made oath in due form that the affidavits thereinbefore written and subscribed by them respectively were true, and that they were persons to whom faith and credence ought to be given.

This document had the notarial seal affixed, but the signature of the notary had not been verified.

W. W. Lawson called the attention of the Vice-Chancellor to the facts. The question was, whether the affidavit could be admitted, and if it could, whether the signature of the American notary ought not to be verified? Kindersley, V. C., in a case where the sum in question had been only 25*l.*, had dispensed with this formality: (Mayne v. Butter, 13 W. R. 128.) The present amount was over 400*l.*

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said he thought proof of the notary's signature would be sufficient to satisfy him that the affidavit was made by the deponents therein-named, but that the notary's signature should be verified. The petition stood over to obtain this.

Solicitor, J. Scott, for Harrison and Sons, Kendall.

April 19 and May 19.

BADGER v. GREGORY.

Will—Construction—The word "surviving" to be read as "other."

In the construction of a will every word is to have its natural, that is, its ordinary meaning unless there be sufficient reason to the contrary.

Where, therefore, a testatrix devised all her real and personal estate upon trust to sell and convert same, &c., and directed her trustees to stand possessed, the residuary personalty upon trust to invest, &c., and as to one-fourth to pay the income to her daughter F. C. for life, and after her death to "assign, transfer, and make over" same to and amongst her children, to be "assigned, transferred, and paid" at twenty-three, any child attaining twenty-three in the lifetime of F. C. was to acquire a "vested interest." In case of the death of F. C. without leaving "any such child or children," testatrix directed her trustees "to pay, and apply, and dispose of" the income of the fourth to and amongst her (the said testatrix's) "surviving daughters."

As to the remaining three-fourths she made similar dispositions for the benefit of her other three daughters, with particular directions in the event of the deaths of all the four daughters without leaving children, for the testatrix's next of kin.

Digitized by Google

One of the daughters died without having been married.

Another daughter died leaving children, of whom four attained the ages of twenty-three:

Held, that the children of a deceased daughter were entitled to participate in the share of the daughter so dying, and that the word "surviving" in the will must be read as "other."

This cause came on for further consideration on the chief clerk's certificate. It was an administration suit, and the usual decree directing inquiries had been pronounced on the 28th Jan. 1865.

By the certificate it appeared that the testatrix, Elizabeth Heath, widow, made her will, dated the 11th Feb. 1804, and, after directing payment of her debts, &c., she devissd and bequeathed unto her trustees, their heirs, &c., all her real and personal estate upon trust to sell and convert same, and after a disposition of 1000*l.*, part of the residue, she directed that said trustees should stand possessed of the residue and remainder of said moneys and of the investments thereof upon trust, as to one fourth part thereof, to pay the income to or for the benefit of her daughter Frances Cooke, during her life, for her separate use, and after her decease "to assign, transfer, and make over" the same unto and amongst all and every the child and children of the said Frances Cooke, equally to be divided amongst them if more than one, and to be "assigned, transferred, or paid when and as they should attain their respective ages of twenty-three years." She also duly declared that if any such child or children should attain twenty-three in the litetime of Frances, then and thenceforth all and every the right and interest, rights and interests, of such child or children in the said one-fourth, should respectively be, and be considered as, "a vested interest or vested interests," in the same child or children, and should be transmissible as such, notwithstanding the death of such child or children afterwards in the lifetime of Frances. It was also provided that if any such child should die under twenty-three, the share thereby intended for each such child so dying (other than what should have been actually applied and paid for the advancement of any such child) should "go and accrue to the survivor or survivors" and others or other of the same children, and the respective executors, administrators, and assigns of such of them as should be dead, having first acquired a vested interest in their respective original shares, and be equally divided between or amongst such survivors and others of them and the said representatives of those who should be dead (if more than one), share and share alike; and the same should be assignable and payable at such respective ages, days and times as was thereby provided and declared, touching his, her, or their original share or shares. And the trustees were directed after the death of Frances, and until the one-fourth should become assignable and payable, to apply the same for or towards the respective maintenance and education of the same child or children. She also gave the trustees power to advance any part of the "presumptive shares" of any child or children. In case of the death of Francis without leaving "any such child or children as aforesaid," the testatrix directed her trustees "to pay, apply, and dispose of" the income of the fourth "to and amongst" her (the testatrix's) "surviving" daughters in equal shares and proportions during their respective life or lives for their respective separate use, and such last-mentioned "benefit of survivorship" should extend to the "surviving" as well as to the original shares, and the principal moneys of such "surviving" income should, after the respective deceases "of such surviving" daughters "go and belong to and be divisible amongst" the several child or children of such daughter or daughters in such proportions, and at such respective ages, days, and times, and with "such benefit of survivorship," and in such manner and form as were thereinbefore mentioned and set forth in respect of the original share and shares of the child or children of the said Frances Cooke.

As to the remaining three-fourths, the testatrix directed her trustees to stand possessed of the income in trust for her other three daughters, Charlotte, Mary, and Maria, in equal shares and proportions during their respective lives for their respective separate use in the manner thereinbefore mentioned with respect to the interest of the other fourth; and of the principal moneys arising therefrom for their respective children in such and the same manner, and with such restrictions and under such conditions, and with such benefit of survivorship as to the income amongst her said four daughters, and as to the principal amongst their children, "and in such manner and form to all intents and purposes" as she had thereinbefore directed with respect to the other fourth. In case only one of the testatrix's four daughters should die, leaving any child or children who should attain twenty-three, the testatrix directed that after all their deaths, her trustees should "assign, transfer, and dispose of" the whole residue unto and amongst such last-mentioned child or children in equal shares if more than one, and if but one, then to such one child to be vested in him, her, or them, and payment at such and the same ages, days, and times, and with such "benefit of survivorship," and in such manner and form in all respects as was thereinbefore appointed and set forth in respect of the original shares of such child or children. In case of the death of all her four daughters, "without leaving such children as aforesaid," or leaving such they should all happen to die under twenty-three, then testatrix directed her trustees to stand possessed of the whole of the trust moneys and premises in trust for her next of kin.

One of the four daughters, Mary Cooke, died first, viz., on the 5th Feb. 1819 without having been married.

Frances Cooke next died in April 1847, having married and survived her husband, having had children of whom four attained their ages of twenty-three.

Maria died next on 6th Sept. 1855 without having been married.

Upon her death the question arose whether upon the death of the surviving daughter Charlotte, Maria's share should go to Charlotte's children alone as children of the "surviving" daughter, or whether the children of Frances were entitled to participate in the residue.

Charlotte Cooke, the surviving daughter, married one John Wilcox, and survived him, and died on the 7th June 1864, having had eight children, all of whom attained their ages of twenty-three, and five of whom survived her. Up to Charlotte's death the whole income had been paid to the tenants for life, and the survivor, and survivors of them.

The question now to be decided was, which of the children were to participate in the principal of the testatrix's residuary estate, in other words, whether the word "surviving" was to receive its natural construction, or whether the general intention of the testatrix required that it should be construed as "other."

Amphlett, Q.C. and Millar, for the plaintiffs, a daughter of Mrs. Wilcox (Charlotte) and her husband.

Wickens, for a son of Frances.

Digitized by Google

Speed, for the representatives of one of the children of Frances who attained twenty-three, but died in her life time.

Badcock, for the representative of Mrs. Wilcox (Charlotte).

Druce, Q. C. and Winterbotham, for the defendants, the trustees of the will.

The cases cited and relied on were
Smith v. Osborn, 6 H. of L. Cas. 375;
Re Keep's Will, 32 Beav. 453;
Hodge v. Foot, 34 Beav. 349;
Re Sharp's Estate, 1 De G. & Sm., 343;
Hurry v. Morgan, L. Rep. 3 Eq. 152;
Browne v. Rainsford, Ir. Rep. 1 Eq. 384;
Hawkins on Wills, p. 202.

Amphlett in reply referred to Re Corbett's Trusts, John. 592.

May 19.—The VICE-CHANCELLOR took time to consider his judgment and now said: The point which was reserved is the often mooted one as to whether the word 'survivors' is to receive its natural meaning, or whether it is to be construed as 'others.' In the case of Browne v. Rainsford (ubi sup.), the Irish Master of the Rolls is reported to say, "the authorities are very numerous and it is perhaps extremely difficult to reconcile them. In reading some of the cases one would almost suppose that the word 'survivor' loses its proper import when used in a will and becomes synonymous with 'other,' but the modern authorities distinctly define its natural meaning to be 'longest liver,' and generally profess emphatically to approve of the rule that the word shall have that natural and proper meaning unless the will contains some strong indication that the testator intended to use it in a different sense." I am not quite sure that he has not in that sentence unduly depreciated the earlier authorities, but I think he has accurately stated the true canon of construction, which after all simply comes to this—that every word is to have its natural, that is to say, its ordinary meaning, unless there be sufficient reason to the contrary. But in considering what is sufficient reason, it is not immaterial that some particular word is very ordinarily used inaccurately, and that such inaccuracy is common, or not uncommon, in testamentary or other legal instruments. The word "premises" affords an illustration of this. Every one knows the legal meaning of that word, but all would come to the consideration of any document in which that word occurs with a perfect certainty that such legal meaning is not the meaning which it has in the vernacular of lessors, lessees, and house agents. The number of cases before the courts in which they have felt themselves bound or at liberty to construe "survivor" as "other," shows that there is some vernacular not in uncommon use with testators in which the word is used in that artificial sense, or that there is a great liability in testators to fall into the same mistake in using the one word instead of the other. In many of the cases it is utterly impossible to arrive at any other conclusion than that "survivor" meant "other." When for instance Blackacre is given to A. for life, with remainder to his children, and in case either should die without children, then his acre to go to the survivor and his children, the presumption is almost conclusive that the word "survivor" is put in contradistinction to "the one so dying," and means the one that does not die childless. If, in addition to this, the will goes on and says, "and if both shall die without children then the whole shall go to C.," the conclusion that "survivor" means "other" becomes irresistible. If, instead of this simple case, the case be put of a testator giving his property to a class of children, with remainder to their descendants, and if any of them should die without descendants then to the survivors and their descendants, the presumption that the word "survivors" is used to mean "others" is stronger, for it is scarcely possible to attribute to an ancestor the intention that the position of his descendants in the second degree is to depend on the accident of whether their parent dies first or second; and if to this is added a gift over in the event only of all dying without descendants, the conclusion becomes irresistible that what the testator meant was, that so long as there were descendants of any to take, the whole property should go to such descendants, and the only mode by which effect can be given to such intention is by holding that the property was to go between the children and their descendants, with cross remainders between them, wholly irrespective of the particular period of their deaths, by reading for the word "survivors" the word "others," and by considering that the parent has survived in his descendants who have lived to acquire a vested interest. There being, then, this principle of construction on which in numerous cases, modern as well as ancient, the word "survivor" has been read "others," is the particular context in this will favourable or adverse to this mode of construction? In the first place, it is to be observed that the gift over is to the next of kin of the testatrix. In the event of all dying without issue, and only in that event, she says her next of kin were to take. It is quite clear that she must have intended her previous dispositions to provide, and thought that they had provided for every event except the event of all dying without issue, and never could have intended the residue to go to her next of kin if the survivor only died without issue. Again it is to be noted in this will that the word "surviving" is not synonymous with "survivor" or longest liver. It is not on the death of a daughter that the gift over is to take effect, but on the failure of the "issue" of such daughter whether at or after her death, and if the word "surviving" is to be read in its original meaning, it must mean, in this will, persons "living at the time of the failure of such issue to take," so that if the first daughter had died leaving infant children, and then the other had died leaving children, and then all the infant children had died, there would have been an intestacy as to that share, and the children of the survivor would have been deprived of their chance of succession from the accident of their parents having died in the lifetime of their cousins. This is a very improbable, not to say almost impossible, intention to attribute to the testatrix. Now let us read "other" instead of "surviving" and see whether that would land us in any difficulties which should deter us from applying the mode of construction which I have seen my way to extract from the cases. [The Vice-Chancellor here read and commented upon the particular terms of the will from this point of construction.] On the whole, therefore, I am satisfied that there is nothing in the context of this will sufficient to distinguish this case from the many reported cases in which, in favour of the general intent the word "survivors" has been construed as "others." The Vice-Chancellor then again referred to the case in Ireland of Browne v. Rainsford, of which he approved, considering that although in that case the word "survivors" was to have its ordinary signification, the argument of the Master of the Rolls governed this case.

Minutes to be prepared in pursuance of the above decision.

Solicitors: Lambert, Hampton, and Co.; W. and H. P. Sharp; Vizard, Anstie and Co.; Norcutt; Taylor, Hoare, and Co.

Digitized by Google

Common Law Courts.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

Reported by W. GRAHAM and M. W. MCKELLAR, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Tuesday, Nov. 24, 1868.

CUTHBERTSON (app.) v. BUTTERWORTH (resp.)

Parliament—Borough vote—Chambers—"House" or "other building"—2 Will. 4, c. 45, s. 27.

The landlord of the respondent rented a set of chambers in the Temple. Each room was separated from the other and opened into a vestibule which communicated with a landing on a public staircase. The respondent, a barrister, had the exclusive occupation of one of these rooms over the door of which, opening into the vestibule, he had exclusive control:

Held, that this room was not a "house" or "other building" within the meaning of the 2 Will. 4, c. 45, s. 27, and therefore that the respondent was not entitled to a vote.

This was a consolidated appeal from a decision of the revising barrister for the city of London.

CASE.

At the court held for the revision of the list of voters for the Inner and Middle Temple in the City of London before me the barrister duly appointed to revise the list of voters for the city of London, in which the said Inner and Middle Temple are comprised, William Cuthbertson on the list of voters for the parish of Saint Peter-upon-Cornhill, and upon the register of voters for the parish of Saint Benedict, otherwise Saint Bennett Fink, both in the said city, duly objected to the names comprised in the schedule hereunder written of the persons who are entitled to vote in the election of members for the city of London, in respect of the occupation of chambers in the said Inner and Middle Temple, when I decided that each of the said voters was entitled to have his name inserted or retained in such list. And the said William Cuthbertson having given due notice of his intention to appeal from such my decisions, and it appearing to me that the validity of the objections of the said voters being so inserted or retained as aforesaid, depended on the state of facts and the same point of law, I did declare that the appeals against such decisions ought to be consolidated, and William Henry Butterworth, of No. 5, Paper-buildings, being one of the persons interested and consenting for or on behalf of himself and all other persons in like manner interested in such appeals, to be the respondent, and to answer the said appeal, I named the said William Henry Butterworth to be respondent in such consolidated appeal.

The landlord of the respondent rented a set of chambers in the Inner Temple.

This set of chambers formed a part of one of the floors of the building in the Temple, which part is so structurally severed from the rest of the building as to be of itself a house.

This set of chambers consists of two rooms and a vestibule; each room is severed from the other, there being no divers communication between the two; each communicated by its own door with the vestibule which communicated with the landing on a public staircase by a door.

The subject of the respondent's occupation was one of these rooms.

The respondent had occupied for the statutory period exclusively, and as sole tenant, this room over the door of which, communicating into the vestibule, he had exclusive control.

Under or by virtue of his tenancy, he had a right of way over the vestibule, and, in common with his landlord, who occupied the other room, perfect control over the door communicating with the landing, so as at all times to command free ingress and egress to and from the room which he occupied, as aforesaid, from and to the said landing.

The respondent was a barrister at law.

The respondent occupied the said room for the sole purpose of transacting the business which came to him in his pursuit of the profession of a barrister, and not for a dwelling-house.

It was objected that, having regard to the above facts, the subject of occupation of the respondent was not sufficient to be qualifying tenant within any of the qualifications enumerated in the 27th section of the Act Will. 4, c. 45.

I held, regarding the above facts, that the respondent occupied as tenant a sufficient tenement to entitle himself to be duly registered to vote in the election of members for the city of London within the meaning of the 27th section of the said Act.

The question upon which the judgment of Her Majesty's Court of Common Pleas is requested is, whether or not I the said barrister did or did not rightly decide that the said voters were entitled to have their names inserted in the register of voters for the said city of London.

Prentice, Q. C., for the appellant, contended that the room in question was not a "separate dwelling-house," or a "house" or "building" within the meaning of the 2 Will. 4, c. 45, s. 27.

The Court called on

Underdown for the respondent.—The respondent is entitled to vote under sect. 27 of the 2 Will. 4, c. 45, as the occupier of a building ejusdem generis with "shop," "counting-house," &c., within the meaning of the words "other building" in that section. There are a number of cases to show what may be a "house" within the meaning of the statute. Wright v. The Town Clerk of Stockport, 5 M. & G. 33; 1 Lutw. 32, shows that a room may be a "building" within sect. 27.

Toms v. Luckett, 5 C. B. 23;
Downing v. Luckett, 5 C. B. 40;
Henrette v. Booth, 15 C. B., N. S. 500;
Brian Kearney's Case, Alcock's Reg. Cas. 22.

[BOVILL, C. J.—If you are right in this case it would not be necessary to have a lodger franchise.] The distinction in the case of a lodger is that the landlord has the control of the outer door. Wilson v. Roberts, 11 C. B., N. S., 50, was only a question of structural severance. The real question is if there is structural severance and full control of the outer door. Cook v. Humber, 11 C. B., N. S., 33, is not in point.

Prentice, Q. C. in reply was not called upon.

BOVILL, C. J.—I am of opinion that our judgment should be for the appellant. No case cited goes near the length of establishing that this room is a "house" or other building within the meaning of the Act. The cases have decided that where a set of chambers is structurally separated and used as a separate building, it may be considered as a house, but the very description of this room shows that it is part of a set of chambers and essentially part of a house as distinguished from a house. I am, therefore, of opinion that the decision of the revising barrister must be reversed.

BYLES and KEATING, JJ. concurred.

BRETT, J.—I am clearly of opinion that this is not a house nor such a building as is meant by the 2 Will. 4, c. 45, s. 27, though I am not prepared to say what would come within the meaning of the word "house" in the Act.

Judgment for the appellant.

Attorney for the appellant, J. R. Bailey; for the respondent, Travers, Smith, and De Gex.

Digitized by Google

Jan. 12 and 13, and May 4.

BRIDGES v. GARRETT.

Copyhold fine—Payment to deputy steward—Principal and agent—Payment by crossed cheque.

The defendant having purchased a copyhold tenement, the steward of the manor wrote to C., the defendant's attorney, inclosing draft admittance, and informing him that he might admit the defendant as deputy steward. C. accordingly admitted the defendant, the admittance being in the usual form, and stating that the defendant paid his fine. The defendant did not, in fact, pay the fine, and C., by letter, informed the steward that he would pay it in a few days. The steward replied that he ought to have paid it at the time, and he hoped he should receive a cheque in a few days. The defendant afterwards gave C. a cheque for an amount including the fine, fees, and C.'s charges, and at the request of C. crossed the cheque, with the name of C.'s bankers. C. paid the cheque into his bankers, and it was duly honoured; but C.'s account being overdrawn, his bankers refused to pay him the money, and C. not having paid over the fine, the lord sued the defendant:

Held, per Bovill, C.J., and M. Smith, J. (Byles, J., dissentiente), that assuming that C. had authority to receive the fine, he had no authority to receive it otherwise than in cash, or what was equivalent to cash, and that a cheque crossed with the name of C.'s bankers, and including money due to C., was not a good payment as against the lord.

Held, per Byles, J., that such payment was a good payment as between the lord and the defendant.

Declaration: Common count for copyhold fines.

Plea: Never indebted, and payment and issue thereon.

At the trial before Byles, J., at the Spring Assizes at Chelmsford in 1868, it appeared that the plaintiff was lord of the manor of Cressing Temple, and that in Jan. 1867 the defendant purchased Vellums farm, a copyhold tenement parcel of the manor. The first intimation the plaintiff received of this purchase was through a Mr. Portway, an auctioneer, who wrote the following letter to Mr. Mills, the steward of the manor:—

Manor of Cressing.

R. Mills, Esq. 20th March 1869.

Sir.—Mr. Garratt, the purchaser of Vellums farm, late the property of J. Gosling's executors, wishes to take down the timber. What form of notice do you require? I called upon Mr. Gibson, and he has referred me to you.—Yours, &c. A PORTWAY.

To this letter Mr. Mills replied that Mr. Garrett must be admitted before he could give him a licence to take down the timber, and added, "I will send you draft admission of Mr. Garrett in a day or two." On the 25th March 1867, Mills wrote to Portway as follows:—

Dear Sir,—Inclosed we send you draft admission of Mr. Garrett, and we shall feel obliged by your forwarding the same to Mr. Garrett, or his solicitor for their approval. We do not know either of their addresses.—Yours truly,

A. Portway, Esq., Auctioneer. WARD and MILLS.

On the 3rd May following, Messrs. Ward and Mills received the following letter from a Mr. Craig, a solicitor, and then a person in good credit.

The Manor of Cressing Temple,
3rd May, 1869.

Gosling's devisees to Garrett,

Dear Sirs,—I send you absolute surrender from the devisees of John Gosling to Mr. Balls Garrett for enrolment. I also return you draft admission approved.—Yours, &c.

Messrs. Ward and Mills, Solicitors. E. G. CRAIG.

In reply to this, Mills wrote on the 4th May:

Manor of Cressing Temple.

Garrett.

Dear Sir,—I beg to acknowledge receipt of this surrender and draft admission approved by you, and return your copy surrender. You can take the admission as deputy steward at once if you please.—I am, &c.,

RICHARD MILLS, Steward.

E. G. Craig, Esq., Solicitor.

In this letter Mills returned to Craig the admission, of which the following is a copy:

The Manor of Cressing Temple.
June 4, 1867.

Garrett.

Balls admitted on the absolute surrender of Emily Buck and others devisees of John Gosling, deceased.

Be it remembered that on or before the day and year first above written, an absolute surrender was out of court delivered to Richard Mills, gentleman, steward of the said manor.

It then set out the surrender, and proceeded as follows:

Now comes the said Balls Garrett before Edward George Craig, deputy steward of the said manor for this turn only out of court, and prays that he may be admitted the lord's tenant of the said hereditaments, so surrendered to his use as aforesaid, and he was by the hands of the said deputy steward admitted tenant, and seisin delivered to him by the rod thereof, to have and to hold the said hereditaments with the appurtenances unto the said Balls Garrett, his heirs and assigns for ever, pursuant to the said surrender to the lord of the said manor by the rod, at the will of the lord according to the custom of the said manor by the rents, customs, and services therefore due and of right accustomed, and he gave to the lord for a fine as appears in the margin, and his fealty was respited. BALLS GARRETT.

Fine 78l. 15s. 0d.
Fees 4l. 11s. 8d.

The words in italics were erased by Mills after the dispute arose which formed the subject of this action

Craig retained the admission and on June 7 wrote as follows to Mills:—

Dear Sir,—I met Mr. Garrett on Tuesday last and admitted him as your deputy. He did not pay the fine, but said he would do so in a few days, and in the meantime requested me to inquire of you on what terms he could enfranchise the property which he is desirous to do.—Yours truly, E. G. CRAIG.

Messrs. Ward and Mills.

On the following day Mills replied as follows:—

Dear Sir,—I am in receipt of your letter of the 7th inst., informing me that you had admitted Mr. Garrett as my deputy, but he ought to have paid the fine and fees at the time. However, I hope he will remit the same at his earliest convenience. As to the enfranchisement it must be compulsory, as my client is only a tenant for life, and has no wish to enfranchise at all.—Yours truly,

E. Craig, Esq. RICHARD MILLS.

Receiving no reply to this, Mills wrote on July 10:

Dear Sir,—I have been expecting to receive the draft, admission, and cheque for fine and fees. The admission cannot be considered complete, nor will it be entered on the court rolls until the fine and fees are paid.—Yours truly,

E. G. Craig, Esq. RICHARD MILLS.

On the 16th July Craig wrote to the defendant as follows:—

My dear Sir,—You need not trouble yourself to attend on Thursday. A circular was sent to you because, owing to the peculiar position I am placed in just now, I have not been able to pay over 83l. 6s. 8d. to the steward of the manor; so that amount stands in the ledger as due to you. Of course, I shall not allow you to be the loser, as the money was with me for a special purpose; but my banking account did not allow of its being paid over. I shall arrange the matter as soon as I can, and you may depend upon me to do so. You wanted to know how this amount was made up: Fine, 78l. 15s.; steward's fees, 4l. 11s. 8d.; costs, E. G. C., 4l. 4s.; total, 87l. 10s. 8d.—Yours truly,

E. G. CRAIG.

Mills received no reply to this letter of the 10th July until the 19th, when the defendant called upon him, and handed him the following letter from Craig:

18th July, 1867.

Dear Sir,—Mr. Garrett has paid me the fine and your fees, but I must ask your indulgence for a little while, owing to being in difficulties in money matters. I shall take an early opportunity of communicating with you again. The money was paid to me on the 17th June last.—Yours truly,

R. Mills, Esq. E. G. CRAIG.

On the same day Mills wrote to Craig as follows

July 19th, 1867.

Dear Sir,—I have to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of yesterday, handed to me to-day by Mr. Balls

Digitized by Google

Garrett. In my letter to you of the 8th June last, when I found that Mr. Garrett had not paid the fine and fees on his admission, I expressed a hope that he would remit the amount as soon as he conveniently could, but I cannot recognise his subsequent payment to you at all, or acquiesce in any delay. Mr. Garrett must pay his fine and fees to me, and must recover from you the money he appears to have paid to you for the purpose.—Yours truly,

E. G. Craig, Esq. RICHARD MILLS.

After some further correspondence the fine was duly assessed and a demand of payment made, and this action was commenced. It was proved that Mr. Craig had acted as the defendant's solicitor in the purchase of the property; but, though he had acted for Mr. Garrett in other matters, he was not his regular solicitor. Mills had no other communication with Craig, prior to the admission, than by the letters above set out, and he had no previous knowledge of the defendant or Mr. Craig, except that the latter was a solicitor. The money was paid by the defendant to Mr. Craig, by a cheque for 87*l.* 10*s.* 8*d.*, which was made up of the following sums, viz., fine 78*l.* 15*s.*, fees 4*l.* 11*s.* 8*d.*, and Mr. Craig's charges 4*l.* 4*s.*; and the cheque was crossed by the defendant, at the request of Craig, London and County Bank, branch bank thereof at Braintree, who were Craig's bankers; and Craig paid it into his own account at that bank.

On these facts, Byles, J. reserved leave to either party to move, and left to the jury the question, whether the fine paid to Mr. Craig was paid to a person authorised to receive it, and in a manner consistent with that authority; and the jury found a verdict for the defendant.

Garth, Q.C., in Easter term, obtained a rule calling on the defendant to show cause why a verdict should not be entered for the plaintiff for 78*l.* 15*s.*, pursuant to leave reserved, on the ground that there was no evidence to go to the jury in support of the plea of payment.

Denman, Q. C. and Cohen now showed cause.—The question is if there was any evidence to go to the jury on the plea of payment. A payment to a deputy to take an admittance out of court, under the circumstances of this case, is a good payment to the lord; and the letters show that Mills expected and intended that the fine should be paid to Craig. Williams v. Evans, 35 L. J. 111, Q. B., shows that Craig had authority to receive the money, as the cheque was paid at maturity. A deputy can do all that the steward can. Watkins on Copyhold, 29 and 67, citing Parker v. Kett, 1 Ld. Raym. 659. The fine is payable on admittance, and the tenant is liable as soon as he is admitted, and if the defendant had failed the plaintiff might have maintained an action for money had and received against Craig. It was a question for the jury whether payment by cheque was good: (Catterall v. Hindle, L Rep. 2 C. P. 368.) Payment to a broker is payment to the principal, and the receipt in the draft admission, "And he gave to the lord for a fine" led the defendant to suppose that Craig had authority to receive the money. The plaintiff was not called at the trial, and the question was not put to the jury whether he authorised Mills to appoint a deputy. The lord has ratified the admission in the form in which the defendant saw it by bringing this action, and if Mills was not authorised to appoint a deputy, the plaintiff's remedy is against him. The deputy steward is a general agent, and therefore has authority to receive a fine, which is naturally incident to the admission:

Norton v. Simmes, Hob. 12;
Story on Agency, s. 14;
Coomb's case, 9 Co. Rep. 76a.

It was a question for the jury whether Craig had authority to receive payment by cheque.

Thorold v. Smiths, 11 Mod. 72;
Williams v Evans, L. Rep. 1, Q. B. 352;
Fish v. Kempton, 7 C. B. 687.

Garth, Q. C. and Digby, in support of the rule.—Taking a surrender is purely a ministerial act, but the receipt of the fine is a trust, and therefore the steward had no power to delegate his authority.

Parker v. Kett, 1 Lord Raym. 658;
Earl of Shrewsbury's case, 9 Co. Rep. 49 B.;
Shep. Touch. 239;
Vin. Abr. Steward of Courts (K.);
Gilbert's Tenures, 5 Ed. 366;
Watkins on Copyholds, 97;
Fisher on Copyholds, 370;
Seldon's Fleta, Lib. 2, c. 72, s. 11:

(This point was argued at great length, but, as the court gave no opinion upon the point, the argument is not set out in extenso.) Assuming that Craig had authority to receive the fine, the mode of payment was unauthorised: (Williams v. Evans, 35 L. J. 111, Q. B.) Here the right of the lord was tied up while the cheque was passing through Craig's bankers' hands; and it was necessary that Craig should do something before paying the lord, to separate his own charges from the fine and the steward's fees. The crossing is part of the instrument, and restricts the payment to a particular banker.

21 & 22 Vict. c. 79, ss. 1 and 2;
Barker v. Greenwood, 2 Y. & C. Ex. 419;
Smith's Merc. Law, 7th edit., 147;
Bartlett v. Pentland, 10 B. & C. 771.

The lord could not have maintained an action for money had and received against Craig, because Craig did nothing to appropriate this money to the lord, or showed that he held it on his account; on the contrary, he wrote to the defendant stating that he held it for him:

Baron v. Husband, 4 B. & Ad. 613.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 4.—BOVILL, C. J. now delivered the judgment of himself and M. Smith, J.—This case was argued before my brothers Byles and M. Smith, JJ. and myself in Hilary Term last. We have unfortunately not been able to agree in our judgment. The following is the judgment of my brother M. Smith and myself. This was an action brought by the plaintiff as lord of the manor of Cressing Temple, in Essex, against the defendant, the purchaser of a copyhold tenement of the manor to which he had been admitted, to recover the fine due on such admittance. The fine was 78*l.* 15*s.* Mr. Craig, a solicitor at Braintree in Essex, and then a person of good credit, acted as solicitor for the defendant. The steward of the manor, Mills, sent a draft admittance to the auctioneer employed by the seller of the property, who handed it to Craig, as the defendant's solicitor; which draft Craig, on the 2nd May 1867, returned to the steward approved. On the 4th May the steward, Mills, wrote to Craig, acknowledging the receipt of the surrender and draft admittance, and added these words, "You can take the admission as deputy steward at once, if you please." On the 25th May Craig wrote to the defendant: "I have received the authority of the steward to take your admittance as his deputy;" and he appointed a day and place in London for that purpose. Accordingly, on the 4th June, the defendant, the surrenderee, and Craig met in London, and Craig admitted him as deputy steward. The important part of the admittance is as follows: "Now comes the said Balls Garrett, before Edward George Craig, deputy steward of the said manor for this turn only, out of court, and prays that he may be so admitted, and he was by the hands of the said deputy steward admitted tenant and seisin delivered to him by the rod to hold, &c.; and he gave to the lord for a fine as appears in the margin and his fealty was respited."

Digitized by Google

In the margin was written "Fine, 78*l.* 15*s.*;" and lower down "Fees 4*l.* 11*s.* 8*d.*" On the 7th June, Craig wrote to the steward, Mills, "I met Mr. Garrett on Tuesday last, and admitted him as your deputy. He did not pay the fine, but said he would do so in a few days." On the 8th June the steward wrote, in answer, "I am in receipt of your letter of the 7th, informing me that you had admitted Mr. Garrett as my deputy; but he ought to have paid the fine and fees at the time. However, I hope that he will remit the same at his earliest convenience." On the 17th June Garrett, the defendant, gave Craig a cheque on his London bankers for the sum of 87*l.* 10*s.* 8*d.*, which sum was composed of the fine, 78*l.* 15*s.*; steward's fees, 4*l.* 11*s.* 8*d.*; and Craig's charges to Garrett 4*l.* 4*s.* Craig informed Garrett how the amount was made up, and requested that the cheque might be crossed with the name of his London bankers, and the defendant accordingly crossed the cheque with the names of Craig's London bankers, and Craig paid it in to the credit of his account. The cheque was duly paid on presentment by the defendant's bankers to Craig's bankers, but Craig's balance being against him, Craig's bankers refused to pay him the money. The objection at the trial was that this payment to Craig did not discharge the defendant, and that Garrett's crossed cheque given to Craig for the sum of 87*l.* 10*s.* 8*d.* was not a good payment of the fine of 78*l.* 15*s.*, as against the lord of the manor; and further that the cheque was received by Craig as solicitor for the defendant and not on behalf of the lord. At the trial the jury found that Craig had authority to receive the fine for the lord, and that the crossed cheque was a good payment to the lord within the authority to pay Craig, and the verdict passed for the defendant. The plaintiff had leave to move to enter the verdict for him for the amount of the fine, and the court were to be at liberty to draw inferences of fact. We are of opinion that there was abundant evidence in the case that the steward might appoint a deputy steward to take the admittance, and that he might appoint Craig as such deputy for that purpose. The admittance purports to be, and was in fact taken by Craig in that capacity; and the plaintiff, as lord of the manor, who could have no claim to the fine until after admittance, by now suing for the fine must be taken to have recognised and adopted the admittance so taken by Craig. It was argued for the defendant that from the nature and terms of the form of admittance it was intended that Craig should receive the fine and fees at or immediately after the time of admittance, and that the letter of Mills showed that it was understood, as between him and Craig, that the latter might receive those amounts at a subsequent period. It was contended for the plaintiff that Mills, as the steward, had no power to appoint a deputy to receive the fine for the lord; but in the view which we take of the case it is not necessary to determine these points, because, assuming that he had such power, and that he did authorise Craig to receive the money, such authority, in our opinion, would be only an authority to receive payment in cash, or what was equivalent to cash, and which might be handed over by Mills as it was received to the lord. The general rule of law is, that where a creditor's agent is bound to pay the whole amount over to the principal, he must receive it in cash from the debtor; and that a person who pays such agent and wishes to be safe, must see that the mode of payment does enable the agent to perform this duty. The law was so laid down by Alderson, B. in Barker v. Greenwood, 2 Y. & C. Ex. 414, 419, and is in accordance with Russal v. Bangley, 4 B. & A. 395, and has been recognised in many other cases. The reasons for the rule are also well stated by my brother Byles in Sweeting v. Pearce, 7 C. B., N. S., 485, where he says, "It is not disputed that the general rule of law is that an authority to an agent to receive money implies that he is to receive it in cash. If the agent receives the money in cash, the probability is that he will hand it over to the principal. But if he is allowed to receive it by a settlement of accounts between himself and the debtor, he might not be able to pay it over. At all events it would very much diminish the chance of the principal ever receiving it; and upon that principle it has been held that the agent, as a general rule, cannot receive payment in anything else but cash. Unless, therefore, there is some usage to control it, payment to the agent must be made in money." The general principle, and also the decision in the last case, were affirmed by the Court of Exchequer Chamber in Sweeting v. Pearce, 9 C. B., N. S., 534. The payment which was relied upon by the defendant in this case was not a payment in cash, it was not even by an ordinary cheque payable to bearer; but it was by a cheque which, by being crossed, was payable to the bankers of Craig, and the state of his accounts with his bankers was such that he never did and never could receive the amount so as to be able to hand it over to the lord or Mills. The cheque also included money payable to Craig himself for fees as the defendant's solicitor, and it never was intended to be, nor could properly have been, handed over by Craig to Mills or the lord. In fact Craig never received the money, nor was he ever in possession of a cheque or cash that he could hand over to the lord or to Mills, the steward. At the time the cheque was given to Craig he was in fact solicitor for Garrett, he treated the cheque as received on Garrett's account; and his letter of the 16th July clearly shows that he considered himself as debtor to the defendant for the amount. It was not until the 18th July that he informed Mills that he had received the money, and endeavoured to shift the loss from his client, the defendant, to Mills or the lord. The proper conclusion to be drawn from all the facts we think is that Craig received the cheque as Garrett's solicitor and not as agent for Mills or the lord, and that he was the agent of Garrett to hand over a portion of the amount when received to Mills; and until the cheque was paid, or indeed at any time whilst the money remained in the hands of Craig, we think it would have been competent for Garrett to have countermanded the authority to hand over the amount to Mills. We are also of opinion that there was no evidence which could properly be left to the jury of any authority from the lord to Craig to receive payment by cheque crossed with the name of Craig's bankers, and which included money due to Craig himself. We think, therefore, that the rule to enter the verdict for the plaintiff for the amount of the lord's fine, 78*l.* 15*s.* should be made absolute.

BYLES, J.—I state my views with great diffidence and distrust, because I have the misfortune to differ from my Lord and my brother Montague Smith. This was an action brought by the plaintiff as lord of the manor of Cressing Temple, in Essex, against the defendant, a copyhold tenant of the manor, for the fine due on the tenant's admittance to a copyhold. The fine was 78*l.* 15*s.*, and the steward's fees 4*l.* 11*s.* 8*d.* Craig, a solicitor at Braintree, in Essex, had been acting as solicitor for the defendant. The steward of the manor, a gentleman of the name of Mills, sent to Craig a draft admittance, which draft, Craig, on the 3rd May 1867, returned to the steward approved. On the 4th May, the steward, Mills, writes to Craig, acknowledging the receipt of the surrender and draft admittance, and adds these words: "You can take the admission as deputy steward at once if you please." On the 25th May Craig writes to the defendant, and says: "I have received the authority of the steward to take your admittance as his deputy;" and he appoints a day and place in London for that purpose. Accordingly, on the 4th June Garrett, the surrenderee, and Craig, meet in London, and Craig, as deputy, admits Garrett. The important part of the admittance is as follows: "Now comes the said Balls Garrett before Edward George Craig, deputy steward of the said manor for this turn only, out of court, and prays that he may be so admitted; and he was by the said deputy steward admitted tenant and seisin delivered to him by the rod thereof to hold, &c., and he gave to the lord a fine as appears in the margin, and his fealty was respited." In the margin was written "Fine, 78*l.* 15*s.*;" and lower down, "Fees, 4*l.* 11*s.*" On the 7th June Craig writes to the steward Mills and says, "I met Mr. Garrett on Tuesday last, and admitted him as deputy steward; he did not pay the fine, but said he would do so in a few days." On the 8th June the steward Mills writes in answer, "I am in receipt of your letter of the 7th inst., informing me that you had admitted Mr. Garrett as my deputy, but he ought to have paid the fine and fees at the time. However, I hope he will remit the same at his earliest convenience." On the 13th June Garrett gave Craig a cheque on his London bankers for the sum of 87*l.* 10*s.* 8*d.*, which sum was composed of the fine, 78*l.* 15*s.*, steward's fees, 4*l.* 11*s.* 8*d.*, and Craig's charges to Garrett, 4*l.* 4*s.* Craig informed Garrett how the amount of 87*l.* 10*s.* 8*d.* was made up, and Craig himself requested that the cheque might be crossed with the name of his (Craig's) London bankers, which was done accordingly. The check was duly paid on presentment by the defendant's bankers to Craig's bankers; but Craig's balance being against him, Craig's bankers refused to pay Craig the money. On the 10th July Mills, the steward, writes to Craig, "I have been expecting to receive the draft admittance and cheque for fine and fees. The admission cannot be considered complete, nor will it be entered on the court rolls, till the fine and fees are paid." On the 18th July Craig writes to Mills, the steward, in these words: "Mr. Garrett has paid me the fine and your fees; but I must ask your indulgence for a little while, owing to my being in difficulties." Mills replies, on the 19th July, "In my letter to you of the 8th June last, when I found that Mr. Garrett had not paid the fine and fees on his admission, I expressed a hope that he would remit the amount as soon as he conveniently could; but I cannot recognise his subsequent payment to you at all, or acquiesce in any delay. Mr. Garrett must pay his fine and fees to me, and must recover from you the amount he appears to have paid to you for the purpose." The objection at the trial was, that payment to Craig did not discharge the defendant, and that Garrett's crossed check given to Craig for the sum of 87*l.* 10*s.* 8*d.* was not a good payment of the fine, as against the lord of the manor. It was contended on the part of the plaintiff that Craig, filling the double capacity of deputy steward and defendant's solicitor, the cheque was paid to him and received by him in his character of defendant's solicitor. The defendant on the other hand contended that the cheque was paid to Craig in his character of deputy steward. The question in the case was whether the payment by the surrenderee to Craig, the deputy steward, was under these circumstances a good payment of the fine to the lord. The jury found that Craig had authority to receive the fine for the lord, and that the crossed cheque was a good payment to the lord within the authority to pay Craig. But it is contended that the jury ought to have been directed to find for the plaintiff. That point was reserved. In deciding this question we are to bear in mind that Craig, at the time when he was appointed deputy steward, was an attorney of undoubted credit; and it may be that the steward would have preferred him as a debtor even to the surrenderee himself; and that the cheque given by the defendant to the deputy steward was a good cheque, and was duly paid by the defendant's bankers on presentment. The steward of the manor may appoint a deputy to act as steward in his place, and the deputy may do all that the steward himself could have done: (Parker v. Kett, 1 Ld. Raym. 658; 1 Scriv. Cop. 119.) Here it is plain from the terms of the draft admittance which contains in the body of it a receipt for the lord's fine, and from Mills' letter of the 8th June that the deputy had authority to receive the fine and fees. But the fine is not due until after admittance, and is recoverable by action afterwards as this action shows; and although the admittance contains a receipt for the fine the lord does not in practice, and will not, enrol that admittance until the fine is paid. It appears to me that Craig acted in two capacities, as deputy steward in receiving the 78*l.* 15*s.* for the lord's fine, and 4*l.* 11*s.* 8*d.* for the steward's fees, and as solicitor for the defendant in receiving 4*l.* 4*s.*, being his own charges as defendant's attorney. The defendant must have known that the 78*l.* 15*s.* was paid to the lord, and 4*l.* 11*s.* 8*d.* to the steward, for it will be observed that the draft admittance itself expressly informed the defendant that those two sums were paid to Craig, and received by Craig as deputy steward. Suppose the steward himself had in this case acted instead of employing a deputy, and had been (as often happens) himself solicitor to the copyholder, as well as steward of the manor, and had himself received from the copyholder a good cheque, duly paid by the copyholder's bankers for a sum including the lord's fine, the steward's fees, and his own charges; and suppose the money stopped in the hands of the steward's bankers, or the steward otherwise unable to pay the lord, would not that have been a good payment as between the lord and the surrenderee, although the steward sustained the double character of surrenderee's attorney and of steward when he received the money? I think it would have been a good payment; but it would of course have been no payment as between the lord and the steward. The lord would have had his remedy against the steward as in the case now before us he has his remedy both against the steward and the deputy steward. At lowest from the moment Craig received the money he held it as deputy steward; his only remaining duty being to pay it over to the steward. It was objected that the payment was by cheque. The answer is, that it was not a dishonoured cheque, but a good cheque duly paid on presentment. Moreover it is plain the steward did not object to a cheque, for he afterwards writes to Craig (on the 10th July) desiring to receive a cheque. But whose cheque, or from whom, does not clearly appear. I do not perceive any obligation on the deputy steward to remit to the lord or the steward the identical cheque that he received. Suppose the steward himself had acted in person and had received a cheque, would it be his duty to remit it to the lord? Surely not; for even that cheque would be for two items, the lord's fine and the steward's fees. Here the cheque was for three items, the lord's fine and the steward's fees, and the defendant's attorney's charges. Then it is objected that the check was crossed; but this was done at the request of the deputy steward, and for his own convenience and safety. It matters not, as it seems to me, that the crossing was by the hand of the surren-deree. The payee or subsequent holder of a cheque may cross it at any time either with the words "and Co.," or with his own banker's name, and the drawer cannot prevent him. Suppose it had not been crossed, but had been paid by Craig into his own bankers in the ordinary course of business after the transaction with the surrenderee had been finished, the result would have been precisely the same. It is as if the deputy steward, after receiving the cheque, had sent it to be cashed by a clerk or servant of his own, who received the money and appropriated the payment to a debt of his own due to him from his master. Craig's banker, for this purpose, is his servant. Or suppose Craig had received the money in cash, and had paid it into his banker's, the money would still have been stopped. If it be objected that the amount of the cheque blended the three sums of 78*l.* 15*s.*, 4*l.* 11*s.* 8*d.*, and 4*l.* 4*s.*, so would a bank note for 100*l.*, or nine bank notes for 10*l.* each. In these cases, and indeed in the case of one payment in coin a separation of sums would have been equally necessary afterwards. With respect to the time when the cheque was given being after admittance, it has been already observed that the fine is not due till after admittance, though the lord or steward are not bound to enrol the admittance till the fine and fees are paid; and it is conceived that the time which elapsed between the admittance and the payment was no more than a reasonable time, and within the limits of Craig's authority, the admittance still remaining in Craig's hands. The facts do not seem here to be in dispute. If, therefore, it be a question of law, I think the payment to Craig a good payment to the steward or the lord. If it be a question of fact, then the jury have found that the payment to Craig, and the manner in which it was made, were within the limits of his authority to receive it as deputy steward. On these grounds, I am of opinion that the rule to enter a verdict for the plaintiff should be discharged, and that the verdict for the defendant should stand.

Rule absolute.

Attorneys for the plaintiff, Ward, Mills, and Witham.

Attorneys for the defendant, Monckton and Monckton.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

Reported by H. LEIGH and E. LUMLEY, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Jan. 19 and June 10.

THE MAYOR, ALDERMEN, AND BURGESSES OF DORCHESTER v. ENSOR AND MANFIELD.

Ancient market—Action for disturbance of—What amounts to a disturbance—New market held on different days from old market—Evidence of disturbance for jury—Limits of borough—Municipal Corporation Act (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76), sects. 7 and 8.

The corporation of an ancient municipal borough, the limits of which were, for Parliamentary purposes, enlarged and fixed by the 2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 64, s. 35, schedule O, are entitled, under the Municipal Corporation Act (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76), sects. 7 and 8, to hold their ancient market anywhere within such enlarged limits, notwithstanding that the same may be without the original limits of such ancient municipal borough.

An interference in the affairs and management of a new market, as, e. g., receiving rent in the nature of stallage, or any increased rent of the field used for such new market above that which, otherwise, would be obtainable, is sufficient to fix a defendant in an action for disturbance of market (see Mosley v. Chadwick, 7 B. & C. 47, note) and it is not necessary for that purpose that he should have actually sold.

To hold a new market in a town upon the same da that an ancient market is held there "shall be intended to be a nuisance," and, therefore, amounts in law to a disturbance; but to hold it on a different day is only evidence of a disturbance to be laid before the jury: (see Yard v. Ford, 2 Wms. Saund. 174, note.)

So held by the Court of Exchequer (Channell, Pigott, and Cleasby, BB.)

This was an action brought by the plaintiffs, the mayor and corporation of the borough of Dorchester, in the county of Dorset, against the defendants to recover from the latter compensation in damages for injuries sustained by the plaintiffs through the alleged unlawful infringement by the defendants of the rights of the plaintiffs to certain fairs and markets within the limits of the borough of Dorchester, by the defendants wrongfully holding within the same limits, cattle and sheep markets on the day on which and at or near to the place where the plaintiffs were of right accustomed to hold their fairs and markets. By the first count of their declaration the plaintiffs charged that they were lawfully and of right possessed of a market for the sale of goods wares, merchandise, horses, sheep, stock, and cattle, holden in the said borough of Dorchester, in the said county, on Wednesday and Saturday in every week, together with the tolls, stallage, rents, and other profits to the said market appertaining, and the defendants disturbed the plaintiffs' said market and prevented their enjoyment thereof, and of the said tolls, stallages, rents, and other profits, by unlawfully, on the market days aforesaid, holding a new market for the sale of divers . . . . sheep, stock, and cattle, within the limits of the said borough, near to the place where the said market of the plaintiffs was holden, whereby the plaintiffs lost the tolls, stallages, rents, and other profits of their said market.

By the second count, the plaintiffs charged that they were lawfully, &c., possessed of a market for the sale of goods, &c., holden at the place and times as in the first count mentioned, together with the tolls, stallages, rents, and other profits to the said market appertaining, and the defendants disturbed the plaintiffs' said market and prevented their enjoyment thereof, and of the said tolls, stallages, rents, and other profits by unlawfully, on the market days in the first count mentioned, exposing for sale, in certain places and premises near and adjoining to the said market divers . . . . sheep, stock, and cattle, within the limits of the said borough, near to the places where the said market of the plaintiffs was holden as aforesaid, whereby the plaintiffs suffered the damage in the first count mentioned.

By the third count the plaintiffs charged that they were lawfully and of right entitled to hold, and were possessed of certain fairs for the sale of . . . sheep, stock, and cattle, holden in the borough of Dorchester, in the said county of Dorset, on certain days, to wit on the 14th Feb., the 6th July, the 6th Aug., and the 25th Oct. in every year, with the tolls, stallages, rents, and other profits to the said fairs appertaining, and the defendants disturbed the plaintiffs' said fairs, and prevented their enjoyment thereof, and of the said tolls, stallages, rents, and other profits, by unlawfully on the fair days aforesaid, holding new fairs for the sale of divers goods . . . . sheep, cattle, and stock, within the limits of the said borough, near to the place where the said fairs of the plaintiffs were holden as aforesaid, whereby the plaintiffs suffered the damage in the first count mentioned.

By the fourth count the plaintiffs charged that they were lawfully and of right entitled to hold, and were possessed of certain fairs for the sale of goods . . . . stock, and cattle holden at the place and times as in the last count mentioned, together with the tolls, stallages, rents, and other profits to the said fairs appertaining, and the defendants disturbed the plaintiffs' said fairs, and prevented their enjoyment thereof, and of the said tolls, stallages, rents, and other profits by unlawfully, on the fair days in the last count mentioned, exposing for sale, in certain places and premises near to and adjoining to the said fairs, divers goods . . . . sheep, stock, and cattle within the limits of the said borough near to the place where the said fairs of the plaintiffs were holden as aforesaid, whereby the plaintiffs suffered the damage in the first count mentioned.

Digitized by Google

The following interrogatories accompanied the declaration and were to be answered by the defendants by affidavit in writing within ten days, to be sworn and filed in the ordinary way, pursuant to the statute in that behalf, and the order of Byles, J., dated 19th June 1868: 1. Did you, or either of you and which of you, sign a certain notice served on James Hooper, collector of tolls for the town council of the borough of Dorchester, or was the same signed by your authority? and state what you or either of you know of the same. 2. Have not you, the said defendant William Manfield, received some portion of the proceeds arising from the tolls, rents, and profits, derived on a certain piece of land and premises within the said borough, and mentioned in the said notice, to the said James Hooper, of horses, pigs, sheep, and other merchandise, or some of them? 3. Of whom is the said piece of land held, and what rent is paid for the same, and to whom?

Pursuant to the before-mentioned order, the following affidavit was filed on the 29th June 1869.

We, John Ensor, of Dorchester, in the county of Dorset, auctioneer, and William Manfield, of the same place, esquire, the above-named defendants, in answer to the interrogatories delivered in this cause, severally make oath and say as follows: 1. That I, the defendant William Manfield, say that I believe I signed a notice, dated the 19th day of Nov. 1867, but whether the same was served on James Hooper, collector of tolls for the town council of the borough of Dorchester, or any one else, of my own knowledge I know not. 2. That in the absence of information as to the particular piece of land referred to in the second interrogatory, I state that I have not received any tolls, rents, and profits from any sales on any piece of land and premises within the said borough of Dorchester. 3. Referring to the second paragraph of this affidavit, we decline to state our title to any land we may hold within the said borough of Dorchester.

The defendants pleaded—1. Not guilty. 2. To the first and second counts of the declaration that the plaintiffs were not lawfully and of right possessed of a market for the sale of goods, wares, merchandise, horses, sheep, stock, and cattle as in the said counts alleged. 3. To the third and fourth counts that the plaintiffs were not lawfully and of right entitled to hold certain fairs for the sale of goods, wares, &c., as in the said counts alleged. Issue was joined on all the above pleas.

At the trial before Channell, B. and a special jury, at Dorchester, at the Summer Assize 1868, amongst the documents put in evidence by the plaintiffs were a writ ad quod damnum, of the date of 28th March in the eleventh year of Edw. 3, directed to the sheriff of Dorsetshire to inquire whether it would be to the loss or prejudice of the Crown, or of others, or to the diminution of the power of the county of Dorset if the king should grant to the burgesses of Dorchester to hold to them and their heirs and successors, burgesses of the same borough, together with the liberties, free customs, and all other things to the same borough howsoever belonging to the Crown and its heirs at fee farm for ever, or not, and how much the aforesaid borough is worth by the year, and in what the profits of the same borough consisted, &c. Then followed the inquisition thereon, returned in obedience to the above writ, by which it appeared that the profits of the borough consisted in (amongst other things) "three fairs at the feast of the Holy Trinity, the nativity of St. John the Baptist, and St. James the Apostle, and three markets weekly, on each Wednesday, Friday, and Saturday. A grant or charter of the 11 Edw. 3, 1327, was also in evidence, by which, in pursuance of the said inquisition, the Crown granted the said borough with the appurtenances unto the said burgesses, to hold to the said burgesses, their heirs and successors, with all liberties and free customs to the same borough belonging at fee farm for ever, rendering therefore 20*l.* by the year, and it was proved that this rent was paid to the Crown at the present time.

By letters patent of 19 Ric. 2, 8 Hen. 6, and 5 Edw. 4 respectively, this charter was inspected and confirmed, each in succession confirming all things therein contained.

By a charter of 8 Jac. 1, the former charters and grants were confirmed, and new and extended powers and privileges were conferred on the corporation, and it prohibited, under penalty, anyone except a free burgess or free inhabitant to exercise any "art, occupation, or mystery" within the town and its limits, or to have any "shop, place, or station therein for sale of any wares, &c., in the said town, excepting at the time of fairs and markets in the town," and it confirms to the bailiffs and burgesses the use and enjoyment thenceforth for ever of all their juries, fairs, liberties, &c.

By a charter of 5 Car. 1 all the before mentioned charters were confirmed; and by sect. 29 thereof it was granted that no person using any art, occupation, or mystery, or any other person who, not a free burgess or free inhabitant, should exercise any art, occupation, or mystery within the borough, "unless only in the time of fairs and markets within the borough;" and by sect. 32 it was granted that "the mayor and his successors should have toll of grain brought to the market within the borough to be sold, as there before this time have been used."

In addition to the three fairs above mentioned, held by express grant, the plaintiffs claimed also to hold a fourth fair on the 14th Feb. in every year by immemorial user and prescription, and they gave evidence at the trial of the actual holding of it for a considerable period of time. But as the court, in their judgment, were of opinion that there was no evidence of any disturbance of the fairs, it becomes unnecessary to make any further allusion to the question of the fairs, or of the plaintiffs' right to them.

With regard to the markets, it appeared from the evidence that no market had been held in recent times on a Friday, but that on every Wednesday and Saturday a small market was held for the sale of some articles; and that with regard to the markets for horses, sheep, and cattle, the practice for many years had been to hold a "great market," as it was called, fortnightly for that purpose.

Up to 1834 the markets and fairs were held in the streets of the old municipal borough, but at that time a local Act passed enabling the corporation to remove the fairs from the streets to a field in an adjoining parish, which they purchased, and to hold the Trinity Monday fair from thenceforth on the 25th October, and reserving to the corporation all their previous rights.

The limits of the borough were, for the purposes of Parliamentary representation, enlarged by the Reform Act (2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 64), s. 35, sched. O, and by the Municipal Corporation Act (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76,) ss. 7, 8, the old municipal boundaries were, in 1835, extended to the same limits as the Parliamentary boundaries, and thereupon the corporation resolved to move the sheep and cattle market to the same field.

Digitized by Google

Although for many years the cattle market had been held on every alternate Saturday, there was some evidence showing that it had also been open on every Saturday to persons who chose to bring cattle there for sale. The corporation received tolls on certain articles brought and exposed for sale at these fairs, namely, 1*s.* 6*d.* a score for sheep, and 6*d.* a head for horses. Previous to 1862 the defendant Ensor had held sales in the corporation field by licence from the corporation, and had paid the regular tolls. In 1864 Ensor commenced selling sheep, &c., in a piece of ground of his own within the borough, but refused to pay any toll. In 1866 he commenced his cattle and sheep sales in another piece of land adjoining, alleged by the plaintiffs to be the property of the defendant Manfield, and to be let by him for the purpose to the defendant Ensor, or to be occupied by the two defendants jointly for the same purpose, and still refused to pay tolls to the plaintiffs, and it is in respect of the sales there held that the present action is brought. To fix the defendant Ensor, there was the evidence of three witnesses (one of them being the collector of the market tolls), who proved that on certain Saturdays in May and Nov. 1867, and Feb. 1868, Ensor was in the field, and that on those occasions there were, on one occasion 719 sheep, and on another 570, and on another 400 sheep penned; that a sale was going on, that Ensor was selling, and many persons were bidding; that there was a regular market of the plaintiffs', although not their great fortnightly cattle market, held on the same days.

The evidence by which it was sought to fix the defendant Manfield was, that the field was generally called and known as "Mr. Manfield's field." That Manfield had been seen at the field on more than one occasion, while Ensor's sales were going on, and that on Saturday, the 23rd Nov., upon the witness (a policeman) going to the field by order of the plaintiffs, to see what was going on, and to count the numbers of sheep, &c. there, the defendant Manfield said to him, "We don't want any Bobbies here, it is my own private property, and you leave my field," and that Manfield took him by the arm and turned him towards the gate, saying, "if you don't leave the field, I'll have some men to put you out," whereupon the witness, who had not counted all the sheep that were there, was obliged to quit the field.

In addition to this, there was given in evidence a notice in writing under the hand of the defendant Manfield, which he had caused to be served upon the plaintiffs' collector of tolls, the 19th Nov. 1867, to the following effect:—"I hereby give you notice not to trespass on the land and premises belonging to me, the same being in the joint occupation of myself and J. T. Ensor, situate in the parish of Saint Peter."

There was no proof and no pretence for saying that there was any other field in the joint occupation of the defendants except the field in question.

Thereupon at the trial, before Channell, B., at the Summer Assizes for Dorsetshire in 1868, a verdict was entered for the plaintiffs with damages, under his Lordship's direction, leave being reserved by the learned judge to the defendant's counsel to move to enter the verdict for the defendants on the counts claiming a right to hold the markets, if no evidence to go to the jury in support of those counts; and the like leave as to counts claiming a right to hold the fairs. Also to enter a verdict for the defendants if no evidence to go to the jury of a disturbance of the fair or market for the defendant against whom there was no evidence of a disturbance. His Lordship ruled as a point of law that the defendants, if otherwise guilty were so though the disturbance was not on the day on which the plaintiffs were entitled to hold and held their market, but on a day shortly after.

A rule was accordingly obtained in Michaelmas Term last by H. T. Cole, Q. C. for the defendants to set aside the plaintiffs' verdict and to enter the verdict for the defendants; and also for a new trial (unless the plaintiffs consented to a special case being entered) on the ground that there was no evidence to show that the plaintiffs were possessed of the right to hold markets and fairs at the times or places alleged, or at any time or place. Nor was there any evidence of any disturbance of any such fair or market by the defendants or either of them.

Jan. 19.—Mellish, Q. C., Kingdon, Q. C., and Lopes for the plaintiffs, showed cause against the above rule.—The documentary evidence clearly established the right of the plaintiffs to hold three fairs in the year, at Christmas, on St. John Baptist's Day, and Michaelmas Day, and three markets every week, on Wednesdays, Fridays, and Saturdays. Three fairs only are mentioned in the charter, but the plaintiffs claimed the right to hold a fourth fair on the 14th Feb. yearly. By the 65th section of the Local Act (4 Will. 4, c. 16), the fairs were removed from the old site to the corporation field, and the fair days were altered, and in that sect. the fair on the 14th Feb. is mentioned, which is a confirmation of its parol origin. In pursuance of that Act the corporation in 1835 purchased the present fair field outside the limits of the old borough, and there the fairs have since been held. It is difficult to see what objection there can be to the evidence showing the existence of three fairs and three markets. The evidence of old witnesses to the existence of the fourth fair went back for sixty years. Its omission from the inquisition is immaterial, for it need not have an immemorial origin, the Crown has always the power to grant a fair De facto a sheep market was held every alternate Saturday prior to 1862, though the right existed to hold one every Saturday. The defendant Ensor, by agreement with the corporation, held a sheep auction in the market place on every alternate Saturday, and paid the same toll for sheep sold by him as was paid by others on the other Saturdays, which amounted to an admission of the plaintiffs' right to a weekly market. Upon some graziers complaining that the corporation had no right to give to Ensor this exclusive privilege of the use of the market on alternate Saturdays, the market for cattle was in 1861 thrown open every Saturday. The right of the corporation to hold the market every Saturday was undoubted; but even if only to hold them every other Saturday, could it be doubted that the defendants' sale would be an injury; the proof being that sometimes 500 and sometimes 700 sheep were brought for sale to Ensor's market. As matter of common sense it must have caused a diminution in the plaintiffs' market. Nothing specific was proved with respect to an infringement of the fairs, but, if the plaintiffs prove their right to the fairs and the markets, and an infringement of the markets, that it is submitted would be a sufficient infringement of the fairs. It was a question of fact. In Yard v. Ford 2 Wms. Saund. 174, it is said in a note that it shall be put in issue whether the holding of a market in such a case is a nuisance or not. (He cited also Fitzh. Nat. Brev. n (b); 3 Bl. Com. 219.) Then, next, was there any evidence to fix the other defendant, Mr. Manfield? First, it was said to be his field. It was clear that he claimed to be in possession of it, and he ordered off the bailiff who came in to number the sheep. That was sufficient to show that he had not demised it to Ensor, but had only given the latter licence to hold his auction there. Had he demised it, it would not be contended that he would be answerable for the acts of his tenant. Then there was the notice given by him not to trespass on the field in the joint occupation of himself and Ensor. [CLEASBY, B.—Was there a corporation market going on on the 23rd Feb.?] Yes; the market was open. Whether any sheep were there or not is immaterial—nay, if there were none, that only shows that Ensor's market was working the greater injury. They referred also to sects. 66, 76, and 77 of the Local Act (4 Will. 4, c. 16).

Digitized by Google

H. T. Cole, Q. C. and Bere, for the defendants, contra, supported their rule.—The proof affirmatively of the existence of a fair and of its disturbance by the defendants, was on the plaintiffs. No evidence had been given fixing Manfield's liability. Supposing the court holds that there was a grant of the markets, there was no evidence of any distinct licence either of the fairs or markets. But we contend the right has been lost. There is no evidence of a continuous user of the market on the particular Saturdays on which the disturbance is alleged. In 1806 occurs the first notice of a market, in an entry in the corporation books of a resolution to hold a fortnightly cattle and sheep market for the public convenience. Before 1806, there were no cattle markets at all. The Friday's market is admitted to have been given up. The alleged disturbances were on the alternate Saturdays, and there is no case to show that holding a market on a different day is a disturbance. [PIGOTT, B.—In the case cited from Saunders, it is not made a question whether the market complained of was held on the same day as the plaintiffs' market, or on some other day.] The grant of the market does not enable the grantee to exclude another person from his own field. Nor does the right to the market carry the right to toll. It was clear from sect. 32 of the charter of Charles I. that, prior thereto, though grain had been sold, no toll had been taken. In 1640 no toll was taken on the sale of sheep, but 1*s.* 6*d.* a score was paid for penning them. Toll is not incident to a fair or market, and the grantee shall not have it without a special grant: (Com. Dig. title "Market, Toll," &c.) [CHANNELL, B.—May there not be a disturbance of market even if there be no grant of toll?] It is contended there cannot be. There would be no nuisance, no deprivation of aught to which the plaintiffs were entitled. [CLEASBY, B.—Without reference to toll, direct your attention to this: There is a grant of a market, which gives a right to take money for stallage; may there not be a disturbance of that market?] Not if there is no right to take toll. [CLEASBY, B.—Then the grant of a market as a franchise comes to nothing?] That is so, unless there be a disturbance which amounts to a nuisance. The sum here paid was not toll at all. There was no evidence for the jury showing any disturbance of the market in the legal acceptation of the words.

The Earl of Egremont v. Saul, 6 A. & E. 924 6 L. J., N. S., 205, K. B.;

Mosley v. Walker, 7 B. & C. 40; 5 L. J. 358, K. B. Even if what was done by Ensor on his own land amounted to setting up a market, it was no infringement of the rights of the plaintiffs, and was not actionable. No proof was given, as might have been done, whose cattle they were. But assuming them to have been Ensor's or Manfield's, it was not shown that if not sold at Ensor's auction they would have been sold in the plaintiffs' market; and it is only fair to assume that they were cattle in excess of what could be sold in the plaintiffs' market. There was no evidence of the sale of any sheep here, but merely the statement of a man that so many sheep were in the field. In Yard v. Ford, (ubi sup.) cited contra, substantial loss and damage were found affirmatively, and that question should have been put to the jury here. In The Mayor, &c., of Brecon v. Edwards, 6 L. T. Rep. N. S. 293; 31 L. J. 368, Ex.; 1 H. & C., a good definition of a market and what amounts to an infringement of it is given by Wilde, B. Again, the defendant, Ensor, was the son of a resident free burgess, all whose rights were reserved by the charter of Charles I., and confirmed by the Municipal Corporation Act (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 76) s. 2. As such, therefore, he had a right to sell at his own shop or in his own field on the market day, a proposition clearly laid down in Bridgeland v. Shapter, 5 M. & W. 375; 8 L. J. N. S. 246, Ex.; and in The Mayor, &c., of Macclesfield v. Chapman, 12 M. & W. 18; 13 L. J., N. S., 32 Ex., Parke, B. says, that there does not appear to be any authority that the mere possession of a market implies the right, as a matter of law, of preventing individuals from selling marketable articles in their own shops within the limit of the market on market days. In the case of the Bailiffs of Tewkesbury v. Diston, 6 East, 438, there was a special exception in the declaration of the defendant as not being a freeman of the borough, and it was assumed in argument that if he had been one, the case would have been different. There was the same exception also in the Bailiffs of Tewkesbury v. Brickwell, 2 Taunt. 120. [CHANNELL, B.—The present case differs materially from the cases that have been cited. Here the defendant is an auctioneer, he is on the spot, and several hundred sheep are there to be sold. Surely that was evidence for the jury that he was there selling them, unless you had shown that they were his own sheep, and also that it was his own field.] What case is there showing he was not entitled to carry on the business of an auctioneer? In Wiltshire, app. v. Willett, resp., in the Common Pleas, 5 L. T. Rep. N. S. 335; 31 L. J. 8, M. C., which was an appeal from justices raising the question whether the sale of certain goods by the respondent in an auction room in a house in the borough of Cardiff, was or not an infringement of the Local Market Act, Erle, C.J., said, "then came the question whether the auctioneer selling them is within the exception" (in the Act). "I do not see why a person may not in his own shop dispose of his goods by auction, private contract, or commission." Moreover, also, the site of the plaintiffs' market had been moved from without the ancient municipal limits to a spot where they had no right, under their charter, to hold it.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 10.—The judgment of the court (Channell, Pigott, and Cleasby, BB.), was now delivered as follows, by CHANNELL, B.—We are of opinion that the verdict entered for the plaintiffs at the trial cannot stand; also, that the rule obtained by the defendants to enter a verdict for them ought not to be made absolute, but that, for the reasons hereinafter stated, the defendants, if they desire it, are entitled to a new trial. This would be sufficient for the disposal of the rule now pending. The rule to enter the verdict for the defendants did not, as it ought to have done, specify the grounds on which that verdict was claimed; but, on the rule being called on for argument, it was agreed that all points open to the defendants on my notes should be raised, and the rule was accordingly argued on that footing. As we have already stated, we think that there ought to be a new trial. Still, as on the argument of the rule, questions were discussed which may arise again if a second trial takes place, it may be an assistance to the parties, and may possibly prevent the necessity for a second trial, if we state the opinion which we have formed on these various points, although in the result they do not affect our present judgment that there ought to be, if the defendants desire it, a new trial. The declaration contained four counts, in two of which the plaintiffs allege that they were possessed of a market in the borough of Dorchester, and that the defendants disturbed that market, by holding, as alleged in the first count, a new market, and by exposing goods, &c., for sale near to the plaintiff's market, as alleged in the second count. The other two counts complained of similar disturbances of the right, which the plaintiffs alleged they had, of holding four fairs in the year. The defendants pleaded "not guilty," and they also traversed that the plaintiffs were possessed of the market, and entitled to hold their fairs. At the trial the plaintiffs put in evidence a writ ad quod damnum, of the date of 11 Edw. 3, and the inquisition returned by the sheriff to that writ, by which it appeared that the profits of the borough of Dorchester at that time included three fairs, on certain named feast days, and also three markets every week, on Wednesdays, Fridays, and Saturdays. There was also put in a grant of Edw. 3, founded on that inquisition, by which those franchises and customs were granted and confirmed to the mayor and burgesses of Dorchester in fee farm for ever, at a rent of 20*l*. It was proved that this rent was paid at the present time. There was also a charter of Charles I. put in, confirming the privileges of the corporation. We think that there was abundant evidence of the right originally to three markets in the week, and to at least three fairs in the year. As to the fourth fair, that which the corporation claim to hold on the 14th Feb., evidence of the actual holding of the fair for a considerable time was given, which was, we think, sufficient to show the existence of the right to that also. Inasmuch, however, as we think there was no evidence of disturbance of the fairs, it is not necessary to go further into the question of the right to the fairs. As regards the holding of the market, the evidence showed that no market had been held in modern times on a Friday. On every Wednesday and Saturday it appeared that there was a small market held for the sale of some articles, but the important question in this cause arises as to the markets for sheep, horses, and cattle; and as to that it appears that the practice for many years has been to hold, for that purpose, what is called a great market once a fortnight. For many years the cattle market has been held on every alternate Saturday; the object of this appears to be the convenience of persons frequenting the market; and there was some evidence to show that the market ground had actually been open every Saturday to persons who chose to bring cattle there for sale. It by no means appears, therefore, that the corporation have lost their right to hold a cattle market every Saturday, or indeed every Wednesday, if they choose to do so. But, however that may be, the plaintiffs can only recover in this action for disturbance of markets which they actually held, and they only appear to have held cattle markets on alternate Saturdays. As, however, this is one of the days on which the markets granted were originally held, and so far as appears upon the evidence the cattle markets have constantly been held, and always on one of these days, we are of opinion that they are rightfully held, so far as the day is concerned. A further question was raised as to the place in which the market was held. It was conceded on both sides that the market might be held on any part of the ancient borough. The market field however, in which the market has been held since shortly after the passing of the Municipal Corporation Act is without the ancient borough, but within the limits of the Parliamentary borough to which, for some purposes, at all events, the ancient borough was enlarged. The question is, whether upon the passing of that Act the corporation became entitled to hold their ancient market anywhere within the limits of the borough as enlarged; and that, of course depends upon the words of the Act. The sections principally in question are the 7th and 8th. The 7th section says that the metes and boundaries of certain boroughs (amongst them Dorchester) "for the purposes of this Act, shall be those of the Parliamentary boroughs." The 8th section says that "every place and precinct which shall be included within the lands of any borough as therein before provided, and none other, shall be part of such borough, and in those boroughs which are counties in themselves shall be part of such county, and of none other. In this 8th section the words "for the purposes of this Act" are not used. It appears, indeed, from a note in Rawlinson's Municipal Corporation Acts, p. 14, and also in Chitty's Statutes, p. 962, that some of the copies of the Act printed by the king's printer had those words in the 8th section also, but that they are not in the Parliament roll. As the words are not found in any of the copies printed since attention was drawn to the point, there can be no doubt that this latter statement is correct. Probably the words were in the Bill, but were struck out before it passed; that, of course, cannot affect the construction of the Act as it stands, but it increases the probability in fact that the omission of the words was intentional, and therefore justifies us in giving effect to the difference in language in the two sections which otherwise might have been thought so slight as to be immaterial. Now what is the effect of the two sections taken together. Sect. 7 says that "for the purposes of the Act" (within which sect. 8 would apparently be included), the boundary should be so and so. . . . Then sect. 8 says that all places within the boundaries defined by sect. 7 shall be parts of the borough, without any restriction as to their being so for the purposes of the Act only. There can be no doubt that the main object of sect. 8 was rather to cause the locality attached by the Act to boroughs or counties to cease to form parts of those to which they had before belonged; but if the language by which this is effected is efficient to attach them to the borough for general purposes, more extensive than those as to which sect. 7 applied, there is no reason why we should not give effect to that arrangement. It is true that in Beardsworth v. Toorkington, 1 Q. B. 782; 10 L. J., N. S., 254, Q. B., it is said by the court, at p. 791 of 1 Q. B., that they find no provision in the Act sufficient to add these places to the boroughs, for all intents and purposes. But it must be remembered that that case was a very different one from the present. If it had been held that the additional parish had been attached to the borough of Stamford for the purpose of entitling the inhabitants of such additional parish to the rights which the inhabitants in the old borough had by prescription, the result would have clearly been to disregard the policy of the 2nd section of the Act, by which ancient rights are reserved only to those persons who would be entitled to them but for the passing of the Act. That case is rather like what the present case would be if the market had been moved before the boundaries were enlarged. It appears to us that the corporation, being at the passing of the Municipal Corporation Act, entitled to hold a market at any place within the jurisdiction of their governing body, became, upon the passing of that Act, entitled to hold it within any part of the district to which that jurisdiction was enlarged, and that there is nothing in the wording of the 7th section which obliges us to hold that the corporation, by holding the market within the part added to the borough, had forfeited their ancient right. It must be remembered that no rights would be affected by the jurisdiction being enlarged for this purpose. It would not cause any acts to be disturbances of the market which would not have been such before; for a market in a borough may be disturbed by holding another market near; whether the new market be held within or without the borough. The moving of the market could only be prompted as, undoubtedly it was in the present case, by considerations of convenience. It was contended that if there had been a disturbance at all, it was not a disturbance by both defendants jointly. Now the evidence showed that the defendant Ensor was an auctioneer who at one time had sold cattle by auction under the authority of the corporation at their market; but that latterly he had held, at another place close by, a fortnightly sale of cattle by auction, which appeared to have been regularly advertised. There can be no question that this is substantially another market, and that it differs very much from the case of a man selling his own goods out of the market, which may or may not be a wrongful disturbance according to circumstances. The cases, therefore, as to the right of persons in some boroughs, where there is an ancient market, to sell marketable goods on their own premises and the like, do not, we think, apply; because what is complained of here is not that the defendants sell their own goods, but that they provide a means for others to sell their goods without bringing them to the market. Then, as to the part taken by the other defendant. It appears that Ensor, who actually conducts the sale, does so in a place which was called "Mr. Manfield's field." There was no legal proof that the field belonged to the defendant Manfield. It appears, however, that he was present on some occasions when the sales were going on, and that he said the field was his private field, and asserted his right to turn off a police constable who was counting the sheep which were being sold. He also served a notice on the collector of tolls for the borough, not to trespass on any land belonging to him, "the same being in the joint occupation of himself and Ensor." It was contended that, although the particular place was not specified yet, as there was no other land which there was any pretence for saying was in the joint occupation of the defendants, this notice amounted to an admission that Manfield was responsible for what was done on his field. Now it is not necessary, in order to fix a defendant with disturbing a market that he should have actually sold. It would also appear from what was said in Mosley v. Chadwick, 7 B. & C. 47, note, that merely receiving rent of the land used for the new market from the persons using it would be sufficient; and at any rate receiving rent in the nature of stallage, or any increased rent in consequence of the use to which the land is put above that which otherwise would be obtainable, would be sufficient. We think that the interference proved on the part of Manfield amounted to evidence to go the jury that both these defendants were taking part in carrying on the fortnightly sales. It remains only to consider the further fact that the sales were not held on the same Saturday as that on which the plaintiffs held their cattle market. The defendants, on the argument of the rule, contended that on this ground there was no disturbance. At the trial it appeared to me that the points which Mr. Cole desired to raise on behalf of the defendants, were sufficiently open to him upon the plaintiff's case, and it was rather at my suggestion that the case proceeded no further. I find, however, from my note that the form in which I reserved the question was "Leave to move to enter a verdict for the defendants on the counts claiming a right to hold the markets, if no evidence to go to the jury in support of these counts, and the like leave as to counts claiming a right to hold the fairs. Also to enter a verdict for the defendants if no evidence to go to a jury of a disturbance of the fair or market for the defendant against whom there was no evidence of a disturbance." I, however, ruled as a point of law that the defendants, if otherwise guilty, were so, though the disturbance was not on the day on which the plaintiffs were entitled to hold and held their market, but on a day shortly after. According to the view taken upon a more careful consideration of the case than I could give at Nisi Prius, my direction, though not incorrect as far as it goes, is not sufficient for the decision of the case. We think the law to be laid down in the notes to Yard v. Ford, 2 Wms. Saund. 174, that is that where a new market is held on the same day as the old, it shall be intended to be a nuisance; that where it is on a different day it shall be put in issue whether it be a nuisance or not. It was not, however, suggested to me that the true view in such a case was that it was a question of fact to be left to the jury, whether the old market was injuriously affected or not. The contention was that the defendants were not liable unless the disturbance was on the same day. If my attention had been drawn to it, I think that which was the object of all parties, namely, to bring the matter fully before the court, would have been carried out by expressly reserving to the court a power to draw inferences. If that had been done, we should have been prepared to draw the inference that some of the very large number of sheep and cattle sold at the defendants' sales would, if these sales had not been held, have been sold at the plaintiffs' market. This would, upon the authorities, clearly support the verdict for the plaintiffs. But the power to draw inferences was not expressly given to the court. Leave was given to enter a verdict if there was no evidence to go to the jury. We are of opinion not only that there was evidence to go to the jury, but that there was sufficient to support a verdict for the plaintiffs, and upon which that verdict ought to have been found. The rule to enter the verdict, therefore, cannot be made absolute, but, as my direction appears not to have been accurate, the defendants are entitled to a new trial. It is to be hoped, however, that after the opinion which we have expressed, the parties may come to an arrangement which may avoid the necessity of further litigation. Of course the opinion which we have formed, as far as questions of fact are concerned, might be altered by evidence at a second trial; yet, in order to prevent misapprehension, we think we ought to say that, unless the facts are substantially altered, a verdict for the defendants would be wrong. We cannot, however, see that we are authorised to draw such inferences as a jury might draw, and on that ground we are obliged to direct a new trial.

Digitized by Google

Rule to enter verdict for the defendants, discharged.

Rule for a new trial, absolute. (a)

Attorneys for the plaintiffs, Dangerfield and Frazer, 36, Craven-street, Strand, W.C., agents for Symonds, town clerk, Dorchester.

Attorneys for the defendants, Rhodes, Son, and Duffett, 63, Chancery-lane, W.C., agents for Andrews and Cockeram, Dorchester.

(a) The case went down, and was tried again at the last Summer (1869) Assizes for Dorsetshire, Kingdon, Q. C., Lopes, Q. C., and Bowen, appearing for the plaintiffs, and M. Bere, Q. C., for the defendants, when the latter consented to a verdict for the plaintiffs for 400l. and an agreed sum for costs.

Digitized by Google

Saturday, June 7.

HALL v. THE COMMISSIONERS OF INLAND REVENUE.

Revenue—Stamps—Bequest of residue of personalty to executors in trust for residuary legatee—Residue consisting of shares in a gas company and moneys on mortgage—Transfer by executors of the shares and mortgages to residuary legatee—Proper stamps on—Ad valorem—Stamp Acts (55 Geo. 3, c. 184, schedule, title "Transfer;" and 28 & 29 Vict. c. 96, s. 17)—Consequence of bequeathing residue to executors in trust for residuary legatee.

A testator by will bequeathed the residue of his "moneys, securities for moneys, goods, chattels, personal estate, and effects (subject to the payment of debts, &c., and legacies), unto A. and B., their executors, administrators, and assigns, and the survivors of them, upon trust, to call in, sell, and convert into money such part thereof as should not consist of money or securities for money, and stand possessed of the moneys arising by such sale and conversion, and all other his residuary personal estate in trust, to pay 3000l. to C., and the residue unto his (the testator's) nephew, R. H.; and he appointed A. and B. executors. All the debts and all the legacies which had become payable (including the said 3000l. to C.) were duly paid and discharged by the executors out of the personal estate and rents of the real estate, and several outstanding mortgage securities, made and granted to the testator in his lifetime, of sufficient amount for the purpose, were appropriated and set apart by them to meet certain other legacies bequeathed by the will, in which life interests were thereby directed to be paid to certain persons named.

The residuary personal estate consisted (inter alia) of certain shares in the L. Gaslight Company, and of several principal sums of money secured on several mortgages, transfers of mortgages, further charges, bonds, notes, and other securities, and it had not been necessary for any of the purposes of the will to call in, sell, or convert into money any portion of such residuary estate.

At the request of R. H., the residuary legatee, A. and B. agreed, as such trustees and executors as aforesaid, to transfer to him the above mentioned shares and principal sums of money, and a deed dated 1st June 1866, and made between the said A. and B. of the one part, and R. H. of the other part, was accordingly prepared and executed, which recited all the facts and matters above stated. By the first testatum clause of the deed, all the said gas shares and also all the several principal sums of money secured by the said several mortgages, &c. specified in three several schedules therein underwritten, and all interest, &c., together with the said several mortgage deeds, were assigned and transferred by the said A. and B., unto the said R. H., his executors, administrators, and assigns absolutely:

By a second testatum clause, "to the intent that the several hereditaments comprised in the said several mortgages, &c. might be duly vested in the said R. H., his heirs and assigns," all the messuages, &c. comprised in the said several mortgages, &c. were granted and conveyed by the said A. and B. unto and to the use of the said R. H., his heirs and assigns for ever, subject to the equity of redemption then subsisting therein respectively:

The aggregate amount of the several principal sums secured by the several mortgage deeds, was 32,499l.:

Held, by the Court of Exchequer (Kelly, C. B., and Bramwell, Channell, and Cleasby, BB.), that the deed on the face of it was a technical, substantial, and real transfer both of the gas shares and the mortgages specifically to R. H. and as such came within the description of the Act of Parliament, and was therefore liable to the stamp duty of 10l. 12s. 6d., assessed as follows:—As a transfer of shares in the stock of the L. Gas Company, "not otherwise charged under the heads of mortgage or of conveyance" (55 Geo. 3, c. 184, schedule, tit. "Transfer"), to a duty of 1l. 10s.; as a transfer of mortgages for 32,499l., to an ad valorem duty (under 28 & 29 Vict. c. 96, s. 17) of 6d. per 100l., 8l. 2s. 6d., and to a progressive duty of 1l.

Semble, had the bequest of the residue been directly to R. H., instead of to the executors in trust for him, no deed of transfer from the executors would have been necessary in order to vest the shares and mortgages in him.

This was a case, on adjudicaton for stamp duty, stated by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue for the opinion of the Court of Exchequer, pursuant to the 13 & 14 Vict. c. 97, on the requisition and behalf of Richard Hall, with respect to the proper stamp duty chargeable on the indenture next hereinafter mentioned.

By the indenture in question, which bore date 1st June 1866, and was made between Benjamin Hyde, of Louth, in the county of Lincoln, Esq., and Samuel Hyde, of 8, Billiter-square, London, Esq., of the one part, and the said Richard Hall, of the other part, after reciting that Richard Thew, Esq., deceased, by his will, dated 15th April 1851, legally executed, after devising his real estate and bequeathing several legacies, as therein mentioned, gave and bequeathed all the rest, residue, and remainder of his moneys, securities for moneys, goods, chattels, personal estate, and effects not before disposed of, and the moneys arising from the sale of his estate (subject to the payment of debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, legacies, &c., and the legacy duties for the same), unto the said B. Hyde and S. Hyde, their executors, administrators, and assigns, and the survivor of them, upon trust, to call in, sell, and dispose of and convert into money such part of his said residuary personal estate as should not consist of moneys or securities for money, and stand possessed of the moneys to arise by such sale and conversion, and all other his said residuary personal estate, and of the moneys to arise from sale of his said real estate (or part thereof) in trust to pay 3000l. to his nephew, Thos. Hall, and the residue thereof unto his nephew the said Richard Hall. And the testator appointed the said B. Hyde and S. Hyde executors of his said will, and reciting the testator's death on the 8th Dec. 1863, and that the said executors proved his said will on the 15th June 1864; and that all the testator's debts (except an annuity of 15l. secured by his bond as therein-mentioned), and his funeral and testamentary expenses had been duly paid and discharged by the said executors out of the testator's personal estate, and the rents of his real estate. And that all the several legacies bequeathed by his said will which had become due and payable, and all legacy duties payable in respect of the same had been duly paid and discharged with and out of the personal estate of the said testator, and the rents of his real estate; and in order to meet the due payment of the remaining legacies bequeathed by the said will, of and in which legacies, life interests, are therein directed to be paid to certain persons therein-named, several outstanding mortgages and securities, made and granted to the said testator in his lifetime, of sufficient amount had been appropriated and set apart. And reciting that the several shares of the said testator of and in the capital, stock, property, and effects of the Louth Gas Light Company, had not been sold and disposed of, and converted into money by the said executors, in pursuance of the trusts of the said will, and the several principal sums of money secured by and due on the several mortgages, transfers of mortgages, further charges, bonds, notes, and other securities specified in the several schedules thereto, had not been called in; and that it was not necessary for any of the purposes of the said will that the said shares should be sold, disposed of, and converted into money, nor that the said principal sums of money should be called in. And reciting that the said R. Hall, as residuary legatee as aforesaid, had requested the said B. Hyde and S. Hyde, as such trustees and executors as aforesaid, to assign and transfer the said several shares, and the said several principal sums of money, and the dividends and interest then and thereafter to become due thereon respectively, unto him, the said R. Hall, his executors, administrators, and assigns, which they had agreed to do as thereinafter mentioned. It was witnessed that in pursuance of agreement and for a nominal consideration, the said B. Hyde and S. Hyde did assign, transfer, and sell over unto the said R. Hall, his executors, administrators, and assigns, all those thirty-two shares of 25*l.* each in the capital, stock, property, and effects of the Louth Gas Light Company, numbered respectively (as therein set forth); and also all the several principal sums of money secured by and then due on the several mortgages, &c., and other securities mentioned and specified in the three several schedules thereunder written; and all interest due and to become due for or in respect of the said several shares and the several principal sums respectively, together with the said several mortgages, transfer of mortgages, &c., and all other the deeds, evidences, &c., in the custody or power of the said B. Hyde and S. Hyde, &c. To hold and take the said shares principal sums of money, dividends and interest, and all other the premises thereby assigned unto and by the said R. Hall, his executors, administrators, and assigns, to his and their own absolute use and benefit. And it was further witnessed that to the intent that the several hereditaments mentioned and comprised in the said mortgages, &c., specified in the first schedule, might be duly vested in the said R. Hall, his heirs and assigns. They the said B. Hyde and S. Hyde granted and conveyed unto the said R. Hall and his heirs, all and singular the messuages, &c., and other the hereditaments comprised in the said several mortgages, &c., mentioned and specified in the said first schedule (being freehold), with the appurtenances, to hold unto and to the use of the said R. Hall, and his heirs and assigns for ever, subject nevertheless to such right or equity of redemption as was then subsisting therein respectively. And it was further witnessed that for the reasons and considerations aforesaid, the said B. Hyde and S. Hyde assigned, transferred, and set over unto the said R. Hall, his executors, administrators, and assigns, all and singular the messuages, &c., comprised in the several mortgages, &c., mentioned and specified in the second schedule (being leasehold messuages) with the appurtenances, to hold to the said R. Hall, his executors, administrators, and assigns, for the residue of and in the several terms of years for which the same hereditaments and premises were granted and demised, subject, nevertheless, to such right and equity of redemption as was then subsisting therein.

Then followed the three schedules to the said deed, comprising the various mortgages and securities of freehold, leasehold, and copyhold lands, bonds, and notes of hand, &c., the aggregate amount of the principal moneys thereby secured being 32,499*l.* 0*s.* 7*d.*

The said deed was executed by all the parties thereto, and attested.

On the 6th July last, Mr. Hall, by his solicitor, presented the deed, which was then stamped with the duty of 2*l.* 15*s.* to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue at Somerset House under the 14th section of the 13 & 14 Vict. c. 97, and desired to have their opinion as to the stamp duty with which in their judgment, it was chargeable, and tendered and paid to the said commissioners 10*s.* as required by the said Act. The commissioners assessed and charged a duty of 10*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.* thereon as follows:—

Ad valorem transfer of mortgage on 32,499*l.*, being the total amount of the sums of money mentioned in the three schedules of the said indenture at the rate of 6*d.* per 100*l.* (28 & 29 Vict. c. 96, s. 17.)	8 2 6
Transfer of shares in the stock of the Louth Gas Light Company, not otherwise charged under the head of mortgage or of conveyance (55 Geo. 3, c. 184, sched. title "Transfer")	1 10 0
Progressive Duty (13 & 14 Vict. c. 97).	1 0 0
	£10 12 6

The solicitor of the said R. Hall was, however, at the same time informed that if it could be shown that the said shares had been transferred by a separate duly stamped instrument, the duty of 1*l.* 10*s.* would not be claimed.

Thereupon the said R. Hall, without producing or alleging that there had been any other transfer of the said shares, paid to the Receiver-General of the Inland Revenue 7*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.*, making up together with the 2*l.* 15*s.* duty impressed upon the said indenture the sum of 10*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.*, together with 10*l.* by way of penalty. And thereupon the said indenture was stamped with the proper stamps, denoting the said additional duty and the payment of the said penalty, and also with the particular stamp provided by the said commissioners under the said Act, denoting that the full amount of duty chargeable by law had been paid.

Mr. Hall was dissatisfied with that determination, and called on the commissioners to state and sign the present case, which they have accordingly done. The question for the opinion of the Court of Exchequer being with what stamp duty the said indenture of the 1st June 1866 is chargeable?

Sir J. B. Karslake, Q. C. (with him was F. P. Onslow, of the Chancery Bar) for the plaintiff Mr. Hall.—The question is, had this deed any operation at all at law beyond the mere conveyance of the dry legal estate, except possibly expressing the assent of the executors to the bequest to the plaintiff? It is contended that it had not as between themselves and the plaintiff the legatee. The executors had no further duty to perform, as soon as they assented the property became the plaintiff's property, without any transfer at all, and no transfer being required, the deed in question, though on its face and in terms a transfer, had no operation as such. By virtue of the probate the personal property vested in the executors, by whose assent it vests in the legatee. [BRAMWELL, B.—Had the bequest of the shares been to Hall directly, I could understand the argument, but here they are bequeathed to the executors in trust for Hall. Is not a transfer then necessary to get them out of the executors?] I apprehend if personalty is left to executors to pay debts and legacies, &c., they have a right to sell, even if not expressly directed to do so; and it is not because the testator directs a sale by them in trust for the benefit of A. B., that the executors take the property in any other way than as executors, and as between the executors and the legatee no deed was necessary. Moreover, the gas company, in all probability, have a particular form of transfer of their own, by which the property in shares is vested in the transferee, and on which, if at all, the duty may be payable. [BRAMWELL, B.—What is there to show that this deed is not equally efficacious, and why may not the gas company demand possession of the deed for the purpose of registering the plaintiff as a transferee. All that is necessary is that a person selling the shares should execute a transfer of them, and it is the company's duty to register them where so transferred. It may be that this is not a sufficient instrument to transfer these shares; but we must take it as it is, having no evidence on the subject. If a further instrument be necessary, it would be the subject of application to the Stamp-office, as a matter of mercy, to be relieved from paying the duty again; but meanwhile the plaintiff is not to be let off paying this stamp duty.] The deed must be taken with its legal effect. If it be that, as far as the gas company is concerned, it has no operation, then the duty cannot be charged; but it may be perfectly effectual as an assent by the executors to the legatees having the beneficial interest in the shares. Then, with regard to the money, the deed merely assigns to Hall what was his already. It may be taken to indicate the executor's assent, and that the time had arrived for him to have it, but he takes the whole of the mortgages and all the money without the assignment. The only operation of this deed is the conveyance to the plaintiff of a dry legal estate in the mortgaged premises. It is admitted that no ad valorem duty is payable on the value of a money bond assigned, and mortgage-debts are in the same position. The plaintiff's position with regard to the debts is not made a whit the better by this deed. But in addition to being executors they were also devisees in trust, and as such, conveyed the legal estate to the plaintiff. Suppose the executors and devisees in trust had been different persons, the executors would have been entitled to the debts, and the devisees would have had the legal estate, and as devisees, the executors here had no more than that dry estate on the conveyance of which a deed stamp of 1*l.* 15*s.* only is required. There was here no transfer of the mortgages in substance. The right to the money passed by assent of the executors. The plaintiff being entitled, by that assent, to all the personalty. The fact that the executors did by this deed, not in their character of executors, but as devisees in trust, simply vest the mortgaged estates in the plaintiff, who was equitably entitled to the mortgage debts, does not make an ad valorem duty on the amount of the mortgage money payable. The only part of the deed effecting any transfer at all is that transferring the legal estate, and its operation does not bring it within the meaning of the Act requiring, upon the transfer of a mortgage, an ad valorem duty of 6 per cent., and therefore the plaintiff (or appellant) is entitled to the judgment of the court.

Digitized by Google

C. Hutton (with whom were the Attorney-General (Sir R. P. Collier, Q. C.) and the Solicitor-General (Sir J. D. Coleridge, Q. C.), was not called on to argue on the part of the Crown.

KELLY, C. B.—I think the Crown is entitled to the judgment of the court in this case. Two questions have been left to the court in this case by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue. The first is whether they should require that a stamp of 1*l.* 10*s.* should be affixed to the deed, in respect of certain gas shares, which, on the face of the deed are purported to be assigned thereby? Now the deed is upon the face of it an assignment of the shares in question, and therefore primâ facie it is within the express words of the Act of Parliament. Then it is said, and truly, that it may well be that this instrument in effect passes nothing, for such may be the constitution of the gas company, that the deceased may have had only an equitable interest in the shares; and that equitable interest would have passed by his will to his executors, and by this conveyance would pass from his executors to the now appellants. Still, another transfer might be necessary, and if we were acquainted with the whole of the circumstances of the case, it might turn out to be a case in which this transfer, or rather this deed, so far as regards the gas shares, would be of no effect whatever, and that in order to vest the gas shares in the appellant, another transfer on which this duty would be payable would be necessary. But we have not this fact before us, and we must deal with the case as it appears before us, and that is, that certain gas shares, which we assumed to have been the property of the executors, have been legally vested in them, and by this instrument they have transferred them to the appellant, and that thereunder there is a complete transfer, which is liable to the duty imposed by the Act of Parliament. The other question, relating to the mortgage debts, appears to be equally clear. First of all, this deed is, upon the face of it, a technical, substantial, and real act of transfer of the mortgages in question, and, as such (as I observed with regard to the question upon the gas shares), it is clearly within the language of the Act of Parliament, and requires an ad valorem stamp of 6*d.* per cent. upon the amount of the mortgage money. Well, then it is said that, partly under this deed, and possibly independently of the deed, and under the will, whatever appears on the deed to have taken place with reference to the satisfaction of the debts and legacies, and the transfer of the remainder, over to the residuary legatee that the equitable interest in the mortgage-deeds had been transferred, and had, in some way or another, become the property of the appellant. That may be so, and I do not entertain any doubt that, upon this instrument, and upon its recitals, supposing them to be true, the appellant had on this deed an equitable interest in the mortgage money which entitled him, if he though fit to question the propriety of conduct, or fitness for the office of executors or trustees of the persons in question, and to have applied to the court of equity to compel them to assign the mortgages to the appellant. But that is not the question. If he be content with the equitable title which he possesses, and is willing to leave the mortgages and the legal estate in the trustees, in whom they have been vested by the will, he can do so, and, indeed, no conveyance is necessary. But if he should think fit (and it is very natural to suppose that he should so think fit) to become possessed of the mortgage-deeds themselves, and to have the actual holding of the instruments, in case he should be desirous of putting them in force in a court of law or otherwise; and, moreover, he is desirous of securing to himself the legal estate in the mortgaged premises to enable him to do that which he otherwise would not be able to do, that is to say, in the case of moneys being about to fall into arrear, and his desiring to enforce the mortgage that he may be able to bring ejectment and recover possession of the premises, then he calls upon the trustees to assign, and if the trustees are willing to comply with his wishes and do assign these mortgages, it is strictly within the meaning of the Act of Parliament so as to make him liable to the duties in question. I think the case is altogether, upon both points, free from doubt, it being within the express terms of the Act of Parliament; and that, in both respects, the Crown is entitled to our judgment.

BRAMWELL, B.—I am of the same opinion. I think the deed is within the description in the Act of Parliament. Then Sir John Karslake says that, nevertheless, it ought not to pay a transfer duty, either upon the transfer of the mortgages or of the shares, because it does not transfer them. Well, whether that would be a good argument in that case I am sure I do not know; but it is ill-founded in point of fact, because it does transfer them. Sir John Karslake has endeavoured to show that there had been, under this will, a transference of these shares and mortgages specifically to Hall; and no doubt, if there had been, nothing further would have been necessary than for the executors to have vested them in the legatee. But they are not legacies to Hall at all. They are legacies in trust for Hall, with certain other trusts, but ultimately in trust for Hall. Therefore, I think, Sir John Karslake fails. It seems to me absurd that a transfer of this sort should be necessary; but the testator has thought it right to leave his property in such a way that a transfer from his trustees and executors is necessary. This ought to be a warning to testators to take care, for the future, not to leave their property in trust, but to leave it specifically to the person entitled to it. This testator having thought fit to leave it in this way, it is necessary for the trustees to execute a transfer, and the Legislature has put this stamp upon it.

Digitized by Google

CHANNELL, B.—I am of opinion that the Crown is entitled to our judgment. Where property is specifically bequeathed to A., the property will not pass as a matter of course, there being executors under the will, until those executors have assented to its passing, because they are entitled to the property, they having first of all to pay all debts, funeral, and testamentary expenses and so on; and I do not propose to interfere for a moment with the rule that, in such a case, the assent of the executor, as soon as it is given, will vest the property in the legatee named in the will, and taking as legatee. In this case, executors are appointed under the will, and the same persons who are made executors are made devisees in trust, ultimately for Mr. Hall the appellant. It appears to me that that being so, the rule of law that applies in favour of a legatee who ultimately takes from the executor, is primâ facie a good rule of law. I think, in point of fact, that the assent of the executors, as presented to us by Sir John Karslake's argument, does not make the deed unnecessary, the assent of the executors not being applicable in the present case.

CLEASBY, B.—I merely add this, by way of illustration, to show what the effect would be of holding that, if people thought it fit and right, in such a case as this, to take a deed of transfer, it ought not to have a stamp, Supposing the deed to be produced on a trial on some future occasion, the officer of the court looks at it and says, "It is not stamped," and counsel objects to it. Then counsel on the other side says, "You must not object to this, I am prepared to give evidence to show how it was that this deed was given;" and then he is ready to go into the particular circumstances under which the deed was given, in order to show that it was not necessary that there should have been a transfer. How the judge is to try it, and how the parties are to investigate it, I really cannot say. The only safe course would be to hold that the deed, being a transfer of a mortgage, a stamp ought to be put upon it. If the parties choose to put it in that shape so as to make it a transfer, they cannot take it as a transfer without paying the stamp.

Judgment for the Crown.

Attorney for the plaintiff, R. Dickson, 20, Bedford-row, W.C.

Attorney for the defendants, the Solicitor of Inland Revenue, Somerset-house.

BANKRUPTCY.

NEWCASTLE DISTRICT COURT OF BANKRUPTCY.

(Before Mr. Commissioner ABRAHALL.)

Re JAMES DOWNIE.

Application to dismiss a petition for adjudication of bankruptcy after registration of a trust deed.

The court, in sect. 3 of the Bankruptcy Amendment Act 1868, held to mean the court described in sect. 8 as having jurisdiction under trust-deeds, and to be the proper court to which application for further time to register a deed should be made, after a stay of proceedings under a petition for adjudication of bankruptcy filed pending the time allowed for registration, and which application should be made before the expiration of such time.

The proceeding referred to in sect. 8 as not impeachable held to mean one subsequent to registration.

Application to a district court to dismiss a petition for adjudication, on the ground that a trust-deed had been duly registered by order of a London Commissioner made on an application for extension of time, subsequently to the expiration of the time allowed for registering the deed, refused. Costs to abide event of an appeal. Choice of assignees meanwhile postponed.

In this case, pending the time for registration of a trust deed, a creditor filed a petition for adjudication of bankruptcy, in which the proceedings were stayed for twenty-eight days ending the 30th June. The deed not having been registered within the time allowed, the proceedings in the bankruptcy were resumed on the 1st July. On that day an application was made to the court in London for an extension of the time for registration, which was granted by Mr. Commissioner Bacon, and in pursuance of his order, on the 2nd July, the Chief Registrar gave his certificate of registration. Some days after, an application was made to the district court to dismiss the petition for adjudication, on the ground that the deed had been registered. This the commissioner of the district court declined to do, for reasons which will appear in the following judgment:—

HIS HONOUR.—I am asked to dismiss the petition for adjudication of bankruptcy in this case, on the ground that a deed of arrangement by the debtor has been duly registered under the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act 1861, and of the Bankruptcy Amendment Act 1868, which are to be construed as one Act. The court upon which sect. 3 of the Amendment Act confers the power to allow further time for the registration of a deed, means, I apprehend, the court that by the terms of sect. 8 of the same Act, is to have and exercise all jurisdiction given by either Act, under the deed; the court, within the district of which the arranging debtor resides, and in which a petition for adjudication of bankruptcy against himself would at the time of the execution of the deed be required to be filed—in this case the Newcastle District Court—and, as it seems to me, for a very obvious reason, that it must be supposed to have better opportunities of judging of the propriety of granting any extension of the time for registration, than the court in London can be expected to have, upon a mere ex parte application. This clause, after describing the court that is to have jurisdiction under the deed, contains a proviso that, with a view to placing trust-deeds (as far as may be, having regard to the different modes of administration) on a par with petitions for adjudication of bankruptcy, empowers the London court to direct applications under any deed to be prosecuted in any court without regard to the district in which the debtor resided, or carried on business, &c., in analogy to the 88th section of the Act of 1861, which gives the London Court power to direct the prosecution of petitions in bankruptcy in any district other than the one in which the bankrupt shall have resided, or, &c., and to transfer the proceedings under them from any one court to another. The concluding proviso in this 8th section of the Amendment Act, as to the unimpeachable nature of proceedings bonâ fide taken in any court, the jurisdiction appearing to be in some other court, I understand as meaning proceedings subsequent to registration, or in relation to a change of districts, on discovery of such a mistake as is supposed, in which case the papers are made transmissible to the proper court; but I do not understand it as having any reference whatever to such an application as one for extending the time for registration. The time for registering the deed in this case expired on the 30th June, and the proceedings in bankruptcy which I had stayed up to that time revived, and were resumed on the 1st July. On that day, the court in London was moved to extend the time for registration, which being granted by Mr. Commissioner Bacon, the chief registrar issued a certificate of registration, dated the 2nd July, and a short time after I am asked to dismiss the petition. Now, even supposing the court in London, which is only however co-ordinate with the District Court, to have had jurisdiction, it must have been exercised after the expiration of the time allowed for registration, and whereas the application and order upon it should have been made prior to that event. A case was quoted to me in which the judges of the Court of Queen's Bench had decided that such an application might be granted after the expiration of the twenty-eight days. That, however, was in the case of a deed under the 194th section of the Act of 1861, enacting that deeds must be registered in order to be receivable in evidence. I think such deeds are distinguishable from deeds under the 192nd section, which provides the conditions upon which their validity is to depend. In case of a petition in Bankruptcy being presented against a debtor under such circumstances, the proceedings may be stayed, in the discretion of the court (either in London or the country, as the case may be), the words being, "if the court shall think fit;" and if in any case belonging to a country district, the London Court is, on an ex parte application, to extend the time for registration, without reference to the district, and that after the expiration of the time to which the proceedings in bankruptcy have been stayed, where is the limit to be fixed? Pari ratione, the time for disputing the validity of an adjudication, under the Consolidation Act is seven days, or such extended time not exceeding fourteen days in the whole as the court shall think fit, the application being required to be made within twenty-one days. A certain limit is fixed, and if the London court has the unlimited power which I am questioning, its exercise must frequently occasion great additional expense, and tend to the encouragement of further abuses. Whatever, therefore, may be the law in cases of deeds under the 194th section of the Act of 1861, I do not think I am wrong in saying it is inapplicable to those under the 192nd section, especially in a case like this, where a creditor's petition for bankruptcy has been filed pending the time allowed for registration. I am therefore of opinion, with the utmost respect, however, for that of Mr. Commissioner Bacon, that the London court has acted in this case ultra vires, and that it could only have jurisdiction to extend the time for registration in the matter of a deed executed by an arranging debtor resident within the London district. I must then decline to dismiss the petition for adjudication in bankruptcy, the trust deed not having, as I think, been duly registered within the meaning of the 199th clause of the Bankruptcy Act 1861, the time for registration not having been extended by the proper court within the 3rd and 8th sections of the Bankruptcy Amendment Act 1868. The trustee having intimated an intention to appeal, for which I am desirous of affording every facility, I will postpone the choice of assignees to abide the event, and meanwhile reserve the question of costs.

Digitized by Google

COURT FOR DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES.

Reported by W. LEYCESTER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

July 6 and 20.

(Before Lord PENZANCE, J. O.)

MUMBY v. MUMBY.

Dissolution suit—Alimony pendente lite—No answer to petition—Respondent's capacity proved by affidavit—Practice.

In a case where the husband had filed no answer to his wife's petition for alimony, the court to save expense allowed the wife to prove the husband's faculties by affidavits; but it required that the husband should have notice of the filing of the affidavits served on him, and also of the motion to ask for alimony upon them.

The wife in this suit petitioned for a judicial separation, and the husband, who is a quack doctor, at Hull, did not answer. A petition for alimony was filed, in which the wife stated that her husband was earning an income of 250*l.* a year from his business, and to this petition the husband filed no answer.

Swabey, for the petitioner, moved the court for leave to prove the husband's income by affidavits, on the ground that the cost of bringing witnesses from Hull would be considerable, and that she had no means of her own to defray the expense.

Lord PENZANCE, J. O.—I think, in order to save the expense of bringing up witnesses from the other end of the country, the motion should be granted. But you must give notice to the respondent that you have filed affidavits in the registry where he can see them, and also that you intend to ask the court to allot alimony upon them.

Subsequently, affidavits were filed, and on July 20th alimony pendente lite was granted at the rate of 50*l.* a year.

Attorney for petitioner, J. Yarde.

Tuesday, July 20.

(Before Lord PENZANCE, J. O.)

MILFORD v. MILFORD.

Judicial separation—Wife's suit—Permanent alimony—Custody and maintenance of children—20 & 21 Vict. c. 85, s. 35.

*Where the wife had obtained a decree of judicial separation by reason of the gross and profligate adultery of the husband, though his father and sister offered to take charge of the children—two daughters aged ten and twelve—and to educate them suitably, the court declined to deprive the mother of their custody. And in addition to permanent alimony at the rate of one-third of the joint income, of which the wife contributed nearly half, it ordered the husband to pay 30*l.* a year towards the maintenance and education of the children.*

This was originally the wife's suit for dissolution of marriage on the ground of her husband's cruelty and adultery. It was heard in Dec. 1866, and the wife proved a case of gross and profligate adultery against her husband, but failed to establish the charge of cruelty. The court pronounced a decree of judicial separation, which was confirmed by the House of Lords on appeal.

Digitized by Google

The wife now applied for permanent alimony, and an allowance for the maintenance of two daughters aged ten and twelve years. The income of the respondent was reported by the registrar to be 550*l.* a year, and the separate income of the wife 248*l.* a year. The registrar's report was not disputed. The father and sister of the respondent filed affidavits stating their willingness to take charge of the children, and to bring them up in a manner suitable to their station.

Dr. Spinks (Dr. Tristram with him) on behalf of the petitioner, urged that she was entitled to one-third of the joint income; and that as no misconduct had been proved against her, she was also entitled to the custody of the children.

Dr. Deane (Searle with him) submitted that the children would be benefited by being placed under the charge of their grandfather, and that if the wife insisted on retaining them in her own custody, she was not entitled to any allowance for their maintenance. They cited

Marsh v. Marsh, 1 Sw. & Tr. 312;
Boynton v. Boynton, 1 Sw. & Tr. 324; 4 L. T. Rep. N. S. 258;
Whieldon v. Whieldon, 2 Sw. & Tr. 388; 5 L. T. Rep. N. S. 138.

Lord Penzance, J.O.—I am clear in this case that the children ought not to be taken away from the wife and handed over to the husband's father, and for this simple reason—that the wife was clearly without blame in the suit. No charge is made against her, and she has done nothing whatever to forfeit her natural rights as a mother in the indulgence of her affections in the possession and care of her children. All that has happened in the case has been the husband's doing. He was proved to have lived a very profligate life, and the wife has obtained a decree of judicial separation on the ground of that profligacy. In considering what ought to be done in regard to the custody and maintenance of the children, the court always looks to see whose fault it was that led to the breaking-up of the common home. In this case it was undoubtedly the husband's fault. Not only did he so act as to bring about the separation, but his misconduct was such that the court could not possibly place these two children, both of them girls, under the control and supervision of such a man. All these cases must depend on their circumstances. It is impossible to lay down a principle one way or the other; but I am clear, from the reasons I have stated, that the children ought to live with their mother. The next question is, whether any allowance ought to be paid by the husband towards their maintenance? Looking at the circumstances I have mentioned, the disqualification of the husband and the fact that his home could not be a proper resort for his children, and looking also at the incomes, I think that I ought to make some allowance. I allot to the petitioner permanent alimony at the rate of 266*l.* a year (one-third of the joint income), and in addition the respondent must pay 30*l.* a year towards the maintenance of the children, both orders to go from the date of the decree.

Attorneys for petitioner, Shepheard and Son.

Attorneys for respondent, Harrison, Beal, and Harrison.

COURT OF PROBATE.

Reported by W. Leycester, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Tuesday, June 15.

(Before Lord Penzance.)

Wright v. Rogers and Goodman (Winterbotham intervening).

Will—Due execution—Signature in presence of attesting witnesses—Surviving attesting witness adverse—No other evidence forthcoming—Probate.

A testator made a will, drawn by a competent solicitor from his instructions. It was attested by the solicitor and his clerk. For the purpose of obtaining probate in common form, the solicitor made an affidavit as to execution which was prepared by the other attesting witness. The solicitor died a short time afterwards, and the other attesting witness then for the first time stated that the will had not been attested in the presence of the deceased. There was no evidence the other way, and the court, under all the circumstances, not being satisfied with the evidence of the surviving attesting witness, granted probate.

T. Pearce, of Albion-grove, Barnsbury, in the county of Middlesex, died April 4, 1868, leaving a will bearing date April 2, 1868, of which the defendants were appointed executors.

It was prepared by Mr. C. Bell, a solicitor, from the testator's instructions, and the attestation clause was in the following form:

Signed, published, and declared by Thomas Pearce, the testator, in the presence of us, and in the presence of each other (all being present at the same time), who at his request, and in his presence, have subscribed our names as witnesses hereto.—C. Bell, solicitor, 36, Bedford-row, London; J. E. Haynes, clerk to the above-named C. Bell.

On April 23, 1868, the defendants, as executors, took out probate in common form, and Mr. Bell, the attesting witness, who had prepared the will, made an affidavit as to the execution and certain interlineations. This affidavit was made in a printed form, the body of which was filled up by Haynes, the other attesting witness, and signed by Mr. Bell. He died March 17, 1867, and his business was taken by the firm of Belfrage and Middleton. At the request of Mr. Middleton, Haynes drew up the following statement of the circumstances attending the execution:

I accompanied Mr. Bell in a cab to Mr. Pearce's, and on the street door being opened we were admitted into the house by Miss Whipp, and shown into the parlour. Mr. Pearce was lying on a bed in the front parlour, and Mr. Bell went to the bedside. I waited in the back parlour, and at that distance I observed what took place, the parlours having folding doors, which were thrown open, and enabled me to do so. Mr. Bell first read to the deceased or said something to him about a deed of revocation, and laid it down on the table, and then he read the will. When Mr. Bell had finished reading the will he beckoned to me to come into the front room, and the bell was rung for pen and ink. Miss Whipp answered the bell (she had been previously requested by Mr. Bell to retire), and produced the pen and ink, and raised the testator up, and so held or supported him while he executed the will. Having executed the will the testator sank down in the bed in a very exhausted state, and as I thought in a dying state, and Mr. Bell seemed to have the same impression, for he said to me on retiring to the back room, "that was a very near thing." Miss Whipp remained in the front parlour, and was shortly afterwards joined by Mr. Bell. After waiting in the back parlour about an hour, I saw Miss Whipp beat an egg and mix it with a liquid which she put to testator's mouth, and he swallowed it. He appeared to revive a little, but not sufficient to be enabled to sit up, and Miss Whipp tried to raise him in bed, but was not strong enough, whereupon she summoned Mr. Windred into the room, who lifted Mr. Pearce into a sitting position, in which position Miss Whipp supported him, and Mr. Windred left the room. The testator then received the pen from Mr. Bell and executed the revocation; but being too weak to write, Mr. Bell directed me to guide the testator's hand, and the matter was completed. The anxiety consequent upon Mr. Pearce's condition, and my and Mr. Bell's watchfulness for the opportunity to get the deed of revocation executed, which pro forma should have been done before the execution of the will, caused us to neglect the attestation of the will in the presence of the testator. In fact, neither the will nor the deed of revocation was attested until we returned to the office; for as soon as the deed of revocation which had been so anxiously watched for had been executed, Mr. Bell hastily snatched up both documents unattested. Mr. Bell being anxious to get back to his business, we hastily left the testator's house, jumped into a cab, and returned to the office; and upon arriving at the office I immediately pointed out to Mr. Bell that the will had not been attested, whereupon Mr. Bell said, off handedly, that it did not matter, and at Mr. Bell's request both the deed of revocation and the will were attested by us at Mr. Bell's office in Bedford-row.

In his first draft of this statement Mr. Haynes said nothing about the attestation, either of the will or of the deed of revocation, but when his attention was called to the matter by a note in the margin by Middleton, "Query, whether the will was attested in the front or back room," he then added the further particulars as to the attestation taking place in Mr. Bell's office.

The probate granted in common form was called in at the instance of the plaintiff, and the defendants—the executors then propounded the will. In opposition the plaintiff pleaded that the will was not duly executed in accordance with the provisions of the statute 1 Vict. c. 26.

The case was heard before Lord Penzance on June 15.

Keane, Q.C. (Dr. Swabey with him) for the plaintiff.

Dr. Spinks, Q.C. (Dr. Tristram with him) for the executors.

Ballantine, Serjt. and Inderwick, for the intervener, beneficially interested under the will.

Haynes, the surviving attesting witness, was called, and gave the same account of the execution as that contained in his affidavit. In cross-examination he stated that he had witnessed other wills, and that Mr. Bell was a gentleman of great experience in such business.

Lord PENZANCE.—The will in question was made by the testator on the 2nd April 1868, in the presence of an attorney and his clerk. It was drawn by the attorney, a gentleman of large practice and forty years' experience, it was copied by his clerk, and it has a perfect attestation clause. So far as presumption is concerned, prima facie there could not be a stronger case upon which the court would properly presume that the will was duly executed. But the matter does not end there, because, after the death of the testator, an affidavit was drawn out by Mr. Bell to swear to; the written facts of it were filled in by the clerk, and the facts so filled in by him, coupled with the printed matter, represented that the will was duly executed—that it was signed by the testator in the presence of the witnesses, and that the witnesses signed in his presence. The will was then proved; Mr. Bell died, and two or three days after his death Mr. Middleton, whose position in the matter I do not know, but who was then the employer of Haynes, asked him to make a statement in writing of the circumstances under which the will was executed; and thereupon Haynes made the statement which now lies before me. [His Lordship read the statement and continued.] This statement having been made, and Mr. Middleton observing that nothing was said about the attestation, put this query in pencil, "Was the will attested in the front or back room?" I asked Haynes whether he had told anyone as to the defect in the attestation, because, if he had, it might have come to Mr Middleton's ears, and might have led him to make this inquiry; but it appears that Haynes had never mentioned it to anybody, and therefore the query by Mr. Middleton was rather a curious one. It may, however, have been a perfectly proper inquiry, and the court is not disposed to place much reliance on it. The query was put down and answered, and when in the witness-box, Mr. Haynes repeated the story. Now, I think too much has been said about his coming here with a fraudulent desire to conceal the truth. There is another, and, as I think, a more proper question to ask, namely, whether the court can rely altogether upon his memory in this matter. There was a deed to be signed as well as the will, and he may have mixed up the two things, and so satisfied himself that the will was not attested in the presence of the deceased, when the circumstance may have occurred only in the case of the deed. The presumption, as I have said, is in favour of the will. The presumption is of course capable of being rebutted; but when two persons, one of them a professional man of large experience, who well understood what the law required, have signed an attestation clause duly worded, the court ought to have the strongest evidence to induce it to believe that the statement in the clause is not true. Nothing would tend more to greater uncertainty in the proving of wills than the contrary practice, and the consequence is, that where there is a duly worded attestation clause, the court is always in the habit of presuming as largely as possible in favour of the due execution of the instrument. The proof of the due execution lies upon those who set up the will, and when the two attesting witnesses come and swear that the will was not duly executed, and there is no evidence the other way, the court has nothing upon which to take its stand in maintenance of the presumption. That was the case in Croft v. Croft, 34 L. J., N. S., 44, P. & M.; 4 Sw. & Tr. 10. In this case the court has the evidence of only one witness to the fact that they did not sign in the presence of the deceased; and when I find that he stood by and assented to an affidavit made by his fellow witness to the effect that the will was duly executed, and also remained so long without disclosing the alleged defect in the attestation, I cannot rely upon his recollection of what took place. Under all the circumstances, I am not satisfied with the evidence, and I shall therefore hold that the will was well executed.

Attorneys for plaintiff, Hensman and Nicholson.

Attorneys for defendants, Belfrage and Middleton.

Attorney for the intervenant, J. Taylor.

In Parliament.

Reported by FREDERICK CLIFFORD, and PEMBROKE S. STEPHENS, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

COURT OF REFEREES ON PRIVATE BILLS.

Monday, April 19.

(Before Sir E. COLEBROOKE, M.P., Chairman; Mr. ST. AUBYN, M.P., and Mr. RICKARDS.)

LONDON AND NORTH-WESTERN RAILWAY BILL.

Objections to locus standi of LANCASHIRE AND YORKSHIRE RAILWAY COMPANY.

Railways—Extension of branch already authorised—Competition—S. O. 127.

Two railway companies competed for traffic between the towns of M. and B. the distance by the L. and N. W. route being seventeen, and by the L. and Y. route under eleven miles. In 1865 the L. and N. W. Co. promoted a Bill for a branch which stopped about midway between the two towns, and they now proposed by an omnibus Bill to extend the branch to B., thus com- pleting a new route, and reducing the distance from seventeen to twelve miles. The L. and Y. were allowed a locus standi against the Bill of 1865, and it was now contended that their appearance at that time shut them out from opposition to a mere prolongation of the branch line then authorised.

Digitized by Google

Held, however, that they were entitled to a locus standi against the present Bill.

In 1865 the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company were allowed to be heard, on the ground of competition, against a Bill promoted by the London and North-Western Railway Company for a line called the Little Hulton line, stretching northward from a point in their system towards Bolton. Parliament having then authorised the construction of that line, the London and North-Western Company now promoted an omnibus Bill, which, amongst other things, sought to extend the Little Hulton line to Bolton. The lines of both companies already communicated with Bolton and Manchester, but the distance between Manchester and Bolton by the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway was ten miles and three quarters, and by the London and North-Western Railway, viâ Tyldesley, seventeen miles. The proposed extension would reduce the distance on the promoters' system from seventeen to twelve and a half miles. The Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company petitioned against the Bill on the ground (inter alia) of competition.

It was objected to their claims for a locus standi that "the Bill does not contain any provision for taking, using, or interfering with any lands, railway stations, works, or accommodation of the petitioners, or for running engines or carriages upon or across the same, or for granting other facilities over or in respect of the railway of the petitioners;" that it did not allege any ground of competition which entitled the petitioners to be heard; that the powers sought by the Bill did not alter, prejudice, or affect any property, right, or interest of the petitioners, and if otherwise were not such as entitled the petitioners to be heard against the Bill.

Pope, Q. C. for petitioners.—The principal traffic between Bolton and Manchester is now carried on the Lancashire and Yorkshire line. The London and North-Western Railway now competes with us for the Bolton traffic, and on that ground we were allowed a locus standi against their Little Hulton line. In committee, however, the London and North-Western met our case by saying it would be time enough to object to their running direct to Bolton when they proposed to do so. If the petitioners had a locus standi against the Little Hulton branch when it stopped short of Bolton, à fortiori they have a locus standi when the line is to be extended to Bolton.

Merewether, Q. C. for promoters.—There is no scintilla of a case for a locus standi on the ground that we take or use any lands or works of the petitioners, who claim upon the ground of competition alone. Standing Order 127 no doubt gives the court the largest discretion to admit parties on that ground. But here, if the petitioners have any complaint to make as a competing line, they had an opportunity of making it when the Bill for the Little Hulton branch was passed. That authorised line carried the London and North-Western Company something like half-way on the more direct road to Bolton, and we are merely proposing to prolong a line upon which, as the petitioners admit, the question of competition was fought; the fact being that, when in committee in 1865 we were charged with an intention to go to Bolton, we answered through the mouth of our witness, Mr. Cawkwell, that we had a right to go there. Competition between the two companies for the Bolton traffic exists already upon lines now constructed; and that being so, have we not a right to shorten our distance from Bolton without new opposition from the petitioners?

Locus standi allowed.

Agents for petitioners, Dyson and Co.

Agents for Bill, Sherwood and Co.

DUNDEE HARBOUR BILL.

Objections to locus standi of CALEDONIAN RAILWAY COMPANY.

Harbour works—Interference with railway—Landowner—Temporary occupation of land—Railways Clauses Consolidation Act 1845.

A temporary occupation of land by the promoters of a Bill for the purposes of their undertaking, gives to petitioners against the Bill no right to a locus standi.

Thus, where the Harbour Board of D. proposed a temporary occupation of land within certain specified limits, which included the petitioners' line of railway:

Held, that the petitioners, who alleged that ground of opposition, could not be heard against the Bill.

The petitioners alleged (inter alia) that it was proposed to incorporate in the Bill the clauses of the Railway Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act 1845, with respect to the temporary occupation of lands, and that it was provided that the limits within which the harbour trustees might exercise the powers conferred by these clauses should extend to 200 yards from any part of the works authorised by the Bill, which limits would embrace the petitioners' line of railway along the greater part of the northern side of these works.

They further alleged "that the powers given by the said clauses are compulsory and of a very extensive character, and would give the trustees power, for any purpose connected with the construction or repair of the works, to interfere most inconveniently and most injuriously with your petitioners' railway and lands; and this power or interference is aggravated by the fact that there is no time limited in the Bill within which the said works are to be completed, so that the trustees will not only be enabled to enforce these compulsory powers against your petitioners, but to exercise the same at any future time when they think proper; and your petitioners will never be safe from the operations of the trustees, however injurious they may be to their railway."

The locus standi of the petitioners was objected to on the following grounds:—

1. The works intended to be authorised by the Bill will not affect or interfere with any railways, works, or property belonging to the petitioners.
2. The Bill does not affect or interfere with any railway property, rights, or privileges belonging to the petitioners.
3. The Bill does not alter or repeal any statutory provision now in force for the protection or benefit of the petitioners.
4. The petitioners have not alleged in their petition any valid or sufficient grounds for being heard against the Bill.

Mundell, Q.C., for petitioners.—We are entitled to be heard against the proposed powers for the temporary occupation of our land under Standing Order 129, which says that "where a railway Bill contains provisions for taking or using any part of the lands, railways, stations, or accommodations of another company, or for running engines or carriages upon or across the same, or for granting other facilities, such company shall be entitled to be heard upon their petition against the preamble and clauses of such Bill." By sect. 27 of 8 & 9 Vict. c. 33 (Railways Clauses Act (Scotland), incorporated with the Bill, the harbour trustees could actually use for temporary purposes the station of the Caledonian Company, make roads across our railway, and regulate traffic.

Digitized by Google

Mr. RICKARDS.—Standing Order 129 applies only to railway Bills.

Mundell.—Incidentally the harbour trustees are the owners of a railway.

Mr. RICKARDS.—But you can hardly call this a railway Bill?

Mundell.—I cannot contend for that; but then the promoters have no right to incorporate part of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act.

Mr. RICKARDS.—That is not an unusual course.

Mundell.—No; but if the promoters adopt it they must take that advantage cum oneribus.

Mr. RICKARDS.—Have we had any case before where it has been held that a temporary occupation of lands gives a locus standi?

Mundell.—It is a new point. But suppose the case were that of a landowner. Surely, though the decided cases refer only to a permanent taking of lands, an occupation of his land for temporary purposes would also give him a locus standi.

Clerk, Q. C., for promoters.—In cases where there is merely a temporary occupation for the purposes of the proposed works, no notice is given to the landowner. The petitioners say that, inasmuch as we ask for power to make a temporary use of their land within a certain distance of our works, they have a locus standi, because we might make a spoil-bank of their railway, or cross their line by a level crossing. But in no clause of our Bill do we propose to interfere with their railway, and what you are really asked to do is to introduce a new class of petitioners and allow every landowner to appear against a bill—though no part of his property may be scheduled, though he may have received no notice, and none of his land is required—on the plea that his land is temporarily affected in the construction of a railway or any other public work. In like manner any railway company so temporarily affected would be allowed to oppose any other railway Bill, though the company had no locus standi on the ground of competition of land taken, or any sort of interference.

Mr. RICKARDS.—Under the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act, if the promoters, in the course of their temporary occupation of land, do anything to obstruct the working of a railway, you can apply to the justices and obtain a summary remedy.

Locus standi disallowed.

Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

Reported by DOUGLAS KINGSFORD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

June 18 and July 15.

(Present: The Right Hon. Lord ROMILLY, M.R., Sir WILLIAM ERLE, Sir JAMES W. COLVILE, and Sir JOSEPH NAPIER.)

DROEGE and COMPANY, the consignees of the cargo laden in the ship Karnak (apps.) v. STUART and SIMPSON, the legal holders of a bottomry bond upon the ship Karnak, her freight and cargo (resps.)

THE KARNAK.

Bottomry—Necessity for hypothecation of cargo—Possibility of communication with owners—Advances of freight—Commission for obtaining charter.

A ship, on a voyage from Galveston, United States, to Liverpool, put into Bermuda disabled. The master wrote to the owners of the ship and cargo, and meanwhile, to avoid delay and loss, commenced repairing the ship. The repairs were completed, and the master then, fearing detention of the ship, and having received no replies from the owners of the ship and cargo, raised money to pay for the repairs on bottomry of the ship, freight and cargo. The lenders were not the repairers of the ship. In a suit by the bondholders against the owners of the cargo:

Held (affirming the judgment of the court below), that the bond was valid and bound the cargo.

The necessity, which will validate the hypothecation of a cargo by bottomry, is a high degree of need, arising when choice is to be made of one of several alternatives, under the peril of severe loss, if a wrong choice should be made. And any combination of events which should prevent the completion of the voyage with profit, unless money should be obtained by bottomry, would raise the question whether there was need for bottomry in such high degree as to create a necessity. If, though the repairs are complete, yet the ship cannot leave the port until they are paid for, the completion of repairs is an immaterial fact in estimating the degree of need for bottomry.

The possibility of communication with the owners of the ship or cargo must be construed by estimating the cost and risk incidental to the delay from the attempt to make such communication, and the probability of failure, after every exertion made.

Advances, not stipulated for in the charter-party, were obtained by the captain from the charterer. The receipt, given by the former, promised to pay the said advances "out of the proceeds of the present freight, with the addition of 10l. per cent. per annum and charges for insurance:"

Held (reversing the judgment of the court below), that the sums obtained were advances of freight to be repaid by deductions from freight, if earned; and if not earned, then to be lost by the charterer, unless he should have used the stipulated premium in insuring.

A usage to establish a right to deduct commission for obtaining the charter from the freight as against the holder of a bottomry bond, must be distinctly proved.

This was an appeal from a decree of the judge of the High Court of Admiralty, in a cause of bottomry.

The circumstances out of which the appeal arose were shortly as follows:

The suit was instituted in the court below by the respondents, as the legal holders of a bond of bottomry on the Karnak, her cargo and freight.

The bond in question was executed on the 17th April 1867, by the master of the Karnak, in favour of Mr. John Bluck. The Karnak, which was a British vessel, of 267 tons register, was then lying at the port of St. George, in the island of Bermuda, into which port she had been compelled to put in a state of distress, having sustained damage whilst prosecuting a voyage from Galveston, in the United States of America, to Liverpool, with the cargo in question, which consisted of cotton, and was very valuable.

The bond was given to secure the payment to the said Mr. John Bluck of the sum of 2690*l.* 6*s.* 1*d.* advanced by him to the said master, for the purpose of enabling the Karnak to pursue the voyage, and a premium thereon at the rate of 20*l.* per centum, making in the aggregate the sum of 3228*l.* 7*s* 3*d.*, and was made payable after the safe arrival of the Karnak at Liverpool, in case certain bills of exchange given to the said Mr. John Bluck as a collateral security should not be paid.

The Karnak proceeded on and completed her voyage, and arrived safely at Liverpool. The said bills were not paid, and according to its tenor the bond became payable.

Digitized by Google

The appellants, as consignees or owners of the cargo, entered an appearance and opposed the bond, so far as regarded the cargo, which was released upon bail being given by them.

No opposition to the bond was offered by the owner of the Karnak; and the Karnak was sold by order of the court at the instance of the respondents. Claims having priority to the claim of the respondents were, by order of the court, paid out of the proceeds of such sale, and the net proceeds of such sale, available for the payment of the bond, were reduced to the sum of 512*l.* 11*s.* 9*d.* By a decree made by the court below, on the 12th Nov. 1867, the court pronounced for the validity of the said bond, so far as regarded the Karnak and her freight in the amount due thereunder and in costs.

Under an order of the court below, the appellants were ordered to bring into court the freight due for the carriage of the said cargo. The total freight which became due at Liverpool for the carriage of the said cargo amounted, according to the contention of the respondents, to the sum of 1356*l.* 14*s.* 6*d.*

Pursuant to such order, the appellants brought into court the sum of 628*l.* 15*s.* 3*d.* in respect of such freight, and they claimed to retain the sum of 727*l.* 19*s.* 3*d.* made up as follows, namely: the sum of 633*l.* 14*s.* 2*d.* in respect of an alleged advance of freight made to the master of the Karnak at Galveston, and the sum of 61*l.* 6*s.* 9*d.* for interest and insurance on the said alleged advance, and the sum of 33*l.* 8*s.* 4*d.* in respect of a commission on the charter-party of the Karnak. The respondents denied it to be the fact that any such advance of freight had been made, and further contended that the master of the Karnak had not any authority to receive payment of his freight in advance.

The respondents by their petition prayed the court below to pronounce for the force of the said bond, so far as regarded the said cargo, to direct the appellants to pay into court the said sum of 727*l.* 19*s.* 3*d.*, and to order such sum to be paid to the respondents in part satisfaction of the same bond, and to condemn the appellants (as consignees or owners of the said cargo) and their bail, in the balance which should then remain due on the said bond, together with interest and costs.

The appellants, by their answer, contested the validity of the bond, so far as regarded the cargo, upon two grounds, viz.:—1. That the said sum of 2690*l.* 6*s.* 1*d.* was advanced by the said John Bluck, not before, but after all the expenses and charges, in respect of which the bond was given, had been incurred; 2. That the master had made default in communicating to the owners or consignees of the cargo the fact of his being in want of money, or of the necessity which would compel him to hypothecate the cargo if not supplied with money; and that there was no reasonable ground for his not making such communication before resorting to a bottomry bond on the cargo, and they further said that he ought even to have transshipped the cargo rather than to have hypothecated it.

The defence of the appellants to the claim of the respondents, to have the said sum of 729*l.* 19*s.* 3*d.* paid into court for their benefit, was in the 9th and following articles of this answer, which were as follows—

9. After the making of the charter-party in the 7th article of the petition mentioned, and whilst the Karnak was lying at Galveston, and before she departed on her chartered voyage, the defendants from time to time advanced to the said master, on account of necessary disbursements, certain moneys amounting in the whole to 632*l.* 14*s.* 2*d.*, and at the respective times of the making of the said advances as aforesaid, it was agreed between the said charterers and the said master, as follows (that is to say)—That the said advances should be made and taken pro tanto in part payment of freight, and that the owner of the said vessel should in no case whatsoever be liable to refund to the said charterers the said advances, and further that the costs of the insurances to be effected by the said charterer, as well as interest at the rate of 10*l.* per cent. per annum on the said advances, should be also deducted from and taken pro tanto in part payment of freight.

10. After the greater part of the said advances—(to wit) advances amounting to the sum of 596*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.*—had been made to him, the said master endorsed on the said charter-party a receipt of which the following is a copy:

Received of Messrs. Droege and Co., of here, the sum of 596*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.* pounds sterling, which I promise to pay, at Liverpool, to Messrs. Droege and Co., of Manchester, or their order, out of the proceeds of the present freight, with the addition of 10*l.* per cent. per annum and charges for insurance for the above-named sum.

(Signed) GEO. S. LOCKE.

11. The costs of insurance, and the interest on the said advances, as mentioned in the last preceding article, amount to the sum of 61*l.* 6*s.* 9*d.*

12. By a well-known usage, applicable to the afore-mentioned charter-party, the defendants are entitled to deduct from the freight and have a lien on the same for a commission on the said charter-party amounting to the sum of 33*l.* 18*s.* 4*d.*

13. At the time when the said John Bluck made the advance of the said sum of money mentioned in the first article of the said petition, he had notice that part of the freight had been paid in advance, and had notice, or could reasonably have had notice, of how much money had been advanced as aforesaid, in part payment of the freight; and also had, or could reasonably have had, notice of the charter-party by which the said vessel had been chartered as aforesaid.

The respondents, by their reply, alleged as follows:

1. The Karnak arrived at Bermuda, on the 17th Jan. 1867, in a disabled state, and upon her so arriving, her master applied for advice to Messrs. Hyland and Company, the agents there for the American underwriters, and he afterwards acted by their advice in and about the affairs of the Karnak and her cargo, and, by their advice, surveys were as soon as possible held on the Karnak. Very shortly after her arrival at Bermuda, the master of the Karnak despatched a letter to the agents of the ship, and also to her managing owner, at New York, informing them of the disabled state of the Karnak, and that he should require funds to pay for repairs, and he, from time to time afterwards, as opportunity offered, made further communications to her owners. He also, soon after the said surveys had been held, wrote and sent to Mr. Meek, of Liverpool, with whom he had been directed by Messrs. Droege and Company, of Galveston, the shippers of the cargo of the Karnak, to communicate, a letter informing the said Mr. Meek of the state of the Karnak, the repairs which would be necessary to fit her for sea, and the probable time it would take to effect such repairs. The said Mr. Meek and the defendants were, during the time that the Karnak was being repaired at Bermuda, in communication with the owner of the Karnak upon the subject of the said vessel.

2. The said master had no reason to doubt, and fully expected that the owners of the Karnak would duly furnish him with the funds necessary to enable him to pay for and discharge all necessary repairs and expenses. The Karnak was making water, and it was necessary to discharge a great portion of her cargo, and to place her on the patent slip at Bermuda, and inasmuch as there was but one patent slip at Bermuda, for the use of which vessels have to wait their turn, and there were at the time many vessels at Bermuda requiring the use of the said slip, the master of the Karnak determined to proceed with the repairs of the Karnak before receiving any answer from his owners, and the repairs of the Karnak were accordingly commenced in the second week of the month of February 1867, and a large portion of her cargo was discharged and warehoused, and she was put upon the said slip.

3. The repairs of the Karnak were completed, or nearly completed, at the beginning of the month of April 1867, and it was not till then that the master of the Karnak had any reason to expect, or that he did expect that it would be necessary to resort to a bottomry bond; but in consequence of his not having received any reply to his said communications, he then found it necessary to raise money on bottomry, and he accordingly, on the 14th April 1867, caused to be sent to a great number of the principal mercantile houses in Bermuda, and among them to Mr. John Bluck, in the petition named, a circular in the words and figures following (that is to say):

CIRCULAR.

St. George's, 4th April, 1867.

Sir,—I am desirous of obtaining 2000*l.* to defray the outfit and disbursements of the brig Karnak, of Nassau, N. P., at this port hence to Liverpool. The Karnak is seven years old, rates A 2 good, is in every respect a staunch, sound vessel, and has had a thorough refit at this port. Her cargo consists of 720 bales of cotton, with a freight list of about 1400*l.*, will be ready for sea on or about the 11th inst. I will, therefore, be glad if you will inform me not later than Monday noon, 8th inst., whether you will advance the said amount to be secured on vessel, cargo, and freight by a bottomry and respondentia bond, and at what rate of premium of maritime interest.—I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

GEO. S. LOCKE.

4. In answer to such circular, various tenders were made by various mercantile firms, and amongst them was one by the said Mr. Bluck, which lastly-mentioned tender being the lowest, was accepted by the master of the Karnak, and thereupon the bond in question in this cause was given.

5. The cargo of the Karnak, which consisted of cotton, was a very valuable one, and belonged to various parties. It had been shipped at Galveston by Messrs. Droege and Co., of that place, under bills of lading, whereby it was to be delivered at Liverpool to their order or to assigns. If the master of the Karnak, when he so found it necessary to resort to a bottomry bond, had, before doing so, awaited the result of a communication with either Galveston or England, great delay would have been occasioned and a great loss on the said cargo might have, and in fact would have happened, inasmuch as he could not have received an answer from either Galveston or England within a shorter period than between two or three months. By the law in force at Bermuda, the Karnak was subject to a lien in respect of the repairs and advances which had been made and done to her, and had her master delayed payment for the same, the Karnak would probably have been proceeded against, and sold by and at the instance of the parties entitled to the benefit of such lien before the master could have received any answer from the owners or consignees of the cargo. The master of the Karnak, moreover, did not know who was the owner of the said cargo. Heavy expenses relating to the cargo had already been incurred, and the said cargo was subject to a lien for the warehouse, and other expenses thereon, which lien would have been increased in amount. The cotton market in England was falling. There was reasonable expectation that the Karnak and her freight would be of a value sufficient, or nearly sufficient, to defray the whole amount secured by the said bond. The Karnak left Bermuda for Liverpool on or about the 18th April 1867.

6. The plaintiffs deny it to have been the duty of the said master to transfer the said cargo, and further allege that he had not any opportunity of doing so.

8. The plaintiffs deny the truth of the statement contained in the 9th 10th, 11th and 15th articles of the said answer.

9. The plaintiffs deny the truth of the statement contained in the 13th article of the said answer, and allege that the said John Bluck made his advances upon faith of the statement contained in the said circular, as to the amount of the freight of the Karnak.

The substance of the material evidence is sufficiently stated in the report of the case and the judgment in the court below.

Pursuant to an order of the court the following document was produced by the appellants, being a receipt for the balance of the loan by Droege and Co. to the master of the Karnak, at Galveston, not included in the receipt indorsed on the charter:

Received, Galveston, Dec. 13, 1866, of Messrs. Droege and Co., the amount of 36 pounds one $\frac{1}{12}$ shillings British sterling, besides the amount of five hundred ninety-six pounds twelve $\frac{1}{12}$ shillings sterling, entered on the charter-party, thus making the total loan of Droege and Co. to me the amount of six hundred thirty-two pounds fourteen $\frac{1}{12}$ shillings British sterling, which with 10 % per annum interest from date, and the premiums of insurance, I promise to pay to the order of Messrs. Droege and Co., on my arrival at Liverpool, out of the proceeds of my present freight.

596*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.* entered on charter-party.
36*l.* 1*s.* 8*d.* paid to me to-day. GEO. S. LOCKE.

The cause was heard on the 13th and 14th May 1868. The learned judge of the court below took time to deliberate, and on the 9th June 1868 made a decree, by which he pronounced for the validity of the said bond, so far as regarded the said cargo, and directed the appellants to pay into court the sum of 727*l.* 19*s.* 3*d.*, and condemned the appellants and their bail in the sum which remained due in respect of the said bond, with 4 per cent. per annum interest from the time when it ought to have been paid, and in the costs of the suit: (18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 661,)

This decree was the subject of the present appeal.

Sir George Honyman, Q. C. and Cohen for the appellants, contended that the bottomry bond was not valid as against the cargo, because the money was not borrowed on bottomry until all the charges to defray which the hypothecation was made had been incurred, because a sufficiently urgent need for hypothecation had not arisen, and because a proper communication to the owners and consignees of the cargo had not been previously made. And that the appellants were entitled to make the said deductions from the freight, because the evidence showed that there was an agreement between the master and the charterers that the money advanced should be taken in part payment of freight.

Mellish, Q. C. and Clarkson, for the respondents, contended that the hypothecation of the cargo was necessary and proper, because, had the sums for repairs not been paid the Karnak would by the law of Bermuda, have been liable to arrest, and because, under the circumstances no previous communication with the consignees or owners of the cargo was necessary. And that, as to the deductions claimed, the advances by Droege and Co. to the master were advances by way of loan on the security of the freight, and not a part payment of freight.

The following cases and authorities were cited:

The Hebe, 2 W. Rob. 146; 4 No. Cas. 368; 10 Jur. 227;

The Prince George, 4 Moo. P. C. 21;

Digitized by Google

Wallace v. Fielden, 7 Moo. P. C. 398;
The Bonaparte, 8 Moo. P. C. 459;
The Hamburg, Br. & Lush. 253; 8 L. T. Rep. N. S. 175; 10 Ib. 206; 2 Moo. P. C., N. S. 289;
The Lizzie, L. Rep. 2 Adm. 254; 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 71;
Hicks v. Shield, 7 Ell. & Bl. 633;
Beldon v. Campbell, 6 Ex. 886; 17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 257;
The Osmanli, 3 W. Rob. 212; 14 Jur. 96;
Rosetto v. Gurney, 11 C. B. 176;
The Laurel, Br. & Lush. 191, 317; 9 L. T. Rep. N. S. 457;
The North Star, 1 Lush. 45; 2 L. T. Rep. N. S. 264;
The Edmond, 1 Lush. 57; 2 L. T. Rep. N. S. 196, 521;
The Augusta, 1 Dod. 282;
The Aurora, 1 Wheaton, 104;
1 Parsons on Shipping, Bk. 1, c. 6;
3 Boulay-Paty, "Contrat à la Grosse," edit. 1822;
Peek v. North Staffordshire Railway Company, 32 L. J. 241, Q. B.; 8 L. T. Rep. N. S. 768.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 15.—Judgment was delivered by Sir WILLIAM ERLE:—Upon this appeal two questions have been raised; the first relating to the cargo, the second to a part of the freight. As to the cargo, the question is, whether the circumstances in which the ship is shown to have been placed, created a necessity for hypothecation? In the court below the answer was in the affirmative; and, in his judgment there (18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 661), the learned judge carefully examined all the evidence and all the authorities in the Admiralty Courts relevant to the case, and their Lordships now agree in the conclusion which was there arrived at in respect of the cargo, and consider that any detailed examination of the arguments adduced here on behalf of the appellants is rendered unnecessary thereby; but they add a reference to some common law cases containing principles confirmatory of the decision in the court below. In Lloyd v. Guibert, 6 B. & S. 100 and 120, the extent of the authority conferred on the captain by his appointment to bind the interest of the owner either of the ship or of the cargo, and the principles on which the limits of that authority are to be ascertained are laid down by Blackburn, J. in the Queen's Bench, and by Willes, J. in the Exchequer Chamber. There the captain of a French ship had hypothecated ship, freight, and cargo, and the owner of the cargo sued the shipowner to indemnify him for the loss occasioned thereby, and it was decided that he could not recover, because by the law of France the captain cannot make the shipowner liable for more than the value of the ship and freight, and as the owner had abandoned both, he was exempt from further liability. It was there laid down that the captain's authority is derived from and bounded by the municipal law of a country to which the ship belongs—that is, by the law of the flag; and Willes, J., delivering the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber, answers an argument, founded on the supposition of a general maritime law, contradistinguished from the municipal law of this country, by refusing to recognise the existence of a maritime law in that sense. In accordance with the principle thereby laid down, their Lordships consider that the existence of the necessity which validates the hypothecation of cargo by bottomry is to be ascertained by evidence in the usual manner; and that the meaning of the term necessity, in respect of hypothecation by the master, is analogous to its meaning in other parts of the law. This meaning has been the subject of much discussion in Westminster Hall (see R. v. Winsor, L. Rep. 1 Q. B. 384; 14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 195); it has been described as a high degree of need; a need which arises when choice is to be made of one of several alternatives under the peril of severe loss if a wrong choice should be made. In the case of a voyage it is probably correct to say that any alternative for the captain is better than total loss of ship and cargo, and that he is under a necessity of choosing another alternative, if any should be possible; and in respect of bottomry, any combination of events which would prevent the completion of the voyage with profit, unless money should be obtained by bottomry, would raise the question whether there was need for bottomry in such high degree as to create a necessity. These remarks are made in answer to some arguments offered to us founded upon cases supposed to decide that a bottomry bond would in all cases be void on account of the absence of necessity if the repairs were completed before the bond to raise money to pay for them was given or contracted for, or if there was no communication with the owner of ship or cargo before the bottomry bond was given. The effect of any such fact cannot be appreciated without taking it in combination with the concomitant facts. If the repairs were complete, but the ship could not leave the port until they were paid for, the completion of repairs would be an immaterial fact in estimating the degree of need for bottomry. If the creditor could sell the ship in case of nonpayment, the sale would be a total loss of the voyage for the ship, and the learned counsel for the appellant failed to show either any duty on the captain in case of such sale, to land, warehouse, and transship the cargo, or any possibility thereby to realise any profit for the freighter. So in respect of communication with the owner either of ship or cargo, the possibility of so doing must be construed by estimating the cost and risk incidental to the delay from the attempt to make such communication, and the probability of failure after every exertion should have been made. The effect of any single fact upon the prospect of prosecuting the voyage with profit varies in endless permutation, according as some other fact forms a part of the combination of events which the captain has to consider in deciding whether there is a necessity for bottomry; and, as we before observed, we concur with the learned judge in the court below in thinking that such necessity was shown to exist in this case, although the repairs were completed before any proposal for the bond was made by the captain, and although the attempts to communicate with the owner of ship or cargo were not carried further than appeared by the evidence. Then as to the second ground of appeal, relating to the sums borrowed by the captain from the charterer at the port of loading, viz., 632*l.* 14*s.* 2*d.* cash advanced, and 61*l.* 6*s.* 9*d.* interest and insurance thereon, the question between these parties is, whether the sums were to be repaid in any event or only by deduction from the freight if freight was earned. The charterer, on signing the charter-party, incurs a liability for the chartered freight which becomes a debt in case of safe delivery of cargo, and the captain, for the shipowners, frequently obtains advances as well on account of this liability (whether stipulated for in the charter-party or not), as on the personal security of his owners: in either case they are loans; in the one case they are advances of freight, in the other case they are debts from the borrower. The distinction is at times material, because if they are advances of freight, the lender has an insurable interest in an advance which is to be lost if freight is not earned, but he has no such interest in an absolute debt. In the present case advances are not stipulated for in the charter-party, but were obtained by the application of the captain to the charterer, and both he and the charterer state that they were advances of freight, and the receipts for the advances are so expressed as that, if effect is given to those parts of them relating to insurance, they are decisive to show that the sums obtained were advances of freight, to be repaid by deductions from freight, if earned; and if not earned, then to be lost by the charterer, unless he should have used the stipulated premium in insuring. We consider Hicks v. Shield, 7 Ell. and Bl. 638, to be an authority for this construction. On these grounds, as between the charterer and the shipowner, their Lordships come to the conclusion that the sums obtained, viz., 632*l.* 14*s.* 2*d.* cash advanced, and 61*l.* 6*s.* 9*d.* for interest and insurance thereon; together, 694*l.* 0*s.* 11*d.*, were advances of freight. Then as between the holder of the bottomry bond and the charterer, is the nature of the transaction changed? Does the captain, by hypothecating the chartered freight to the obligee in bottomry, give a right to more freight than he, as obligor, had a right to demand from the charterer? The learned counsel for the respondent adduced no authority in support of the proposition that the assignee took by assignment what the assignor had no title to. The case of the last bottomry bond taking precedence of prior bottomry bonds, stands on the known incidents to a loan on bottomry; and no such incident has been shown to be attached by known course of law to advances on account of chartered freight. But, on the contrary, in Parson's Maritime Law, America, 429, it is stated that a general hypothecation of freight includes freight whether earned or not, "provided it has not been paid to the master or owner." He refers to the John, 3 W. Rob. 170, where the advance was stipulated for by the charter-party, but we consider that the same principle applies to any bonâ fide arrangement without fraud for forehand-payment or discharge before the bottomry is required. The learned counsel also used as an argument the policy of the law in making bottomry a good security, but it must not be made a good security by violating the rights of others. It is a good security in this case, as the cargo must pay if the prepaid freight is exempt. The lender on bottomry had the opportunity for knowing what advances had been made on account of freight, as they were indorsed on the charter-party, which he might have seen, and there was no ground for imputing fraud. For these reasons, their Lordships will recommend that the judgment in the court below should be reversed, in so for as it relates to the sums claimed as advances of freight, and for interest and insurance thereon. There remains the sum of 33*l.* 18*s.* 4*d.*, claimed as commission due by usage for obtaining the charter; and, according to such usage, to be paid by deduction from freight, if earned. But as to this sum, the statements in the evidence do not convince their Lordships that the appellant had the right to deduct it from the freight as against the holder of the bottomry bond; and they do not further examine into the right to this sum because as between these parties no interest depends upon the right thereto. Their Lordships will therefore recommend to Her Majesty to affirm so much of the judgment of the court below, as affirms the liability of the appellants, as owners of the cargo to the holder of a bottomry bond, and denies the right of the appellants to deduct the sum of 33*l.* 18*s.* 4*d.* from the freight for commission; and to reverse so much of the judgment as relates to the refusal to allow, as deductions from the freight to be paid to the respondent, the abovementioned sums which their Lordships consider to have been advances of freight. There will be no costs of appeal on either side.

Digitized by Google

Judgment varied.

Proctors for the appellants, Field, Roscoe, Field, and Francis, agents for T. E. Paget, Liverpool.

Proctors for the respondents, Waltons and Bubb.

Equity Courts

ROLLS COURT.

Reported by HENRY PEAT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Saturday, Feb. 13.

Re IBBITSON'S TRUST.

Real estate—Conversion—Assignment of personal estate in expectancy.

A testator devised his real estate to trustees upon trust to pay the rents and profits thereof to his wife during her life, if she should so long continue his widow, and after her death or marrying again to hold the same in trust for all his children who should then be living as tenants in common, subject to a proviso that it should be lawful for the trustees for the time being, if they should in their discretion think it expedient so to do, upon the death or second marriage of his said wife, to sell his real estate; and he directed the trustees to divide the moneys to arise by any such sale amongst all his children, who should be then living, in equal shares. During the lifetime of the tenant for life, H., one of the children, assigned all his personal estate in possession, remainder or expectancy to trustees for the benefit of his creditors; and afterwards he took the benefit of the Insolvent Debtors' Act. Upon the death of the tenant for life, the trustees sold the real estate under the power contained in the will:

Held, that there was no conversion, and that the assignee in insolvency, and not the trustees of the composition-deed, was entitled to H.'s share of the proceeds of the sale of the real estate.

This was a petition by the trustees of a composition-deed for payment to them of a certain fund, which had been paid into court under the following circumstances.

Thomas Ibbitson, by his will, dated the 15th Jan. 1840, after directing that his debts and funeral and testamentary expenses should be paid by his executors out of his personal estate, devised all his real estate to trustees upon trust to pay unto his wife Jane Ibbitson the rents and profits thereof during her life, if she should so long continue his widow, and from and after her decease or marrying again the said testator declared that the said trustees and their heirs should stand possessed of the said real estate in trust for all his children who should be then living, and their respective heirs, as tenants in common, subject to the proviso for the sale and disposition thereof thereinafter contained. And the testator bequeathed all his personal estate, stock-in-trade excepted, to his trustees upon the same trusts as his real estate. And as to his stock-in-trade he gave the same to his trustees upon trust to sell the same as soon after his death as convenient, and to place out the money to arise by the sale thereof, together with any other moneys which he might die entitled to, and which should not be required for the payment of his debts or funeral or testamentary expenses upon good and sufficient security, and to pay the interest thereof to his said wife during her life in case she should so long continue his widow, and from and after her decease or marrying again, upon trust to pay and divide the said principal money so to be placed out at interest unto and amongst all his children who should be then living, in equal shares. And he thereby declared that in case of the death of any one or more of his children before the death or marrying again, as the case might be, of his said wife, leaving lawful issue of his, her, or their body or respective bodies, then and in such case the trustees for the time being of his will should stand possessed of that part or share of his said real and personal estates and premises wherein each such deceased child would, if living, have been entitled as aforesaid, upon trust for the issue of such deceased child in manner therein mentioned. And it was thereby provided that it should be lawful for the trustees for the time being of his said will, if they should in their discretion think it expedient or proper so to do, and of their own proper authority, upon the decease or second marriage of his said wife, absolutely to sell and dispose of all or any part or parts of his said real and personal estates and premises respectively; and the trustees were thereby directed to pay, apply, divide, and apportion the moneys to arise by the sale and disposition of his said real and personal estates, or any part thereof, after deducting all necessary expenses unto and amongst all his children who should be then living, in equal shares, and the lawful issue of such of them as should be then dead and have left issue, such issue to take in manner therein mentioned.

The testator died on the 6th May 1840.

In 1858, Henry Ibbitson, one of the children of the testator executed a composition deed, dated the 4th March 1858, whereby he assigned his stock in trade, furniture, fixtures, and effects, and all other the personal estate and effects whatsoever and wheresoever of him the said Henry Ibbitson in possession, remainder, or expectancy to trustees for the benefit of his creditors.

In April 1860 Henry Ibbitson took the benefit of the Insolvent Debtor's Act.

The testator's widow died on the 23rd Oct. 1867; and shortly afterwards the trustees, in pursuance of the directions contained in the will, sold the testator's real estate, and got in his outstanding personal estate, and they paid into court under the Trustee Relief Act, the sum of 264*l.* 10*s.* 4*d.*, being the amount of Henry Ibbitson's share on the testator's real and personal estate.

This fund was claimed by the trustees of the composition deed, who presented the present petition for payment of the fund out of court; a contrary claim was made by Henry Ibbitson's assignee in insolvency.

Southgate, Q. C. and Bagshawe, for the petitioners, contended that the testator's real estate had been converted, and that Henry Ibbitson's share in it came to him as personalty, and passed by the composition-deed under the words "personal estate in expectancy." They cited

Hobson v. Neale, 17 Beav. 178.

R. Forster, for the assignee in insolvency; and

W. C. Harvey, for the trustees of the will, were not called upon.

Lord ROMILLY.—It is clear that there is no conversion. The will cannot be considered as creating a trust for sale. I think that the assignee in insolvency, and not the trustees of the deed, is entitled to the proceeds of sale of the real estate.

Solicitors for the petitioners, Few and Co.

Solicitors for the other parties, C. G. Rushworth; Wells and Sykes.

Saturday, May 29.

Re COMMERCIAL BANK CORPORATION OF INDIA AND THE EAST; WILSON'S CASE.

Company—Contributory—Infant transferee—Acquiescence.

Shares in a company were transferred to an infant. After he attained twenty-one a solicitor attended at chambers on behalf of him, and a number of other persons to oppose the making of a call:

Held, that this was not such a distinct act of acquiescence as to preclude him from afterwards applying to have his name struck off the list of contributories on the ground of infancy.

This was an application by one Henry Wilson to have his name struck off the list of contributories to the above company in respect of certain shares on the ground that he was an infant at the time when the shares were transferred to him. The shares were transferred into his name in Sept. 1865, and he was then an infant, as he was born in Jan. 1846, and consequently did not attain twenty-one till Jan. 1867. He was residing in India at the date of the transfer; he never paid any call in respect of the shares, and took no step to repudiate them.

On the 28th May 1866 an order was made for the winding-up of the company.

The official liquidator resisted Wilson's application on the ground that after he attained twenty-one he had acquiesced in the transfer. The following were the circumstances under which he was alleged to have acquiesced: At the date of the winding-up order it was supposed that it would not be necessary to make any further call, and the official liquidator made a report to that effect in Nov. 1866. Notwithstanding this, a summons for a call was issued in the following August, returnable in Nov. 1867. Wilson had come to England in the latter part of 1867, and in October of that year, Messrs. Tucker and Few, solicitors, attended at chambers on behalf of Wilson and a number of other shareholders of the company, to oppose the making of the call, in which they were unsuccessful. A balance order was eventually made against Wilson, who then took out the present summons to have his name removed from the list of contributories.

Roxburgh, Q. C. and Ince, for the applicant, submitted that it was well settled that an infant transferee was not liable, if he took steps to repudiate his liability in time; the applicant in this case had taken steps for that purpose as soon as he knew that he was fixed on the list, and the appearance of solicitors on behalf of him and a number of other persons could not be held to be an act of acquiescence. They cited

Re Blakely Ordnance Company, Lumsden's case, 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 437; L. Rep. 4 Ch. App. 31.

Sir R. Baggallay, Q. C. and Kekewich, for the official liquidator, contended that Wilson's appearance at chambers by his solicitors was a distinct act of acquiescence, and that he had thereby precluded himself from applying to have his name removed on the ground of infancy.

Lord ROMILLY.—It is clear that there must be a distinct act of acquiescence to render the applicant liable, and the mere fact of solicitors appearing for him and a number of other persons at chambers to oppose a call is not sufficient; probably the solicitors did not know that he was an infant at the date of the transfer. I am of opinion that there has not been complete acquiescence on his part, and the his name must, therefore, not be placed on the list of contributories.

Solicitor for the applicant, F. Bradley.

Solicitors for the official liquidator, Freshfields.

July 14 and 15.

Re BLAKELY ORDNANCE COMPANY;

CREYKE'S CASE.

Company—Contributory—Forfeiture of shares—Past member—List B.—Companies Act 1862, s. 38.

C.'s shares in a company were forfeited, in consequence of nonpayment of a call, within the period of one year prior to the commencement of the winding-up.

By the articles of association of the company it was provided that such forfeiture should involve the extinction of all interest in, and all claims and demands against, the company in respect of the shares forfeited, and all other rights incident to the shares; but that any member whose shares had been forfeited should, notwithstanding, be liable to pay to the company all calls owing on such shares at the time of such forfeiture:

Held that C. was liable to be placed on the list of contributories as a past member of the company.

Bridger and Neill's cases, L. Rep. 4 Ch. App. 266, followed.

This was an application by the official liquidator of the above company to have the name of a Mr. Creyke placed on the list B as a past member of the company in respect of certain shares which he formerly held.

The circumstances of the case were as follows:

In June 1865 Creyke applied for forty shares, which were duly allotted to him and registered in his name. A call was soon after made, and on his failing to pay it, the shares were forfeited in Nov. 1865.

By the articles of association of the company it was provided that, after one month's nonpayment of any call in respect of any share, the board might declare the share forfeited for the benefit of the company; and also that the forfeiture of any share should involve the extinction, at the time of the forfeiture, of all interest in, and all claims and demands against, the company in respect of the share, and all other rights incident to the share; but that any member whose shares had been forfeited should, notwithstanding, be liable to pay to the company all calls owing on such shares at the time of such forfeiture.

Subsequently to the forfeiture of his shares, Creyke paid the call, for the nonpayment of which his shares had been forfeited.

On the 28th July 1866 the company was ordered to be wound-up.

As it appeared that the existing members of the company were unable to satisfy the contributions required to be made by them in pursuance of the Companies Act 1862, the official liquidator proceeded to settle the list B of past members in accordance with the 38th section of the Act, hence the present application.

The liability of past members of a company is determined by the 38th section of the Act, which, so far as is material, is in the following words:

In the event of a company formed under this Act being wound-up, every present and past member of such company shall be liable to contribute to the assets of the company to an amount sufficient for the payment of the debts and liabilities of the company, and the costs, charges, and expenses of the winding-up, and for the payment of such sums as may be required for the adjustment of the rights of the contributories amongst themselves, with the qualifications following, that is to say, (1) "No past member shall be liable to contribute to the assets of the company if he has ceased to be a member for a period of one year or upwards prior to the commencement of the winding-up: (2) No past member shall be liable to contribute in respect of any debt or liabilities of the company contracted after the time at which he ceased to a member," &c., &c.

In his affidavit the official liquidator deposed that there existed debts and liabilities of the company contracted prior to the time when Mr. Creyke ceased to be a member.

Sir R. Baggallay, Q.C. and J. Napier Higgins, for the official liquidator, submitted that as Creyke had ceased to be a member within the period of one year prior to the commencement of the winding up, and as there now existed debts and liabilities of the company, contracted prior to the time when he ceased to be a member, he was clearly under the 38th section of the Act liable to be placed on the list in respect of such debts. They cited

Re Accidental and Marine Insurance Corporation—Bridger's case and Neill's case, L. Rep. 4, Ch. App. 266.

Jessel, Q.C. and Speed, for Mr. Creyke, contended that as he had afterwards paid the call, the rights of the company against him were altogether extinguished under the articles of association by the forfeiture of the shares. The creditors of the company had notice of the power conferred on the directors by the articles to declare shares forfeited and in that manner to release shareholders from subsequent claims. They cited

Re Reese River Silver Mining Company, Smith's case, 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 549; L. Rep. 2 Ch. App. 604;

Re Blakely Ordnance Company, Stocken's case, L. Rep. 3 Ch. App. 412;

Re Blakely Ordnance Company, Needham's case, 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 472; L. Rep. 4 Eq. 135;

Re Barned's Banking Company, Andrew's case, 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 656; L. Rep. 4 Eq. 458;

Devaynes v. Noble, 1 Mer. 530.

Lord ROMILLY.—The question in this case is whether, under the 38th section of the Companies Act, Mr. Creyke is liable to contribute as a past member to the assets of the company. I am of opinion that he is liable. The present case comes clearly within the decision in Bridger and Neill's cases, (sup.), where it was held that forfeiture of shares does not relieve a shareholder from liability to pay past calls, and debts and liabilities of the company which existed at the time of the forfeiture; and this is clearly the effect of the 38th section of the Act. Mr. Creyke's name must, therefore, be settled on the list B. as a past member.

Solicitors for the official liquidator, Lewis, Munns, Nunn, and Longden.

Solicitors for Mr. Creyke, Taylor, Hoare, and Taylor.

V. C. MALINS' COURT.

Reported by G. T. EDWARDS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Friday, June 11.

WESTWOOD v. MCKIE.

Will—Charity—Gift for the benefit of the Scotch kirk—Free Church—Presbyterian form of worship—Cy près.

A testator, who died in 1841, by his will, dated in 1838, after reciting that it was in contemplation to build a Scotch kirk for the performance of the Presbyterian form of worship in the island of Antigua, where he resided, gave 1000*l.* to trustees to invest in the name of the minister and members of the kirk session for the time being, and in all time coming for ever, the interest of which was to be in aid of an endowment for the use and maintenance of such minister as should be inducted and performing the sacred offices and duties of the Scotch kirk in the said island, and not otherwise; and if no such kirk should be built within eight years from the date of his will, then upon trust for certain persons beneficially. In 1838, shortly after the date of the testator's will, a Presbyterian kirk was erected, and was opened for public worship in 1842, and an ordained minister of the Established Church of Scotland was inducted to the kirk, but he resigned his office in 1843, and in 1846 an ordained minister of the Free Church of Scotland was appointed by the colonial committee of the Free Kirk, and a Free Church minister had ever since continued to perform the duties of minister of the kirk, according to the Presbyterian form of worship; and a kirk session according to the constitution of the Free Church had been constituted, and was then in existence. There had not been in Antigua any other Scotch kirk during the last thirty-six years. The testator, who was a member of the Established Church of Scotland, had taken great interest in, and was a subscriber to, the scheme for building the kirk:

Digitized by Google

Held, that inasmuch as the Established and Free Churches of Scotland differed only in matters of Church discipline, the charitable gift did not fail.

This was a petition in the cause for the payment out of court of a fund, the suit being for the administration of the estate of Robert Briggs, late of the Island of Antigua. The details of the proceedings which had been had were extremely complicated, but the only point to be argued related to a gift of 1000*l.* in his will. This instrument was dated the 13th Aug. 1838, whereby after reciting that it was in contemplation to build a Scotch kirk for the performance of the Presbyterian form of public worship in the said island if that good work should be proceeded with, and brought to a completion, and a minister of the Kirk of Scotland should be inducted to such church, and performing the sacred duties of such kirk in the said island, the testator directed his executors and trustees to invest in good and safe securities on interest in the names of the minister and members of the kirk session for the time being, and in all time coming for ever, the sum of 1000*l.* sterling, the interest of such sum to be in aid of an endowment for the use and maintenance of such minister as should be inducted and performing the sacred offices and duties of such Scotch kirk in the said Island, and not otherwise. And the testator further directed that if no such kirk should be built within eight years from the date of that his will, then and in such case the said principal sum of 1000*l.* should remain to and be part of his trust moneys to be invested as thereinbefore directed.

The testator died on the 3rd May 1841, his estate being administered in Chancery. By a certificate of the chief clerk dated the 20th Jan. 1865, in pursuance of an order of the 24th Nov. 1856, it was certified that as to an inquiry who were then entitled to a sum of 697*l.* 17*s.* 8*d.*, being the amount apportioned in respect of the legacy of 1000*l.* bequeathed in trust for the benefit of the Scotch kirk in Antigua, it appeared that in 1838, shortly after the date of the testator's will, and while he resided in Antigua, the erection of a Scotch kirk for the performance of the Presbyterian form of public worship, was commenced at the city of St. John in that island, and that the testator took great interest in it, and was a subscriber to the scheme for building the kirk; that the kirk was completed in 1842, and in the same year the Rev. Alex. Brown, a duly ordained minister of the Established Church of Scotland, was duly inducted to the kirk which was opened for public worship on the 9th Oct. 1842, under the pastorship of Mr. Brown, who continued to perform the duties of minister of the kirk until June 1843, when he resigned the office. That in Feb. 1846 the Rev. George Anderson, who was an ordained minister of the Free Church of Scotland, but was not an ordained minister of the Established Church of Scotland, was appointed to the charge of the kirk by the colonial committee of the Free Church, and was inducted to the kirk and continued to perform the duties of its minister according to the Presbyterian form of public worship until June 1850, when he resigned. That upon such resignation the Rev. Peter Mason, who was an ordained minister of the Free Church of Scotland, but was not an ordained minister of the Established Church of Scotland, was appointed to the charge of the kirk by the said colonial committee, and he continued to perform the duties of minister of the kirk according to the Presbyterian form of public worship until the year 1858, when he resigned. And that it also appeared that with the exception of an occasional temporary supply the office of minister of the kirk continued vacant from the time of Mr. Mason's resignation until the 21st July 1863, when the Rev. John Smith, who was a duly ordained minister of the Free Church of Scotland, but not of the Established Church of Scotland, was appointed to the charge of the kirk by the colonial committee, and on the 6th Oct. 1863, Mr. Smith was inducted to the kirk, and had ever since continued to perform the duties of minister according to the Presbyterian form of public worship, and that a kirk session of the kirk according to the constitution of the Free Church of Scotland had been constituted, and was then in existence, the minister and members whereof were all members of the Free Church. That there was not, and had not been for the last thirty-six years and upwards, in Antigua any Scotch kirk for the performance of the Presbyterian form of public worship other than the abovementioned kirk. The chief clerk then certified that subject to the question whether the ministers and elders of the Free Kirk in Antigua came within the terms of the gift of the legacy of 1000*l.*, the then present minister and members of the kirk session of the said kirk at the city of St. John in Antigua were the persons (if any) who were then entitled to the apportioned legacy.

Vaughan Hawkins, as representing the charity, contended that the exact description of minister and members of the congregation, only existing for a short period after the testator's death, and the Free Church having been in possession ever since, the court must apply the fund cy près; it was difficult to understand how the trust could fail. [THE VICE-CHANCELLOR.—In The Attorney-General v. Munro, 2 De G. & S. 122, it was held that the Free Church were not entitled.] It must be admitted that the Free Church is the only Scotch church now in Antigua.

Attorney-General v. Murdock, 7 Hare 445; 1 De G. M. & G. 86;
Attorney-General v. Bunce, L. Rep. 6 Eq, 574; 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 742;

If there was no other authority on the subject than that the charity would take cy près. Da Costa v. Parr, Ambl. 228, was a gift by a Jew for an assembly for reading the law and instructing the people in the Jewish religion, which, being illegal, the bequest was applied towards supporting a preacher for instructing children in the Christian religion.

Muggridge v. Tapwell, 7 Ves. 36;
Attorney-General v. Francis, W. N, 1866, 280.

In the latter case there was a bequest to a school in Virginia, which disappeared, but there was a fund in court. There was the college of William and Mary, however, in connection with a similar school, and the Master of the Rolls held it to be a proper object for the gift, but, being a foreign charity, no scheme was directed. The doctrine of cy près was of the widest possible application. The differences in the different sections of the church in Scotland were very minute: (Taylor Innes' Law of the Creeds of Scotland). The will here was made during the struggle when the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland passed an Act that no pastor should be introduced contrary to the will of the people, and the establishment rescinded that resolution.

Glasse, Q. C., for persons interested in the residuary estate, insisted that the doctrine of cy près had been carried much too far. The words here were distinct as to the form "Presbyterian form of worship," and how could it be said that the Free Church form the least resembled it? There was such a distinction that hundreds of ministers went out upon it. Attorney-General v. Bunce (sup.) did not apply there. There there had been one congregation for seventy years, and a set of strangers came on purpose to claim the legacy.

Attorney-General v. Whitely, 11 Ves. 241;
Clark v. Taylor, 1 Drew. 642;
Cherry v. Mott, 1 M. & Cr. 123.

The testator here was a Presbyterian and took great interest in the erection of a kirk, and his intention could not have been to have given it to a Free Church congregation.

Bevir, for other parties, supported the same view, submitting that the court would carry out the testator's intention. Here the words excluded any other form of public worship than Presbyterian. Moreover, the words "not otherwise" were very strongly in favour of that view.

G. O. Edwards for parties in the same interest.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—I think if it is necessary the doctrine of cy près must be applied to this case; I am not satisfied that it must be. The general object of the gift is distinctly stated by the testator, who, after reciting that it was contemplated to build a Scotch kirk if they could get land provided, for members of the Kirk of Scotland, he being one himself, directed his executors and trustees and the survivor to invest on good and sufficient security, in the names of the minister and members of the kirk session for time being and in all time to come, 1000*l.* in aid of an endowment for such Scotch kirk, and not otherwise. That, I think, means except in the event contemplated. The minister was inducted, and a Scotch kirk built; but from the year 1843 there have been a succession of Free Church ministers. It is very possible if the testator could have foreseen what would take place he would have provided for the money in that event not being given at all; but as he died in 1841, it is impossible to conjecture what he intended, or to come to the conclusion that strict Presbyterians only were to be the objects of his bounty. There is, I believe, little or no difference of doctrine between Presbyterians and Free Churchmen, except in points of church discipline, and therefore I think, having regard to the object the testator had in view, the existence of something which will carry it into effect on general principles is sufficient. As I said before, if it should be necessary to apply the doctrine of cy près, I am clearly of opinion it must be applied, and the benefit of the legacy given to the Free Church rather than that the gift should fail altogether. It is not necessary to go into the cases cited by Mr. Glasse. They are all quite distinguishable from the present. I had occasion to consider them in the case of Attorney-General v. Bunce (sup.), and I think I should be bound to hold that the rules I there recognised shall be applied here. The Presbyterian views were there fully considered and argued upon, and there was a minute examination of all the authorities, and I came to the conclusion that a Baptist congregation were entitled rather than that the gift to the charity should fail. I did so because between the Presbyterians and Baptists there is a general consonance, except in matters of church discipline; and so here, as I have observed, there is between the Free Churchmen and the members of the Kirk of Scotland. On the general paramount objects of the testator, therefore, I am of opinion that the charity does not fail.

Solicitors: Chauntler and Crouch; Fearon and Clabon.

V. C. JAMES'S COURT.

Reported by W. H. BENNET and R. T. BOULT, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Tuesday, May 4.

PHELPS v. AMCOTT AND OTHERS.

Settlement—Covenant to settle moiety of the property settlor should be intitled to at the time of his death—Release.

A release which had been executed by a person ignorant of his rights, and where it was proved that he had no intention of releasing such rights, set aside.

By a marriage settlement dated in May 1839, the husband, the settlor, covenanted to settle one moiety of all the real and personal estate which he should be seised or possessed of, or entitled to at law or in equity, at the time of his decease (subject to the payment of a moiety of his debts and any jointure) upon the usual trusts of a marriage settlement. One of these was whereby the survivor of the settlor and his intended wife would be entitled on the death of a Mrs. Cherry (the lady's mother) to a life interest in certain property.

The bill was filed by a Col. W. T. Powell, the husband, and the trustees of this marriage settlement, against the executors of the will of his wife's father, W. C. Cherry, and the trustees of a deed of conveyance and assignment by the late W. C. Cherry, dated in Sept. 1858, against the trustees and beneficiaries under the marriage settlement of another daughter of W. C. Cherry, and the solicitor who prepared that conveyance and assignment, to enforce the covenant contained in the first-mentioned marriage settlement.

After the marriage of Col. Powell and his wife differences had arisen between them which terminated in a separation. Her father, W. C. Cherry, by a deed of Sept. 1858, in consideration as it was expressed of the natural love and affection which he bore for his wife and daughters (of whom Mrs. Col. Powell was one) granted to two of the defendants and their heirs, certain real estates to the use of the said W. Cherry and his assigns, for life without impeachment of waste, and after his decease to the use of said grantees and their heirs upon trust, to permit said Mrs. Cherry to enjoy the same for her life, and after her decease or during her lifetime with her consent upon trust to sell and pay one moiety of the net proceeds to such persons, and for such interests as the said Mrs. Col. Powell should, notwithstanding her coverture appoint, and in default of such appointment into her proper hands for her separate use.

By the answers put in by the defendants it was, in fact, admitted that the object of this latter deed was to protect the property therein comprised from the trusts of the marriage settlement of Col. and Mrs. Powell of May 1839, and any claims which he or the plaintiffs, the trustees, might have thereunder.

Digitized by Google

Mrs. Cherry who, as before stated, had a life interest in the property, died in May 1859.

Much evidence was entered into to show that the deed of release and assignment was executed by Col. Powell in ignorance of his rights. No case was made against the solicitor who had the preparation of this deed.

Karslake, Q. C. and Fawcett for the plaintiffs.

Amphlett, Q. C., and Cookson, and Willcock, Q. C. and B. L. Chapman, for the principal defendants, contended that the plaintiff Col. Powell, had acquiesced in what had taken place, and the release was a good and valid release of all the rights under his marriage settlement.

E. E. Kay, Q. C. and W. H. G. Bagshawe, for the solicitor, contended that no case had been made against him.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said that the general law of the case and the authorities showed that the plaintiffs were entitled to the remedies sought. Indeed the right of the plaintiffs to the relief prayed was not disputed, except on the ground of the release and acquiescence. But it did not appear from the terms of the release, nor did the evidence adduced in the cause show, that Col. Powell was aware of the rights which it was said he had released, nor that he had any intention of releasing any such rights. He was not, therefore, bound by the release which had been executed, nor could the defence of acquiescence prevail. There must, therefore, be the usual decree in the terms of the prayer of the bill setting aside the release with costs. The plaintiffs, however, would have to pay personally the costs of the defendant, the solicitor against whom the unfounded charges had been made.

Decree accordingly.

Solicitors, G. F. Cook; Hayes, Twisden and Co.

Wednesday, June 9.

GEPP v. MAJENDIE.

Power—Due exercise of—Mortgage—Compound interest.

By a deed of disentail and re-settlement of certain real estates power was given to the father and son, and for the son if he should survive, to mortgage the estate to raise such sums as might be requisite to redeem several prior mortgages:

The father and son exercised their joint power of appointment, creating various charges:

The son was the survivor, and he mortgaged the estates to the plaintiffs to secure a sum of 600l. advanced at various times to the grandfather, father, and son, during the lifetimes of the two former, on the faith of an agrement that those sums should be secured to them by a mortgage:

Held, that this mortgage was a valid execution of the power, and compound interest allowed as provided for by the prior charges.

This was a bill filed by the plaintiffs, who had been solicitors in partnership at Chelmsford, in concurrence with other parties interested in the question, to take the opinion of the court as to whether a mortgage dated the 18th March 1868 was a valid exercise of a power under the following circumstances:

By a deed of disentail and resettlement, dated the 1st Oct. 1868 certain real estates in Essex were conveyed to trustees and their heirs, subject to certain mortgages, and to an estate for life of Ashurst Majendie (the grandfather), and to other powers, estates, and charges, including a mortgage of the 6th Sept. 1858, to the use that Ashurst Lewis Majendie (the son) should from and after the death and failure of issue of the granfather, and during the joint lives of Henry Lewis Majendie (the father) and himself receive an annuity, and subject thereto to the use of the father for life, remainder to the uses created by the powers of mortgaging therein contained; and subject thereto to the use of the son for life, without impeachment of waste, remainder to the use of the first and other sons in tail male with remainders over. The first power of mortgaging was a power for the son and the father, or the son if he should be the survivor, and after the decease of the survivor for the trustees to raise by mortgage such sums as might be requisite to redeem the mortgage of the 6th Sept. 1858 and pay costs, and that it should be lawful for the son and the father, or the survivor of them, and at the decease of the survivors for the trustees, by the means aforesaid, to raise and levy "so much money as should be requisite to pay the interest and compound interest which might from time to time accrue or become due," during the lifetime of the son and the father or the survivor, upon or in respect of the moneys which should be raised and levied for the purpose of redeeming the said mortgage and paying costs and the costs of such last-mentioned transaction, "all which moneys so to be raised as last aforesaid should be paid and applied in discharge of such interest, compound interest, and costs."

The second power of mortgaging was a power for the father during his lifetime to mortgage to the extent of 5000*l.* for his own benefit, which was followed by a similar clause as to raising and levying such moneys as should be requisite to pay compound interest on the 5000*l.* and costs.

On the 5th Feb. 1859 the son and father, in exercise of the joint power of appointment, charged the estates by way of mortgage. On the 4th March 1859, and on the 18th Feb. 1860, they again exercised their joint power by mortgaging to the extent of 4000*l.*, at 4½ per cent. On the 23rd July 1861 the grandfather, father, and son joined in assigning a debt of 6550*l.* and interest at 4½ per cent., then due on the indenture of the 5th Feb. 1859.

The father died on the 6th Jan. 1863.

The son being unable to pay the interest due on the indentures of 1859, 1860, and 1861, the requisite sums were advanced by the plaintiffs on the faith of an agreement that these sums should be secured to them by a mortgage.

The grandfather died in June 1867.

A mortgage to the plaintiffs for 600*l.* was executed by the son on the 18th March 1868.

An agreement having been entered into that these several mortgages should be transferred to a purchaser, he took an objection that the mortgage of the 18th March 1868 was not a valid execution of the power.

The cause now came on to be heard.

Amphlett, Q. C. and Wickens, for the plaintiffs, contended that the mortgage was strictly within the provisions of the powers conferred by the deed of disentail and resettlement before referred to.

Waley, for the defendants, contended that it was not; and urged that the parol agreement with the plaintiffs to secure their advances by a mortgage could not amount to an equitable exercise of a power, and that if this mortgage deed were so there was nothing to prevent a man in this position from himself advancing moneys, and charging the estate with compound interest in his own favour.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR remarked that that was not the case before the court; when it should arise it would be the time to deal with it. It did not appear to him that there was anything illegal in providing for compound interest, and he must hold that this mortgage of the 18th March was within the power conferred by the first deed. There would be a declaration that such deed was a valid exercise of the power.

Decree accordingly.

Solicitors: Paterson, Snow, and Co.; Domville, Lawrence, and Co.

Election Petitions.

Reported by F. O. CRUMP, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

TAUNTON ELECTION PETITION.

March 2, 3, 4, and 5.

(Before BLACKBURN, J.)

Political association—Agency—Payment of barristers' court money — Bribery — Scrutiny — Corruption by strangers.

There existed in the town a Conservative and a Liberal association, each of which generally promoted the return of its own candidate, and assisted the registration of its own supporters.

The managers of the Conservative Association having circulated addresses and papers issued by the candidate, will be presumed to have done so with his knowledge, or with that of his agents, so as to constitute the association an agent of such candidate, and to make him responsible for any illegal acts of its managers.

Amongst other things, the managers of the association paid 5s to every person who claimed it in respect of time lost in attending the barrister's court at the registration. Several voters claimed and received this amount who had not attended the court.

Held to be bribery by the association.

Where a person has actually attended the revising barrister's court, either because he was obliged to do so, or because he thought he was obliged to do so, and has actually lost a day's time in attending there, he may be inferred to have taken the compensation honestly and not for his vote. But where nothing has been done to entitle the person to the money, the inference must be that he took it for his vote, and his name would be struck off on a scrutiny.

Where an association or a person is tacitly allowed by a candidate, or with the candidate's knowledge, to promote his election, that is some evidence to show that he is an agent.

And where a body acts in support of a candidate, the assistance being a substantial benefit, and he does not hold them off or repudiate them, he must accept the consequences, and be responsible for their malpractices.

On a scrutiny, every voter who is shewn to have been corrupted, although corrupted by the opposite side to that on which he voted, and even though the bribe be received from a stranger, will be struck off. The object of a scrutiny is to ascertain, without regard to who corrupted this man or that, what is the majority of uncorrupted voters, and whether there is a majority for anyone who has not rendered himself by personal misconduct incapable of standing.

This was a petition against the return of Mr. Serjeant Cox, the seat being claimed for Mr. James. The evidence and points in the case are sufficiently noticed in the judgment.

Ballantine, Serjt., and J. O. Griffits appeared for the petition.

Rodwell, Q.C., and Collins for the respondent.

BLACKBURN, J.—There are two questions raised by this petition, touching this election. The first is, the assertion in the petition that the election of Mr. Serjeant Cox, who was returned as the member for the borough, is void, the consequence of which would be that there should be a new election. The other is, the claim of the seat on behalf of Mr. James, claiming that he ought to have been returned at the last election, and should now be the sitting member for the borough. The two matters come on together, but they involve different considerations. Upon the first the law has been well established, that where a person has been returned a Member of Parliament for a constituency, and it is made to appear that he has obtained his seat by any corrupt practice (I pass by other matters which are not relevant to the present question), committed by himself or his agents, the seat which he has obtained by means of that corrupt practice is not capable of being retained, and the election must be void, that being to a very considerable extent a matter affecting personally the candidate who has been returned (though, of course, involving the interests of the constituency also), depending very much upon what he, or his agents, for whom he is responsible, have done. The second matter involves a different consideration. The member who is returned for any constituency ought to be the member who is elected by a majority of pure and unimpeached voters who vote at that particular election; if anyone failed to obtain such a majority, or (what comes to the same thing) if it cannot be proved that he has obtained such a majority, there must be a new election; that constituency must have a fresh choice to return such member as they choose for the purpose. The distinction, therefore, is obvious there; it is not any longer a matter merely between the two candidates, but it involves the interests of the constituency. The constituency are, as one may say, parties to the question, and their interests must be considered as well as those of the sitting member and the candidate who claims the seat; it is necessary in that case to see whether or no there is a majority of pure voters, and accordingly, every voter who is shown to have been corrupted, must be struck off, for whomever he voted. It matters not whether he was corrupted by the sitting member, or whether he was corrupted by the sitting member's agents, or by a stranger; even if corrupted by the other side, I take for granted the man's vote is bad; if a man accepts a bribe for the purpose of voting, say for Mr. Serjeant Cox, and then, having been so corrupted, votes for Mr. James, his vote cannot be counted for Mr. James, any more than if Mr. James himself had bribed him. Or vice versa if it were to be shown that he had received a bribe, or was corrupted by somebody, to vote for Mr. James, and then voted for Mr. Serjeant Cox, his vote could not stand for Mr. Serjeant Cox, and must be struck off. The result is, that we have to see, without regard to who it was corrupted this man or that, what was the majority of uncorrupted voters, and whether there is a majority for any one who has not rendered himself by personal misconduct incapable of standing. If there is such a majority, that person should be declared returned and substituted for the sitting member; if that majority is not made out, there must be a new election in case it is shown that the first election is void. That being so, the first question to consider is, whether there is shown here to have been corruption and bribery on the part of Mr. Serjeant Cox or his agents; I may say at once, there has been no evidence, and no ground given whatever, for saying that there was any personal bribery or personal corruption on the part of either candidate; I pass that by, taking it for granted that they are both personally untainted with anything of the nature of bribery. The first question then is, has there been any corruption on the part of those for whom Mr. Serjeant Cox is responsible, such as to make his election, as far as he was concerned, void. Now, the great matter which has been relied on has been what has been called barrister's court money, and the proceedings of the Conservative Association in paying that barrister's court money; and that matter I divide in this way. The first question is, to see if what has been shown to have been done by the Conservative Association in paying that barrister's court money was a corrupt practice; and secondly, if that be established, whether the relation between Mr. Serjeant Cox and that Conservative Association, or those who acted for them, is such as to make him responsible for them as his agents. Now, as to the first of these questions, it depends entirely, I think, upon the true construction of the Corrupt Practices Act (17 & 18 Vict. c. 102), s. 2, the first part of the section, and its proper application to the facts of the case. That section enacts, "that every person who shall, directly or indirectly by himself, or by any other person on his behalf, offer, promise, or promise to procure, or to endeavour to procure, to or for any person, on behalf of any voter, or to or for any other person, in order to induce any voter to vote or refrain from voting," is declared to be guilty of bribery. That is the section we have first to consider; it is, "every person who directly or indirectly by himself" gives money—I pass by everything else—"to any voter in order to induce any voter to vote at the election;" that is made bribery on the part of the person who gives it; it is a subsequent section that declares what shall be bribery on the part of the receiver. We have to see, taking that section, whether the facts here proved, do bring the Conservative Association, treated as if it were a person within that category, as having given money to induce voters to vote. Now, as far as that goes, the facts do not seem to be very much in dispute as to the broad outline of the case. It appears that the registration in this particular year happened in September, at which time it was well known that there was going to be a contest very speedily in this borough, and throughout all England; I mention that date because it makes a substantial and important difference as a matter of evidence in considering the bearing of the matter. If there was a registration held, as probably a registration in this autumn will be held, at the beginning of a Parliament when there was not likely to be a contested election for four or five years, one would hardly consider that any proceedings taken at the registration were intended to induce voters to vote afterwards, when we find that the canvass had already commenced at the time of the registration in September, and when the election was expected to come off and did come off about the middle of November, then it becomes far more probable that what was done in connection with the registration was to induce voters to vote; I only point that out as being one of the matters of evidence. At this time, when no doubt the revising barrister held his court, many persons who were claimants, some of whom were objected to, would attend at the barrister's court to support their case, or to see if any objection were made to their claims. Now what was done or professed to be done on the part of the Conservative Association, was to repay those persons for their loss of time, to give them a day's pay for their loss of time in attending the registration court. The matter differs in that way from what it would have been if there had been a payment given to them for their loss of time in attending at the election itself, which was the case in one of the cases cited by my brother Ballantine, the Devonport case, 14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 574, where the persons who were paid money were paid for their loss of time in attending to give their votes. Such payments, when given to a person for loss of time in coming to deliver his vote, inevitably it seems to me (I cannot see how there can be a doubt about it) are payments for voting, and are distinctly struck at by the express words of the section, which I shall refer to afterwards, when I come to speak of those who received the money. That would be a distinct and clear case within the very terms of the Act; and there is nothing further than to say, was there a payment given to them for voting? But when the payment is given for an attendance at the revising barrister's court, it is not within the express terms of the Act. It may very well be that there should be a payment for an attendance at the barrister's court, which should be bonâ fide for that purpose, and no other, and which is not meant by the Act of Parliament. From the fact of paying a person money for attending to be put upon the register, it is a matter of inference, that, doubtless, the persons who put the voter on the register expected him to vote for their party; no doubt that would be in their minds at the time. Doubtless, if you were to pay a man direct for being put upon the register, and to offer a reward for every person who would himself come and be registered by the Conservative Association or the Liberal Association, as the case might be, it would not be as a matter of law that that would be a bribe for a vote; but it would be a matter of very strong observation, and there would be reasonable ground for inferring that those who paid people belonging to any particular political party, for coming and being put upon the register did expect, as part of what they were paying for, that they were to vote for that party when the election came. It would be a matter of fact, not of law, but the inference would be strong from it. When it is merely repaying them what may be called almost money out of pocket, the loss of a day's work, the inference is by no means so strong. It might be so or it might not; in each case it would be a matter of inference, looking at the facts, and a very important fact would be, whether or no an election was pending, or close approaching. It would require looking at that to see whether it was really or not paid to induce the votes, or whether it was really and bonâ fide a repayment for money out of pocket. I certainly think that it would be a wise thing on the part of all people to avoid making such payments at any time, because, certainly, it is always open to the observation and inference that it may be for the corrupt purpose of inducing the vote, and may therefore be considered bribery. In the present case, however, we have to go a great deal further than that. I think where it was bonâ fide it would not be a bribe; where it was intended to induce a vote, which would be a matter to be collected from the whole of the facts, it would be a bribe. In the present case I have to consider whether what was proved was such as to lead me to the conclusion that I ought to say that these payments were made to induce the vote. First, we have to look at the dates. The registration was held in September; the election was coming off in the middle of November. About the first week in November these payments were made. Five shillings is a very liberal day's pay, but not in itself necessarily a corrupt one, though it is estimating the day's wages pretty high, still it is not necessarily corrupt, though open to observation. It would almost appear that it was practically paid to everyone who would come forward and ask for it. It may be that it was want of business habit; it may be that it was not intended, but no precaution seems to have been taken at all, except an endeavour to see that the man who came forward and claimed the 5s. was really a voter. No attempt seems to have been made to procure from the persons who came forward and had the 5s. any proof that if they had, in fact, attended the registration court; many of them I have no doubt had attended; many of them I have no doubt had not. I do not doubt, from the nature of the evidence, and the way in which it came out, that a great many (what number I cannot tell, but a considerable number) got the 5s. who had no claim at all to be the person, or to be claiming on behalf of the person in whose name they got it. I have very little doubt that there was a considerable quantity of embezzlement of the funds of the Conservative Association by persons who were not voters at all. But that is not what I am concerned with at all at present, but to try to see what from the evidence is the conclusion which I ought to form of the motives of those who advanced the money. Now, when I find that a very considerable sum (we do not know with precision how much it was, certainly beyond 25*l.*; and there seems to be some reason to believe that it was something like 50*l.*) was paid to a large number of persons without any check at all to see that they really had done anything for it, with no precaution whatever, except to see that they were voters on the register, which they did endeavour to see; and that this payment was made a considerable time after the registration, and a very short time before the election came off, and made in this way to everybody who came forward to claim it; is there any reasonable ground for coming to any other conclusion than that the motive of those who advanced the money and paid it in that way was to induce persons to vote at the election? I have thought it over, and I cannot myself come to any other conclusion than that it was so. If that be so, it is brought at once within the terms of the section I read, and the payments to those voters were payments made to induce the voter to vote; and, consequently, being made with that intention on the part of the person who paid it, they are bribery on the part of the payer of the money; whether or no they are corruption on the part of the person who receives it depends on another section. I may probably as well point out the difference between them at once. The 3rd section, the first part of it says, "every voter who shall before or during any election receive" (I pass over the words that do not bear upon this) "any money for voting or agreeing to vote, shall be deemed to be guilty of bribery." Now, it may very well be, as a matter of fact, that a person gives money (I have already said that I have come to the conclusion that persons did give money here) to all voters who would come forward and ask for it, saying and holding forth "this is paid for your loss of time at the revising barrister's court, and I will pay money for loss of time at the revising barrister's court to every voter who will come forward for it," having the full intention thereby to induce the voter to vote on his own side and in support of his own particular views; and yet it may so happen that the voter who comes forward and receives that 5s. does come forward honestly and bona fide, because he believes that he is entitled to the money for his loss of time; and if he honestly and bona fide comes forward in that way, I do not, as at present advised, think that it would be bribery on his part within the meaning of the clause. I need hardly point out that it is a question of fact, and as a general principle where a person comes forward to receive money which is given as a bribe, the general rule of evidence applies in all such cases one would naturally conclude very strongly that the persons took it as a bribe, though it by no means follows as a matter of law that it would be so, and in regard to this particular case there are many instances in which it would require a good deal of consideration to see whether it was so or not. Where a person has actually attended the revising barrister's court, either because he was obliged to do so, or because he thought he was obliged to do so, and has actually lost a day's time in attending there (and the matter to be considered is a matter of fact to see whether that was so), it is not a very strained or unreasonable inference in his favour to say that he may have taken the 5s., unquestionably believing that he was entitled to it, and not believing it to be for his vote. Where, on the other hand, a man has not attended the revising barrister's court, but has literally done nothing for it, and has not a pretence or colour for it, he may (I will not say as a matter of law he may not) believe he is entitled to receive 5s. for going there; but I think that there would be a very strong inference in such a case, and the natural inference would be that when he took the 5s., having nothing else to give for it but his vote, he took it for his vote; and his name would be struck off on a scrutiny. I need not say that in such a case the constituency would be concerned. We must necessarily look at every individual case by itself and see in the interests of the constituency, is this really a bad vote, and one which ought to be struck off so as to see what the majority of pure votes were? It is not an inquiry that I am particularly desirous to invite, but I feel bound to enter into it, case by case and name by name; and you, brother Ballantine and Mr. Rodwell, must consider for yourselves both of you, whether that can be done, and how far it can be done. What I have just said may rather be considered as a parenthesis, and now I have to proceed with the second question as to whether or no there is sufficient evidence of the agency in this case. Now, upon that the rule of law has long been established, and has been ratified by acts as I think, that in Parliamentary matters we are not to consider the strict rule of common law agency generally established to this extent, that a person is responsible for his agent in all that he does within the scope of his authority, but is not responsible for anything that he does beyond the scope of his authority. There is one exception in the case of the sheriff, but I may pass that by. So that the common rule of law would be, if you employed a man to do an honest thing, and he chose to commit a crime, you would never be responsible criminally, but beyond that you would not be even responsible civilly for the crime committed when the instructions you gave him were to act as an honest man. But in Parliamentary election law it has long been established that, where a person has employed an agent for the purpose of procuring his election, he, the candidate, is responsible for the act of that agent in committing corruption, though he himself not only did not intend it or authorise it, but though bonâ fide he did his best to hinder it. The rule must, at times, fall with great hardship upon particular persons. But I may just mention the considerations which no doubt led the common law, as I may call it, of Parliament to establish it. Corruption, as we all know, in practice and in fact, is seldom or never done by the hand of the candidate. The two modes in which it was found in practice that corruption was carried on were, I take it, principally these: persons were put forward to do all the work of canvassing and conducting an election, who did it corruptly, the candidate purposely keeping himself out of knowledge of anything about the matter, or being kept by his friends purposely out of knowledge of the matter, so that he should have the full benefit of their services; and were it not for this rule which has been established he would not suffer for their misdeeds; he would put forward a person to be his agent, and conduct his election and win for him, telling him to do it by fair means; if the man won it by foul means he would have the benefit of it.

That is one of the great reasons. Another great reason would be, that no doubt people were put forward, as to whom the candidate was carefully kept from knowing that they were spending any money, or doing anything, with the notion, according to the loose morality that prevailed in election matters, that when the time for petitioning was past, those persons might come to him and say, "I did spend that 1000*l.* for you upon the election; of course I did not tell you about it, or say a word about it, and now you are bound in honour to pay me that 1000*l.*, of which you had the benefit;" and which, in point of fact, the candidates did, I have no doubt, with some grumbling, feel themselves bound in honour to pay; accordingly that was another reason, that wherever a person was in such a relation to the candidate, that there would be reason to apprehend that consequence following, there the Parliamentary law was a motive for declaring that the candidate should be responsible for the act of his agent. Those were the guiding principal motives that induced, I was going to say the enacting, of the law, but I should rather say the establishing of the law in practice. Now comes the important and difficult question, to say what is the definition of agency, for which the candidate would be responsible; what relation between the candidate and the person who is shown to be guilty of a corrupt practice, would be sufficient to make the candidate responsible for that person's corrupt practice; and upon that I have, of course, done my best to find what others may have spoken about it, and have done my best to reflect upon it myself; and I am not able at present (and I rather doubt if in the nature of things it is possible) to give a precise definition of it. I think that all one can do is this, to say, that wherever a person is in any way allowed by a candidate, or has the candidate's sanction for it, to try to carry on his election and to act for him, that is some evidence to show that he is an agent. I think that we cannot come further (at least I have not been able to come further) than to say this: if in the ordinary course of things I had a jury to find the facts, I being a judge of the law, the direction I should give to the jury would be, to say, "All this is some evidence of agency; what I must say to you is to point out what I consider to be the reasons that have led to the law being established in this way;" in the present case the particular consideration would be, whether or no the agent had been doing so much for the candidate, whether there was so much commodum done that it would be just (using the Latin phrase quoted by Mr. Rodwell) to impose the onus upon him; I think I could not define it better than that I should say to a jury, "It is a question of more or less; it is the extent to which it goes. If there is evidence to show that the party is acting for the member who is returned, then, I think, one should consider him to be an agent; if, taking the spirit and object of the rule, you think, bringing your common sense to bear upon it, that he was substantially an agent," I think that is all I could say to a jury; and then, as the Legislature have thought fit to make me both judge and jury, I must apply that guide as best I can myself. I at once see the great inconvenience of such a rule being laid down in this. If that be the proper guide to be taken, the law must be very uncertain. It is an old observation of Selden in his Table Talk upon Equity, as then administered, when there were no fixed rules, but according to the conscience of the Chancellor, that equity necessarily is as uncertain as a measure of length in which the writ was made the Chancellor's foot, because a Chancellor's conscience was as variable as the length of a Chancellor's foot; a remark with strong sense in it, and no doubt as applicable to the substantial common sense of an election judge as it was to the conscience of the Chancellor in those days. But I have been unable, after the best consideration I have been able to give to it, to devise any better rule. I shall be excessively glad, for my part, if the Legislature can find out a better rule and make an enactment to apply hereafter. I shall be excessively glad if other judges can discover a better rule. I have not yet been able to do so; but I must act as best I can, according to my light. Then we have to see upon this particular case what the evidence comes to, and that is not excessively great. The evidence, I think, establishes this, that there was a Conservative Association, of which Mr. Turle and Mr. Sheppard were two members who were called by the petitioners. And I may observe at once that I think, as regards Mr. Turle and Mr. Sheppard, who were undoubtedly partisans, and might be expected to be partisans, on Mr. Serjeant Cox's side, though they were inclined to get a little irritated and angry under cross-examination, I did not see the slightest ground for doubting that they both honestly spoke the whole truth to the best of their knowledge and belief. I daresay there were little inaccuracies in what they said, and perhaps there were some matters not clearly explained; but I saw no reason to induce me to suppose they were not speaking the truth as honest witnesses. From their evidence I gather this: that this association was formed as a body for the purpose principally of conducting the registration, and also for the purpose of conducting the election. Whence they got the funds, or how they got the funds, those gentlemen were not able to tell us with any precision. The parties who could have told us have not been called, and we cannot tell where they got the funds, but they did get funds, and those funds were deposited in a bank; and the arrangement with the bank, no doubt, was to honour cheques that were presented signed, I am not quite sure whether by three members, of whom Mr. Turle was one, or whether by any one of those three, or any two of those three; but I have no doubt that the fact was that cheques upon the balance at the bank were to be signed by two or more of those members. Mr. Turle did sign the two cheques which were applied to the purpose of making the payments on this occasion; and he, after being examined both by Mr. Serjeant Ballantine and myself, was unable to say when it was agreed that the money should be paid, or who it was gave the directions that it was to be paid. The result was, that I drew the conclusion that the fact was that, though he signed the cheques, he was not the active member managing the matter; that, though he signed the cheques, he was directed, I suppose, by the secretary, Mr. Clarke; and when Mr. Clarke, the secretary, told him that it was right to sign the cheque, he took it upon his word, and signed it. I mention that as pointing to the conclusion I should draw from what Mr. Turle said, who knew but little more about it than that money in November was advanced, though whether it was 25*l.*, or, as would appear to be indicated by the ticks on the book, about 50*l.*, one cannot precisely tell. I may observe that one thing that leads me to believe that Turle and Sheppard were properly and honestly fulfilling their duty as witnesses, is the way in which that book was produced. It was unknown to the petitioners. It was suggested that there was a book. Mr. Turle answered, with every appearance of sincerity, that there was such a book. He said, "It may or may not be at my house." Then he was asked to go and look for it; and he did go and look for it, and found it, and brought it. That at once produced the impression upon my mind that he was honestly telling the truth. Had he said, as a partisan witness might have said, that the book was lost or destroyed, I might have entertained a different view of the matter. I pass that by. Then we find that this association was formed; that they took a room at No. 2, Hammett-street. When they took it does not precisely appear. The landlord said they entered into possession in October. It appears that that must be inaccurate, or else they were twice occupying the room, because it appears from the evidence both of the man Trent, who was the messenger, and Mr. Cross, the printer, that there were some of these things done in this room just before the registration in September; and I think it seems probable, from what one of the other witnesses said, that the room was really taken in August, and not in October, and that Mr. Norman made a mistake in the time. It is not impossible that the higher rent of 1*l.* was to begin in October instead of August. At all events they took this room, and at this room at the time of the registration, and at the time of the election; and this much appears, that during the election, in that room the association did all those things which would commonly be done by a committee for promoting an election. They issued circulars; people met there, and sent out circulars; they circulated papers from there, and had messengers there. Now, all this was done by them in this way; and it appears distinctly enough that it was done openly, and must have been over a considerable time. They were known to be actively acting on the canvass in favour of Mr. Serjeant Cox, and there was every probability that Mr. Serjeant Cox and his agents would know it, from its being a matter that there was no secret about. Then, further, there is distinct evidence that at the time of the registration Mr. Cox's agents were aware of this association working there, and that they acted in concert with them, and helped them by sending circulars, and causing circulars to be printed, which were paid for by Mr. Sheppard. That does not come to very much, but it brings the thing to this point, which is the point upon which I think the important case turns. We have it that this body are acting as canvassers for Mr. Cox, actively acting in promoting the election at this time, and that fact, I think, we must fairly take it, was known to him and his people. Now does that, without taking any more, raise a primâ facie case which would call for an answer? I think it does. I think when it appears that things are done openly in that way, which in the ordinary course of things would not be done, except with the cognisance of a candidate who sanctioned them, the fair and natural inference, in the absence of proof to the contrary, would be that they were done by a person acting as agent for the candidate. If that be so, then there is some evidence arising upon that, and the principle of the chimney sweep's case, Armory v. Delamirie, 1 Smith's Leading Cases, at once applies very strongly. I am very far, indeed, from thinking that that evidence which I have mentioned would be conclusive at all. I think it was quite open to Mr. Cox himself and his agent to have been called to show that they had no communication with that body; that they repudiated it, and if that repudiation was bonâ fide, they would not certainly be responsible for their acts. I should be sorry to lay down, for example, that every liberal candidate in London should be responsible for the acts of the Reform League. Many similar cases might be supposed. The candidate may show that the body acting in that way was acting officiously for him, as I may call it, that it was not with his consent, and was against his will; but the presumption does arise, I think, that it was done in his favour, done for him, unless there be something to show the contrary. Then, taking it, as I said before, as a matter of common sense, looking to the substantial degree to which they went, I think the degree goes very far. I think, in this case, such a degree of benefit would be derived from their assistance, that their assistance was so important to the candidate, that it fairly establishes this, that if he took their assistance, did not hold them off or repudiate them, he must abide the consequences, and be responsible for their malpractices. And, coming to that conclusion, it does establish this, I think, that the election of Mr. Serjeant Cox cannot stand, for this reason, that I think it is shown that those who were his agents were guilty of bribery in giving money with the intent to induce voters to vote.

The scrutiny being unopposed, a sufficient number of votes of the classes already declared bad were struck off, and

BLACKBURN, J. said:—My certificate will be that Mr. Serjeant Cox is unseated, and that Mr. James ought to have been seated, and ought to have been returned, and should be returned now.

Common Law Courts.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

Reported by W. GRAHAM and M. W. MCKELLAR, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Saturday, June 26.

ROBERTS v. THE BURY IMPROVEMENT COMMISSIONERS.

Right to begin—Contract, construction of—Right of employers to determine contract in default of contractor making due progress, and using due diligence in the opinion of employers' architects.

In the case of cross-demurrers it is the practice of the Court of Common Pleas to let the plaintiff begin.

The plaintiff contracted to erect certain works by a stipulated day, and it was agreed that the defendants' architect should have power, if he saw fit, to suspend the progress of the works, or to add to the works originally contemplated. Power was also given to the architect to enlarge the time for completion if he thought it necessary. Power was reserved to the defendants to determine the contract, and enter on the works, if the plaintiff did not, in the opinion of the architect, use due diligence, and make due progress so as to complete the works by the day stipulated. The architect made some delay in furnishing the original plans, and subsequently made considerable additions to them. He did not, however, enlarge the time for completion. Before the completion of the works, and before the day fixed by the contract for completion, the architect reported to the defendants that the plaintiff was not using due diligence, or making sufficient progress, so as to complete by the time originally agreed upon. The defendants accordingly gave the plaintiff notice that they determined the contract, and they then entered and took possession of the works:

Held, on an action for refusing to permit the plaintiff to complete the performance of his contract, and wrongfully preventing and discharging him from completing the same, and wholly, wrongfully, and finally renouncing the said contract, that the decision of the architect, that the plaintiff was not in his opinion using due diligence, and making due progress with the works, was final between the parties, and that it afforded a justification to the defendants for the course they took.

The declaration stated that the defendants were, under the provisions of the Act in that behalf, duly constituted as a burial board, and that on the 2nd Oct. 1866 an agreement was made between them and the plaintiff, by which, after reciting that the defendants were desirous of forming a burial ground with certain buildings thereon, and that the plaintiff had tendered for the erection of the said buildings for a certain sum, which tender the defendants had accepted, the plaintiff bound himself within the time, according to the plans and drawings, in the manner and pursuant and subject to all and singular the terms, stipulations, provisions, obligations, and conditions contained in a certain specification and schedule of quantities annexed to the said agreement, for the said sum or such varied sums as in the said specification mentioned and provided, to make, construct, complete, and deliver up the said works comprised in this agreement and the schedules thereto annexed; and, in consideration of the plaintiff's binding himself as aforesaid, the defendants promised and agreed with the plaintiff that, he (the plaintiff) from time to time well and truly executing, observing and performing, fulfilling, submitting to, and keeping all things on his part to be executed, &c., they would pay the plaintiff the sum to become due to him, and that they would well and truly execute, observe, and perform all things in this agreement and in the said specification and schedule to be executed, observed, and performed by them. Averment that, in the said specification contained in the said schedule, there were thirty-six conditions, seventeen of which are for convenience hereinafter set forth: that all things have happened, &c. Breach, that before the time for the performance and completion of the said contract by the plaintiff, the defendants wholly, finally, and wrongfully refused to suffer or permit the plaintiff to complete the performance of the said contract on his part, and wholly, finally, and wrongfully prevented and discharged the plaintiff from completing the same, and wholly, finally, and wrongfully renounced the said contract on the defendant's part, whereby, &c.

The following are the material parts of the seventeen conditions above referred to as appended to the declaration:

Condition 22:

That the said contractor (the plaintiff) shall without recompense, claim or demand, delay or suspend the progress of the works or any part thereof, if and when and so often as he shall be so required by the said architect (meaning thereby the architect engaged by the defendants to superintend the works) or his clerk, assistant or inspector, and for such time or times as may in the judgment of the said architect or his clerk, assistant, or inspector be necessary for the purpose or advantage of the undertaking, and shall whenever directed by the said architect or his said clerk, assistant or inspector, and upon all other needful occasions at his own expense, properly cover down and secure so much of the said works as may be liable to sustain injury from weather or otherwise, and shall at all times during the continuance of his contract, and forthwith when required, properly make good any damage or injury, which such works or any part thereof may sustain, to the full satisfaction of the said architect.

Condition 24:

Provided always, that if by reason of any additions to or enlargements of the works (which additions or enlargements, the said architect is hereby authorised to make) as for any other just cause arising with the said burial board, or with the architect or his clerk, assistant, or inspector, or in consequence of any unusual inclemency of weather or for want, or for alleged want or deficiency of any orders, drawings, or directions, or by reason of any difficulties, impediments, obstructions, oppositions, doubts, disputes, or differences whatsoever and howsoever occasioned, the contractor shall, in the opinion of the architect, have been unduly delayed or impeded in the completion of his contract, it shall be lawful for the said architect to grant, from time to time, by writing under his hand, such extension of time, and to assign such other day or days for completion as to him may seem reasonable, without thereby prejudicing or in any manner affecting the validity of the contract, or the sufficiency in the tender; and any and every such extension of time shall be deemed to be in full compensation and satisfaction for or in respect of any and every actual and probable loss or injury sustained or sustainable by the said contractor in the premises, and shall in like manner exonerate him from any claim or demand on the part of the said burial board, for or in respect of the delay occasioned by the cause or causes, in respect of which any and every such extension of time shall have been made, but not further or otherwise, or for or in respect of any delay continued beyond the time mentioned in such writing or writings respectively.

Condition 27:

That it shall be lawful for the said burial board, in case the said contractor shall fail in the due performance of any part of the undertaking, or shall become bankrupt or insolvent, or shall compound with his creditors, or propose any composition to his creditors for the settlement of their debts, or shall carry on, or propose to carry on his business under inspectors on behalf of his creditors, or shall commit any act of bankruptcy, or shall not, in the opinion and according to the determination of the said architect, exercise due diligence and make such due progress as would enable the works to be effectually and efficiently completed at the time and in the manner aforesaid, to determine the contract by a notice in writing under the hand of the clerk of the burial board, and to enter upon and take possession of the said works, and of the plant, tools, and materials of the said contractor, and use or sell, or use and sell the same as the absolute property of the burial board.

Condition 29:

That in case the said contractor shall fail in the due performance of his contract by and at the time or times hereinbefore mentioned or referred to, or at other the day or days to which the period of completion may have been extended, he shall be liable to pay to the said burial board a certain sum of money as and for liquidated damages.

Condition 34:

That in case any doubts, disputes, or differences arising or happening touching or concerning the said erections, or buildings, or any of them, or relating to the quantities, quality, descriptions, or manner of work done and executed, or to be done and executed by the said contractor, or to the quantity or quality of the materials to be employed therein, or in respect of any additions, deductions, alterations, or deviations made in, to or from the said works, or any of them, or touching or concerning the meaning or intention of this specification, or any part thereof, or of the contract entered into by and between the said burial board and the said contractor, or any plans, drawings, instructions, or directions referred to in this specification, or the contract, or which may be furnished or given during the progress of the works, or touching or concerning any certificate, order, or award which may have been made by the said architect, or in anywise whatsoever relating to the interest of the said burial board, or of the said contractor in the premises, such doubts, disputes, or differences shall from time to time be referred to the settlement, and be settled and decided by the said architect. And the said architect shall not be required or be compellable by any proceeding whatsoever by the contractor at law or in equity, or otherwise to answer or explain any matter touching or relating to any certificate or award made by him, or to state or show how, or why, or in what manner, or on what grounds he settled, ascertained, or determined, or omitted to settle, ascertain, or determine any matter whatsoever; nor shall he be required or be compellable in any way to state or give his reasons for any proceeding whatsoever which he may take or direct to be taken in or about the premises; nor shall he be required or be compellable to produce or show to any person or persons, or for any purpose whatever, any plans, drawings, or documents whatsoever, or any calculations or measurements in his possession or power.

Condition 36:

The whole of the works are to be completed on or before the 2nd Oct. 1868.

To this the defendants pleaded:

3. That the plaintiff failed in the due performance of certain parts of his undertaking, and did not, in the opinion and according to the determination of the said architect, and within the meaning of the said agreement, exercise due diligence and make such due progress as provided in and by the said twenty-seventh clause above mentioned, and as would have enabled the said works to be effectually and efficiently completed at the time and in the manner by the said alleged agreement provided. And all things happened, &c., necessary to entitle the defendants, under and according to the provisions of the said alleged agreement, to give the notice and to proceed in the manner hereinafter mentioned; and thereupon the defendants did duly serve upon the plaintiff a notice in writing under the hand of the clerk of the defendants as such burial board.

The plea then set out the notice whereby the defendants determined the contract.

And the defendants say that they thereupon accordingly determined the said contract, and took possession of the said works, and of the plant, tools, and materials of the plaintiff as by the said twenty-seventh clause provided. And the defendants further say that the said determination of the said contract, and the said taking possession of the said works and of the said plant, tools, and materials are the matters by the plaintiff in the said first count complained of, and not otherwise.

Digitized by Google

Second replication to the said third plea:

That the said architect did not at any time grant an extension of time for the performance and completion of the said contract, and that the alleged failure of the plaintiff and the non-exercise by the plaintiff of such due diligence, and the not making by the plaintiff of such due progress, were caused and occasioned by the acts and orders, and the neglects, defaults, and hindrances of the defendants and their said architect, and by breaches of the said contract by the defendants, and not otherwise.

Third replication to the said third plea:

That the alleged failure by the plaintiff in the third plea mentioned and the non-exercise by the plaintiff of due diligence as therein alleged, and the not making by the plaintiff of such due progress as therein alleged, were wholly caused and occasioned by reason of causes, matters, and things provided for in and by the said 24th clause, by reason whereof the plaintiff was, in fact (and in the opinion of the said architect), unduly delayed and impeded in the completion of the said contract. And all conditions were performed, &c., necessary to entitle him, the plaintiff, to have granted to him by the said architect an extension of time, and to have another day assigned for completion of the said contract. Nevertheless the said architect wholly failed and neglected to grant any extension of time whatever to the plaintiff, or to assign any other day or days whatever for the completion of the said contract by the plaintiff.

Fourth replication to the said third plea:

That the plaintiff repeats the several statements in the said third replication mentioned with the exception of the words "and in the opinion of the said architect."

To the second replication to the third plea, the defendants rejoined:—

That the non-exercise by the plaintiff of such due diligence as therein mentioned, and the not making by the plaintiff of such due progress as therein mentioned were not in the opinion or according to the determination of the said architect caused and occasioned by the acts and orders, and by the neglects, defaults, and hindrances of the defendants and their said architect, and by breaches of the said contract by the defendants.

And for a third rejoinder to the said second replication:—

The defendants repeat the statements in the next preceding rejoinder mentioned, and further say the said opinion and determination of the architect was formed and arrived at upon and after due, reasonable, proper, and bona fide consideration of the facts and circumstances relating to such failure, and non-exercise of due diligence.

Demurrer to the said second replication on the ground, that it is no legal answer to the defendant's third plea, for that such a replication admits that, in the opinion and according to the determination of the architect, the plaintiff had not exercised due diligence, or made due progress, and such opinion and determination entitled the defendants to put an end to the contract.

Demurrer to the third replication, on the ground that it only alleges facts which would have justified the architect in giving extended time for the execution of the contract works, but fails to allege that the architect did give such extended time according to the contract.

Demurrer to the fourth replication on the same grounds.

Joinder in demurrers.

Demurrer to the second rejoinder to the second replication to the third plea to the first count, on the ground that the opinion of the architect affords no answer to the statements contained in the second replication.

Demurrer to the third rejoinder, on the ground that the opinion of the architect affords no answer to the statements contained in the second replication, though he acted bonâ fide and after consideration of the circumstances.

Joinder in demurrer to plaintiff's demurrer to the rejoinders.

The plaintiff's points were: First, that the second replication is good, and the rejoinders to it bad, on the ground that, if the defendants, by their own acts, defaults, or the acts and defaults of their servants, prevented the plaintiff from being in a position to complete the works by the day fixed, they cannot afterwards turn round upon the plaintiff, and take advantage of their own acts and defaults to put an end to the contract; that it is immaterial what the opinion or determination of the architect may have been, if the plaintiff was in fact so prevented. Secondly, that the third and fourth replications are good, on the grounds that the granting of an extension of time by the architect is not the only condition or circumstance which would relieve the plaintiff from completing the works within the time originally fixed; and that the neglect of the architect to grant an extension of time, when in fact and in his opinion or when in fact the plaintiff had been unduly delayed, cannot entitle the defendants to take advantage of their own delay, and put an end to the contract. The non-extension of the time leaves the parties in the same position as if there had been no provision such as that contained in the twenty-fourth condition.

The defendants' points were: First. That the third plea is a good answer to the first count, on the ground that it alleges facts bringing the case within the 27th clause of the conditions of the contract, and entitling the defendants to determine such contract, and it shows that the defendants did determine the contract accordingly. Secondly. That the said second replication is not a good answer to such third plea, on the ground that it admits that, according to the architect's opinion and determination the plaintiff had not exercised due diligence, &c., or if such replication is good then the second and third rejoinders are, or either of them is a good answer thereto, because such rejoinders show affirmatively, that in the opinion, &c., of the architect, the non-exercise of due diligence, &c., on the part of the plaintiff was not caused by any such matter as alleged by way of excuse in the second replication. Thirdly. That the said second replication is further bad because it shows that there was no extension of time given by the architect within the 24th clause, and by such clause the architect was the person to determine whether the plaintiff was entitled on any ground to such extension of time. Fourthly, that the said third replication is no answer to the said third plea, because at best such replication only alleges facts which might have justified the architect in giving an extension of time, but fails to show that he did in fact give such extension. Fifthly, that the fourth replication is no answer to the third plea, for, in addition to the grounds of objection last mentioned, it fails to show that the architect thought that the plaintiff was entitled to an extension of time. Sixthly, the defendants will contend generally that, under the contract in question, it was for the architect to decide whether the plaintiff had failed in due diligence, &c., so as to entitle the defendants to determine the contract; and, it appearing that the architect was of opinion, &c., that the plaintiff had failed and no collusion or mala fides being suggested, the architect's determination is conclusive. Seventhly, that the defendants are entitled to the judgment of the court on the demurrers to the said second, third, and fourth replications, and to the said second and third rejoinders.

Holker, Q.C. (Chas. Russell with him), for the defendants, claimed the right to begin, the defendants having demurred first.

WILLES, J.—Where there are cross-demurrers, it is the practice in this court for the plaintiff to begin.

Manisty (R. G. Williams with him), for the plaintiff.—Two questions are raised upon the pleadings. 1st. Whether the defendants had a right to take the work out of the hands of the plaintiff, the plaintiff not being able to complete by the stipulated day, and not making sufficient progress in order to complete by the stipulated day, owing to the extra work put upon him by the defendants. 2nd. Assuming that the architect was of opinion that the extra work put upon the plaintiff did not entitle him to further time, whereas, in fact, it did prevent him from completing by that time, though the architect thought it ought not, whether under these circumstances the defendants had the right to take the works out of the plaintiff's hands. As a matter of fact there was considerable delay on the part of the architect in furnishing plans, drawings, &c., and he subsequently imposed a considerable quantity of work beyond that specified in the contract, on the plaintiff. If these acts on the part of the architect did, as a matter of fact, render it impossible for the contractor to complete by the appointed day, then the obligation to complete by that day was gone, and the defendants had no right to take the works out of his hands. The meaning of the twenty-fourth condition is this: if in the opinion of the architect the imposition of extra work did prevent the plaintiff from finishing by the appointed day, then the architect is to have power to name another day instead, and all the conditions of the contract, in so far as they related to the day first named, would apply to the substituted day. Holme v. Guppy, 3 M. & W. 387, is in favour of the plaintiff's contention; so is Russell v. Da Bandeira, 13 C. B., N. S., 149. Erle, C. J., in giving judgment in the latter case (p. 202), says, "On the part of the defendant an attempt has been made to set-off against any demand which Mr. Russell might be able to substantiate against him a claim for penalties incurred under the claim in the contract, which provides that if the vessel should not be launched and delivered at the stipulated time, fitted and completed, as agreed, the plaintiff should forfeit 5*l.* per day by way of liquidated damages. Now the vessel was not delivered until a very considerable time after the day mentioned in the contract. But it is found by the arbitrator that the extra time required for the execution of the work comprised in the accounts A and B caused a delay in the whole of about six weeks in the progress of the shipbuilding. The days consumed by this delay so occasioned by the requirements of the defendant, and those employed by him, do not come within the penalty clause . . . . The case of Holme v. Guppy decides, that where a contractor undertakes, under pain of a certain penalty or forfeiture, to perform a work within a given time, and the performance within the time is prevented by the act of the party with whom he contracts, the contractor is exonerated from the penalties." In Westwood v. Secretary of State for India (7 L. T. Rep. N. S. 736; and 1 New R. 262), Wightman, J., says, "As to the set-off of the penalties, I am of opinion that the plaintiffs are not liable to them; even although the engineer did not think it necessary to extend the time for the completion of the works, as the plaintiffs aver that the act of the defendant rendered the completion within the appointed time impossible, and that too, to his knowledge. It would be so entirely unreasonable, that they should be liable under such circumstances, that we are bound so to construe the contract as to avoid such a conclusion." And Crompton, J., says, "It can never be said that these penalties accrued. If it had depended on the extension of time alone, I should have thought it was entirely in the discretion of the engineer; but when I find an allegation in the replication that the defendant ordered alterations, which rendered it impossible to complete the original work in the specified time, that is an answer to the claim for penalties. I think Holme v. Guppy, and the other authorities, are sufficient to entitle us to say, that, where the act, on the non-performance of which the penalty is to accrue, is prevented by the party complaining, the penalty does not attach." When the architect gave extra work to be done, the contract was ipso facto gone, so far as the stipulated day was concerned, and the architect was bound to use the power given to him by the contract to name a new day. The fact that the architect has power given to him to suspend the works for twelve months if he saw fit, shows that it was intended that in any such case the time should be extended.

Digitized by Google

Holker (C. Russell with him) for defendants.—A case of this kind depends on the true construction of the contract. It was undoubtedly competent to the parties to leave the determination of any question that might arise between them to the architect, and if they did so they must abide by his decision. The plaintiff agreed to abide by the decision of the architect, but now that that decision is against him, he seeks to appeal against it. The plaintiff's replications simply amount to this: that the architect might have granted more time, and though he did not do so, he ought to have done so. There is nothing to show in Westwood v. The Secretary of State for India, that the parties had agreed, as here, to make the engineer the sole arbitrator between them, as to whether the plaintiff had incurred penalties or not. Stadhard v. Lee, 7 L. T. Rep. N. S. 850; 32 L. J. 75, Q. B., is directly in favour of the defendants. There Cockburn, C. J. said: "We quite agree that stipulations and conditions of this kind should, where the language of the contract admits of it, receive a reasonable construction; as it is to be assumed that the party, in whose favour such a clause is inserted, meant to secure only what was reasonable and just. And we therefore entirely accede to the propriety of the decision in Dallman v. King, 4 Bing. N. C. 105; 7 L. J., N. S., 6, C. P. But we are equally clear that where from the whole tenor of the agreement it appears that, however unreasonable and oppressive a stipulation or condition may be, the one party intended to insist upon, and the other to submit to it, a court of justice cannot do otherwise than give full effect to the terms which have been agreed upon between the parties. . . . If these terms had been ever so unreasonable, we should have felt bound to give effect to them, and to hold that so long as the defendants were acting bonâ fide, under an honest sense of dissatisfaction, although that dissatisfaction might be ill-founded and unreasonable, they were entitled to insist on the condition, and consequently that the replication, which only alleges that their dissatisfaction was unreasonable and capricious, but which stops short of alleging mala fides in the defendants in acting as is stated in the plea, is insufficient." That is precisely this case. If mala fides were charged against the architect, or collusion between him and the defendants, it would be another question. After having left everything to the architect's decision, it is not open to either party to dispute it on any other ground. [WILLES, J.—The architect might have come to a wrong conclusion in favour of the plaintiff. Could the defendants have pleaded to an action brought against them, that he wrongfully did so? You may take it for granted that, if the architect did what he did within the scope of his powers, the defendants are justified.] Can there be any doubt on the construction of the contract, that the parties intended to make the architect the sole judge between them? He cited also

Clark v Watson, 34 L. J. 148, C. P.; 11 L. T. Rep. N. S. 679;

Scott v. The Corporation of Liverpool, 27 L. J. 64, Ch.

Manisty in reply.—Supposing that the 24th condition were not found in the agreement, then the case would stand thus: Extra work is given so as to prevent the contractor finishing by the appointed day; therefore the obligation to complete by that day is gone. What then is the effect of the 24th condition? That in such an event the architect should have power to enlarge the time, retaining all the other conditions of the contract. The plaintiff's case is that he never agreed to submit to the arbitration of the architect, as the defendants contend he did. The notice sent by the defendants to the plaintiff amounts simply to this: "You are not making sufficient progress and using sufficient diligence to finish the works by the 2nd Oct. 1868" (the day originally fixed). The plaintiff's contention is that at the time this notice was sent to him, he was under no obligation to complete by the 2nd Oct. 1868. That obligation expired as soon as extra work was imposed upon him.

Digitized by Google

WILLES, J.—The question raised by these pleadings is, whether it is competent for the plaintiff, notwithstanding the decision of the architect, to contend that the time had not arrived at which the defendants would have been justified in entering upon and taking the works in accordance with the powers reserved to them by the 22nd condition, and so depriving the plaintiff of the benefit which he had a right to expect from the fulfilment of his contract. The answer to this question depends on the construction which we put upon the specification annexed to the contract, and mainly to the 27th condition. This condition must be construed with reference to the conditions before and after it, but as to what are the rights of the parties, these are determined by the condition having reference to the special matter rather than by general inferences drawn from other conditions. Now, it is evident that the plaintiff was content to place great reliance on the good faith of the architect. In this 27th clause we find a number of acts enumerated, on the happening of any one of which the powers reserved to the defendants of determining the contract and entering on the works arose. One of these enumerated contingencies is, if the contractor "shall not in the opinion and according to the determination of the said architect exercise due diligence," &c. This default is put on the same footing with becoming bankrupt, and the other specific acts referred to in the condition. It is not necessary to refer to the distinction between the time originally specified for the completion of the contract and the time extended by the architect pursuant to the powers reserved to him in the 24th condition. In this 27th clause we have a judge agreed upon to determine whether the plaintiff was using sufficient diligence and making sufficient progress, and the powers reserved to the defendants by the 27th condition are made dependant on (amongst other things) the fact that, in the opinion and determination of the judge thus constituted, there was a want of diligence and progress. The clause gives power to the defendants, on receiving this report from the architect to enter. The third plea is evidently founded on the 27th condition, and it does not allege as a fact that there was on the part of the plaintiff such want of diligence, &c., but it states that in the opinion of the architect there was. The plea then goes on to state that a notice was given, the defendants subsequently entered, which is the breach complained of. It appears to me that the plea is good as founded on the true meaning of the 27th condition. Is it then answered by any replication? In the second replication, the plaintiff sets up against the opinion of the architect, the fact that he had been delayed and hindered by the extra work imposed upon him. Is that an answer? In order to settle this question one must look to the rest of the contract to see what powers were given to the architect. The fourth condition gives him power to vary or alter the original plans or instructions or order any further or other works beyond those originally contemplated. What then is the consequence of any delay on the part of the architect in furnishing plans, or of any subsequent variation of these plans? This is provided for by the twenty-fourth condition, which says that, in any such case, it shall be lawful for the architect to grant "such extension of time and to assign such other day or days for completion as to him may seem reasonable." It seems then that all matters relied upon in answer to the plea, are matters which the architect ought to have taken into consideration before reporting to the defendants. The replication virtually says, "There were circumstances which ought to have had an effect on the architect's mind different to what they actually had." It is then, as the counsel for the defendants put it, an appeal from the architect's decision. I am of opinion that this replication is bad. I come now to the third replication. This merely sets up matter which ought to have been acted upon by the architect. Another objection to be made to it is, that it shows no reason why the architect should not have come to the conclusion that there was not due diligence. If the contractor had been using due diligence and making proper progress, that ought to have been considered by the architect. This replication cannot be sustained. Besides, the opinion of the architect might have varied from time to time. He might change his mind. If the third fails, the fourth fails also. Coming now to the plaintiff's authorities, I do not in the least wish to impugn them. But there is this broad distinction between those cases and the present one, that in them the penalty, which was expunged by the conduct of those who employed the contractor, was to depend upon the happening of an event, viz., the failure to complete by a given day; and there the failure was due to the fault, not of the contractor, but of those who employed him, and who would, if the penalty had been exacted, have reaped the benefit of it. But in the present case the penalty was to accrue, not on negligence in fact, but on negligence in the opinion of the architect. This is the distinction between the present case and those cited for the plaintiff. It is impossible for us, after the architect has said there was want of diligence and progress, to say that there was not, and override his decision and its consequences. Our judgment must be for the defendants.

M. SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. I fully concur in the judgment of my learned brother, and as he has gone into the matter so fully, I have but little to add. The question mainly depends on the construction we put upon the 27th condition. The defendants have power given them by that condition to determine the contract on the happening of any of certain events. One of them is, that the contractor shall not "in the opinion of the said architect" make progress, &c. As a matter of fact, the plaintiff did not, in the opinion of the architect make due progress, and use due diligence. How then can it be contended that the defendants were not justified in acting as they did, on receiving the opinion of the architect? The answer given is, that the plaintiff's failure to make due progress arose from the extra work imposed upon him. Is this an issue to be determined by a jury? I think not. If we look to the 24th condition, it appears to me that the parties intended to make the architect judge and umpire between them, and neither is in a position to impugn his decision. It was the intention of the parties to leave all to his determination. The 4th condition gives large powers to the architect by way of alteration of, and addition to, the original scheme, and the 24th gives him power to extend the time for completion; as to the necessity of which he is to be judge. If this clause stood alone, there might be a foundation for the plaintiff's argument, but the 27th condition expressly leaves the question to be settled by the architect. To refer it to another tribunal would be to appeal from the architect to a jury. The architect has power to extend the time in case of inclemency of the weather. But could the question be put to a jury whether the inclemency of the weather ought to have entitled the plaintiff to an extension of time, when the architect had already decided it ought not? The cases cited for the plaintiff are quite distinguishable from this. In Westwood v. The Secretary of State for India, there was no clause like the 27th condition in this case, giving the defendant the right to determine the contract on the information of the architect. The parties in this case gave the architect power to take a certain course. The architect then was bound to take all the circumstances into consideration—his own acts and those of others—and shape his course accordingly. It is quite consistent to imagine that on some grounds the architect might have thought the plaintiff entitled to an extension of time, while he might at the same time have thought that the petitioner was not on the whole using due dilligence or making due progress.

Digitized by Google

Judgment for the defendants.

Shaw and Tremellen, attorneys for plaintiff.

Gregory, Rowcliffe, and Rawle, attorneys for defendants.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

Reported by H. LEIGH and E. LUMLEY, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

May 8 and June 3.

COX v. LEE.

Libel—Charge of ingratitude—Statement of facts on which charge is founded—Imputation of pecuniary difficulties—Libel or no libel—Question for jury—When it may be withdrawn from them.

It is libellous, and affords good cause of action as such, to charge another with ingratitude, even though the facts upon which the charge is grounded be stated, and are insufficient to support the charge.

So held by the Court of Exchequer (Kelly, C.B. and Bramwell, Channell, and Pigott, BB.)

And per Kelly, C.B., to impute untruly pecuniary embarrassment to another, and the inability to purchase a certain property without the aid of a loan from a third party is libellous; even although it be at the same time stated that the loan was afterwards honourably repaid.

A judge is only justified in withdrawing the question of "libel or no libel" from the jury in cases where he is clearly of opinion that, if they were to find the matter a libel, their verdict would be set aside by the court above. (Per Kelly, C.B.)

The first count of the declaration was on a libel falsely and maliciously printed and published in a certain newspaper, called the Leicester Mail, by the defendant, of and concerning the plaintiff as proprietor and publisher of a certain newspaper called the Leicester Advertiser, in the words following:

That the Advertiser (meaning the plaintiff) should disparage Mr. Frewen is hardly accounted for by a little incident related the other night to his constituents by Mr. Frewen, except that that excellent educator of the people adds, to numerous other virtues not mentioned in the Litany, that which all true Englishmen abominate most—ingratitude.

The second count was on another libel, falsely and maliciously printed and published in the Leicester Mail by the defendant of the plaintiff, in relation to his being proprietor and publisher of the said newspaper, called the Leicester Advertiser. The libel set out in this count was an account of a public meeting held at Leicester, and which was addressed by Mr. Frewen as a candidate for the representation in Parliament of the Northern Division of the County of Leicester, and at which meeting Mr. Frewen, after some preliminary observations, spoke as follows:

He would now draw their attention to an article which appeared in the Leicester Advertiser of Saturday last (meaning an article published by the plaintiff in the said newspaper, called the Leicester Advertiser) and he would read them the following extracts:

"After the unsuccessful attempts of Mr. Frewen, in some of which we accorded him our support, to obtain one of the seats of the Northern Division, we feel impelled to state our opinion that his indiscretion, in making the present attempt, can have no other effect than that of disquieting the Conservative ranks, and of affording to the opposite political party an opportunity of testing their strength at the Conservative cost, and of gaining probably additional influence in that part of the country.

"There is no difference of sentiment on the Protestant Church question between the three candidates, and as Mr. Clowes has received so pressing and numerously signed a requisition to come forward as a candidate, while no public invitation has, so far as we are aware, been given to Mr. Frewen, we trust that that gentleman will yet reconsider the matter and save the Northern Division of the county from the excitement incidental to a contested election. The influential meetings at Loughborough and Melton, where it was unanimously resolved that Lord John Manners and Mr. John Clowes should be the recognised candidates in the Conservative interest, distinctly point to the issue of the contest, should one take place, and as unmistakeably indicate the course that Mr. Frewen should take, viz., to withdraw his name from the list of candidates for the representation of the Northern Division of Leicestershire."

Such a statement was most ungrateful on the part of Mr. Cox (meaning thereby the plaintiff), who would never have been proprietor of that journal but for the help he (Mr. Frewen) had given. (Cries of shame.) He (meaning thereby the plaintiff) was in a great strait, and asked him (the speaker) to assist him. He would certainly say that the debt had been most honourably repaid, and he would never have mentioned it but for such ungrateful conduct on the part of Mr Cox (meaning thereby the plaintiff).

The third count was on another libel, falsely and maliciously printed and published in the Loughborough Monitor, by the defendant of and concerning the plaintiff, as proprietor and publisher of the said Leicester Advertiser, in the words following, that is to say: "North Leicestershire Election. A meeting of Mr. Frewen's supporters was held at the George Hotel, on Wednesday evening the 23rd ultimo, and published in the Leicester Mail last Saturday. Some reference was then made by the speaker to Mr. Penn Cox" (meaning thereby the plaintiff), "which he complains is not true, and the same evening the proprietor of the Mail" (meaning thereby the defendant) "received a letter from his solicitors" (meaning thereby the plaintiff's solicitors), "of which the following is a copy:

"Leicester, Sept. 25th, 1868.

"Sir" (meaning the defendant),—"In your report of the meeting of Mr. Frewen's supporters at the George Hotel, on Wednesday last, an allusion is made to Mr. Penn Cox" (meaning the plaintiff), "which can have nothing to do with the election, and could only have been inserted out of personal malice to Mr. Cox, as there is not one word of truth in Mr. Frewen's statement respecting the purchase of the Advertiser, while the report is calculated to do Mr. Cox serious injury. It is his intention at once to commence an action, which will give Mr. Frewen and himself an opportunity of meeting in the witness box. We have no wish to put you to any personal annoyance in the service of the writ, so be good enough to hand this letter over to your attorney, who can receive the process for you. Your obedient servant, FREER and BREVE.

"Mr Thomas Wm. Rotting Lee.

"On the receipt of the above I communicated to Mr. Frewen the substance of that letter, and have much pleasure in giving our readers his reply to me this morning:

"Cold Overton Hall, Sept. 28, 1868.

"Dear Sir,—I have read your report in the Mail as to what I said on Wednesday evening last with reference to Mr. Penn Cox" (meaning the plaintiff); "and though I don't think I made use of the exact expression that your reporter has attributed to me, yet the report is calculated to convey to anyone who has not got a twist in his intellect the substance of my meaning, which was this—that when Mr. P. Cox" (meaning the plaintiff) "wanted to purchase the Advertiser (meaning the said newspaper called the Leicester Advertiser) "he had not the means to pay for it, and he made more than one or two urgent applications to me for assistance, and I did assist him to the amount he asked me to do, which really was most honourably repaid, but yet I didn't think Mr. Cox" (meaning the plaintiff) "had shown his gratitude to me for what I had done for him. I am not aware that there is anything libellous in saying that a man was in a great strait about ten years ago, and that he had, as far as I know, met all his engagements and paid everybody. If Mr. Reeve thinks that this is libellous let him bring an action against me on the part of Mr. Cox," (meaning the plaintiff) "and I will defend it, and not try to harass an inoffensive man like yourself" (meaning thereby the defendant), "whose only crime appears to be that you were bold enough to start that cheap and independent paper the Leicester Mail. Of course, you know that no action can be proceeded with at this time of the year, it being the Long Vacation.—I am, dear Sir, yours faithfully,

Digitized by Google

"Mr. T. W. R. Lee. C. H. Frewen."

To this declaration the defendant pleaded, 1. not guilty; 2. a justification; and thereupon issue was joined.

At the trial before Pigott, B. and a special jury, at the last spring assizes at Leicester, proof was given of the publication by the defendant of the libels charged in the declaration, and the following appeared to be the material facts with respect to them:—

The defendant was the proprietor and publisher of the Leicester Advertiser newspaper, and brought this action against the defendant, the proprietor of the Leicester Mail and the Loughborough Monitor newspapers, in respect of the alleged libels in question, published by the defendant in the last-mentioned newspapers.

For some years prior to 1857 the plaintiff had carried on and published the Leicester Advertiser, in partnership with one Cleveland, but in that year he dissolved partnership with Cleveland, and bought him out, paying a sum of 2050*l.* for the same. Upon this occasion, according to the evidence of the plaintiff, Mr. Frewen voluntarily offered pecuniary assistance to the plaintiff to enable him to buy the paper, which, however, the plaintiff stated he did not then want. Mr. Frewen, on the contrary, in his evidence on the part of the defendant, stating that the plaintiff at that time applied to him for a loan. As a fact, no money was then advanced by Frewen to the plaintiff. Some few years afterwards, however, viz., in 1863, the plaintiff being in want of pecuniary help to enable him to pay off a debt contracted by him, in the working of the paper, applied to and obtained from Frewen the loan of 300*l.* for that purpose, to be repaid by yearly instalments of 100*l.* each with interest at 5 per cent. In 1865 the plaintiff had repaid 150*l.* of the 300*l.* with the interest, and some time in that year previous to a then coming election, he had a private interview with Frewen on the subject of his candidateship for the county and, after remonstrating with him on some parts of his political conduct, strongly advised him not to offer himself as a candidate for the representation of the county. Frewen then applied for immediate payment of the balance of the 300*l.* loan, with which application the defendant complied, and paid the money. In his evidence in the witness box, the plaintiff denied entirely the truth of the statement that he had borrowed the money of Mr. Frewen to enable him to purchase the newspaper, or that without Frewen's help he would never have been the proprietor of it; but he admitted that when he borrowed the 300*l.* of Frewen in 1863 he wanted the money "to carry on the paper." Mr. Frewen, in his evidence, said he believed the plaintiff told him he "wanted the money to assist in purchasing the paper."

The learned judge defined the law, and left it to the jury to say whether the publication in question was or not, in their opinion, libellous. The jury found for the plaintiff, with 20*l.* damages, and in Easter Term last, a rule nisi was moved for and obtained by Bulwer, Q. C. on the part of the defendant, to arrest the judgment, or for a new trial on the ground that none of the counts in the declaration, or that some one or more of them do not, disclose any cause of action. Also on the ground of misdirection in that the learned judge ought to have directed the jury to find for the defendants on both the issues, and also on the ground that the verdict was against the weight of evidence, and that the damages were excessive.

May 8.—O'Malley, Q. C. Keane, Q. C. and Merewether, for the plaintiff, showed cause against the rule. It is said, contra, that the declaration discloses no ground of action; but to charge a man with "ingratitude" simply is a libel, and therefore the first count of the declaration is good: (Hoare v. Silverlock, 12 Q. B. 624.) The libels on which the second and third counts are grounded contain a direct attack and imputation upon the pecuniary and commercial credit of the plaintiff, to whom, as to everyone engaged in trade of any kind, his credit and pecuniary reputation is of the last importance; and it was a libel as false as it was injurious, there not being a word of truth in the imputation. True it is that facts on which the statement appears to be founded are stated, but so far from that lessening, it rather increased the injury, especially when it is seen that the facts are not correctly stated. There can be no doubt that such a charge furnishes a good cause of action: (Fray v. Fray, 17 C. B., N. S., 603; 34 L. J. 45, C. P.) The third count in effect reiterates the second.

June 3.—Bulwer, Q. C. and Barratt Jacques, for the defendant, contra, supported their rule.—Even if the first count, which charges ingratitude simply, be good, the two other counts cannot be supported, and therefore as the verdict was general there must be an arrest of judgment or a new trial. With respect to the second and third counts, the question is whether or not it is a libel to say of a man, "I lent him a sum of money to enable him to buy such and such a property, and he has honourably repaid me, but I do not think he was grateful to me afterwards in not supporting me at the election?" We apprehend that it is not. Surely the statement of the bare facts themselves, apart from the conclusions drawn from them, would not be libellous, for it would not be "calculated to injure the plaintiff's credit, or to expose him to hatred, contempt, or ridicule," which, to make it a libel, it should be, according to the definition of Parke, B. in Parmiter v. Coupland, 6 M. & W. 108. The statement that the plaintiff had honourably repaid the loan would rather, on the contrary, tend to raise him in public estimation. What then makes the statement libellous? It is said that Mr. Frewen's drawing his own conclusion from the facts makes the matter a libel; but if that conclusion was not a correct one from the facts stated, then it would be no libel; whilst, if his conclusion was a well warranted one from the facts, then the libel was justified. The case of Hoare v. Silverlock (ubi sup.), relied on by the plaintiff, is very wide of the present case. The libel here is not, as in that case, a charge of ingratitude as affecting the plaintiff's moral character, but simply with doing something which Mr. Frewen considered to be ungrateful. But at the very same time that Mr. Frewen complains of ungrateful conduct, the complaint is shown to be unfounded. It could not be ingratitude in the plaintiff to perform a public duty as a writer for the press, and no sinister or indirect motive is imputed to him. The case of Fray v. Fray (ubi sup.), relied on contra, would go too far if carried to the extent of the plaintiff's contention, and would establish that the question of libel or no libel could never, on any occasion, be decided by the court. We do not contend that the first count is bad in arrest of judgment; but as to the second and third counts, either the plea of justification was proved, or the charges relied on in those counts were not under the circumstances libellous, and so did not afford any good cause of action.

Digitized by Google

Kelly, C. B.—This rule was moved in arrest of judgment, on the ground that none of the counts in the declaration disclosed any cause of action. Now no doubt the verdict being for a lump sum as general damages, and not for damages apportioned to the different counts separately, if any one of the counts be bad the verdict cannot stand. We have, therefore, to determine not whether in point of fact a libel was published, but whether what was published has been stated in such a way as to render it compatible for the jury to find their verdict for the plaintiff, and give damages thereupon. The material allegation is, that when the plaintiff was desiring to purchase and set up a newspaper, he had no money of his own wherewith to effect his object, and therefore made several applications to Mr. Frewen for a pecuniary loan which was accorded to him, and which had been honourably repaid. I am of opinion that the matter there alleged is libellous. Without putting oneself in the position of the plaintiff at the time this statement was made, it is hardly possible, rightly and fairly to consider the question raised by it. Can there be a doubt that it would be exceedingly painful to the feelings of any man in the plaintiff's position in life to have such a statement concerning him made at a public meeting, in the very county in which he conducts and publishes his newspaper, and that, too, by a person like Mr. Frewen of considerable social standing and influence in the county? Passing by the bearing of the statement itself on the charge of ingratitude, and whether or not it would induce the hearers of it to conclude that a man who had so acted was truly guilty of ingratitude, surely to say of a man of business in independent circumstances, that before he could purchase the property now owned by him he was, being without the necessary means himself, obliged to borrow the money requisite for the purchase of a third person, is a statement which reflects on the man thus spoken of in a way likely to be not only most painful to his feelings, but injurious and disparaging to his credit and commercial reputation amongst his fellows and neighbours, and in the county generally. Anything in the nature of a charge against, or a doubt or suspicion concerning a man's pecuniary ability, particularly when published in a public newspaper, must have an injurious effect upon that man's position and reputation in the world. I cannot, therefore, looking at the position in life of the several parties, and the circumstances of the case generally, say that I think the damages awarded by the jury are at all excessive. But it was further urged by the learned counsel for the defendant that, in addition to the question whether or not the particular publication was libellous, it was for this court to say that the nature of the libel was such that it ought not to have been left to the jury, but to have been decided by the learned judge himself. But, in my opinion, a judge is only justified in withdrawing the question of libel or no libel from the consideration of the jury in where he is clearly of opinion that the matter complained of is not a libel, and that, if the jury were to find it a libel, their verdict would be set aside by the court above. In the present case I think my brother Pigott was fully warranted in leaving the question in the way he did to the jury, and that their verdict was strictly justified by the evidence. I am of opinion therefore that the defendant's rule should be discharged.

Bramwell, B.—I also am of opinion that this rule should be discharged. The libel, of which the plaintiff in his declaration complains, charges him with ingratitude, for although certain facts, on which that charge is afterwards grounded, are stated, yet nevertheless the plain and obvious meaning of the statement, alleged in the declaration, is to make the charge in question. Now it is admitted very properly, and, indeed, it is quite clear, that if a charge of ingratitude generally, and no more, were made against a man, and no reason for it were given, it would be libellous. That the first count, therefore, is valid is not questioned. But then with respect to the second and third counts, Mr. Bulwer has urged upon us that they contain no cause of action, because certain facts are stated showing what it is that Mr. Frewen called ingratitude, which facts show, at the same time, that in fact it was not ingratitude. On consideration, I do not think that that is so. It is true, doubtless, that the facts or reasons which induced Mr. Frewen to come to the conclusion that the plaintiff was ungrateful are stated by him, but nevertheless there is also the distinct charge of ingratitude made, and although the facts which were stated may not be sufficient to prove the charge of ingratitude against the plaintiff, yet anyone hearing or reading the statement might reasonably enough conclude and say that there were other matters behind which were not stated which would fully bear out the charge. But, if the facts are truly stated, I think the libels declared on not only contain the charge, but show the existence of ingratitude. It is easy to say that it is a patriot's duty, when an unfit person presents himself as a candidate for a public post, to proclaim his unfitness. But, like gratitude itself, this is a duty of imperfect obligation, and does not necessarily relieve him, who undertakes its performance, from liability to the charge of ingratitude. If having, after repeated urgent applications, obtained the desired loan from Mr. Frewen, the plaintiff had, without any further circumstance happening between them, withdrawn his political support from Mr. Frewen, and published in his newspaper a statement that the latter was not a fit person to stand for the representation of the county, would not that have been ungrateful? I think it would. But even if it was a duty incumbent on the plaintiff to call attention to Mr. Frewen's unfitness to be the county representative, surely he might have discharged that duty in a different manner, and one less calculated to bring Mr. Frewen's candidature into ridicule than that which he chose to adopt. It is not merely a qualified expression, or suggestion even of a possible doubt, but a direct and distinct charge of political unfitness and indiscretion. [His Lordship here read the article.] I think that it was an ungrateful thing for the plaintiff to write so of one from whom he had borrowed money, and to whom therefore he was under an obligation. In my opinion, however, the justification was not made out, and the argument on the part of the defendant fails on this ground, that the libel in the declaration contains both the charge and the proof of the existence of ingratitude. But then it is said that the libel was justified, because the statement made is true. I do not agree to that. Had all the facts been fully and truly stated it would have appeared from them that there was no ingratitude at all on the plaintiff's part, for it seems that Mr. Frewen, when told by the plaintiff that he could no longer afford him his support at the coming election, demanded repayment of the balance of the money which he had lent to the plaintiff, who thereupon repaid it; and that, I think, cancelled the former obligation, and left the plaintiff free to write as he did. Had these facts been stated the point urged by the defendant's counsel would have been raised, as, together with the charge itself of ingratitude, there would have been shown the proof that the plaintiff had not been ungrateful; the additional fact would have qualified the charge, not, indeed, as making it justifiable, but as lessening its injurious effect. The defendant's case fails then on two grounds. First, that a moral offence is charged and, supposing the facts stated in its support do not warrant it, yet it is still a libel, for a doubt is raised whether or not there may be other facts behind which would warrant the charge; and, secondly, if there were no other facts than those stated, ungrateful conduct was shown; although, so far as the facts were stated, they might be true, yet other facts which existed, and which would have shown that there was no ingratitude on the plaintiff's part, were not stated.

Digitized by Google

CHANNELL, B.—I am of the same opinion. I think that a judge who, in an action for libel, should tell the jury distinctly one way or the other, either that a plaintiff had or that he had not a cause of action, would be wrong, for Baron Parke, in the case of Parmiter v. Coupland, 6 M. & W. 107, after referring to the Act of 32 Geo. 3, c. 60 (Fox's Act), by which indictments for libel were put upon the same footing as other criminal charges, says, "It has been the course for a long time for a judge in cases of libel, as in other cases of a criminal nature, first to give a legal definition of the offence, and then to leave it to the jury to say whether the facts necessary to constitute that offence are proved to their satisfaction; and that whether the libel is the subject of a criminal prosecution or a civil action." I think, therefore, that my brother Pigott directed the jury right, for certainly the use of the words in question at a public meeting is enough to raise the question for the jury whether they were used in such a way as that they amount to a libel. The bare charge of ingratitude is in itself a very opprobrious one, and the question was one entirely for the jury, who have thought it to be a case justifying a verdict for the plaintiff.

PIGOTT, B.—In my direction to the jury at the trial I followed as nearly as I could the rule which my brother Channell has referred to as having been laid down by Parke, B. in the case in 6 M. & W., and I stated to them what the law considered to be a libel, and then left to them the question whether the publication in question in the present case was, under the circumstances, a libel or not. The accompanying circumstances of each particular case must of course always have great weight in the consideration of the matter by a jury. The charge of ingratitude, no one can doubt, is a particularly hateful one, and calculated to bring, odium, and disrepute upon the party so charged. I confess I think if I erred at the trial at all it was not in being unfavourable to the defendant.

Rule discharged.

Attorneys for the plaintiff, De Gex and Harding, 4, Raymond-buildings, Gray's-inn, W.C.; agents for Freer and Reeve, Leicester.

Attorneys for the defendant, Dale and Stretten, 3, Gray's-inn-square, W.C.; agents for C. and A. Stretten, Leicester.

COURT FOR DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES.

Reported by W. LEYCESTER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

May 23 and June 1.

(Before Lord PENZANCE, J. O.)

BROWN v. BROWN and ROBEY.

Matrimonial suit—Connivance—Wilful neglect—Costs.

In a husband's suit for dissolution on the ground of adultery, the respondent pleaded connivance, wilful neglect, and conduct conducing to adultery. In support of these pleas it was proved that the petitioner had permitted the co-respondent to visit frequently at his house in his absence, to send provisions into his house, and to make his wife an allowance of 1l. a week, and that he had sent his wife to borrow money from the co-respondent. Also that he had allowed him to escort his wife to London. The jury found the issue of adultery in favour of the petitioner, and they acquitted him of connivance, but they found that he had been guilty of wilful neglect and conduct conducing to the adultery:

The court refused to grant a decree nisi, and dismissed the petition. It also condemned him in his wife's costs, but made no order as to the co-respondent's costs.

This was a husband's suit for a dissolution of his marriage on the ground of his wife's adultery with the co-respondent, and damages were claimed. The adultery was not traversed, but the respondent and co-respondent pleaded connivance and wilful neglect and conduct conducing to adultery. The case was tried before the Judge Ordinary and a common jury.

The parties were married in 1854, and afterwards lived together at Lincoln, where the petitioner was employed on some engine works of which the co-respondent was the manager. In Nov. 1866 the respondent left her husband, and has since cohabited with the co-respondent.

In support of the plea of connivance and wilful misconduct conducing to adultery several witnesses were called who stated that the co-respondent was at the petitioner's house every day with the petitioner's knowledge; that he frequently sent supplies of provisions and other necessaries to the house; that he allowed the respondent 1l. per week, which was frequently paid in the petitioner's presence, and that when the petitioner was in want of money, he frequently sent his wife to ask the co-respondent for it. It was also proved that on one occasion the petitioner allowed his wife to go to London with the co-respondent, accompanied them to the station, and took tickets. When the petitioner left the co-respondent's employment, he went to Chelmsford to seek fresh employment, and left his wife at Lincoln. On his return a violent quarrel took place, and his wife left his house and went to cohabit with the co-respondent.

On the other side witnesses were called to prove that the petitioner was not aware of the improper intimacy between his wife and the co-respondent, and that he had complained of the frequent visits of the co-respondent to his house.

The jury found that the respondent and co-respondent had committed adultery; that the petitioner had not connived at the adultery, but that he had been guilty of conduct conducing to the adultery.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 1.—Dr. Spinks (Inderwick with him) now moved the court on behalf of the petitioner to grant a decree nisi, and to condemn the co-respondent in costs.

Digitized by Google

Searle for the respondent.

Dr. Tristram for the co-respondent contra.

Lord PENZANCE, J.O.—In my judgment neither branch of this application can be granted. The facts of the case are perfectly fresh in my mind. The petitioner was a working engineer employed at iron works, where the co-respondent was in the position of superintendent or manager. At a certain date, which is not material, the petitioner's wife went to live in the co-respondent's house. At first the semblance was kept up of their occupying separate rooms, but after a time that was abandoned, and they slept together and lived as man and wife. That was the adultery of which the petitioner complained. But it turned out in evidence that for more than a year before this, the wife refused to cohabit with her husband, and that the co-respondent, with the knowledge of the petitioner used to call at the house two or three times a day for the purpose of seeing her. It was likewise proved that he used to furnish the respondent with money, 1*l.* a week, and that the petitioner was aware of it, that he was in the habit of sending provisions to the house for the use of petitioner or respondent, or both, and that the petitioner was aware of that, and further, that upon one occasion the respondent was allowed to go up to London with the co-respondent for medical advice. I quite agree in the remark on that head, and if there had been no previous connection between the respondent and co-respondent, the court would not be so suspicious as to put a bad interpretation upon the conduct of the husband in authorising the manager of the works at which he was employed to act as the escort of his wife on her journey to London. But when connected with the other facts of the case, the court cannot make that allowance. It is another fact in the case which tends to show that the petitioner for his own benefit was really casting his wife in the way of the co-respondent. The jury, it is true, have not found connivance. They have found that he was guilty of neglect, and of misconduct conducing to his wife's adultery. But it is extremely likely that if there had been no such plea as that upon the record, they would have found connivance. They had before them two issues, either of which, if found against him, stood in the way of the petitioner's relief, and they did what juries often do, seeing that practically justice would be effected without going to the full extent of finding the petitioner guilty of connivance, they adopted the other plea as involving less dishonour, and found him guilty of neglect and misconduct conducing to adultery. But whether that is so or not they have found that issue against him, and the court entirely concurs in the finding. I think that no harm has been done to the petitioner. I think the evil which has befallen him and his wife is one which he had a great hand in bringing about, and under those circumstances it is plain that he ought not to have a decree, and ought never to have instituted this suit. He must pay the wife's costs, because she has succeeded, but I don't condemn him in the co-respondent's costs. The petition must be dismissed with costs.

Petition dismissed.

Proctors for petitioner, Scott and Co.

Proctors for the respondent, Swann and Co.

Proctors for the co-respondent, Swann and Co.

Equity Courts.

COURT OF APPEAL IN CHANCERY.

Reported by THOMAS BROOKSBANK and E. STEWART ROCHE, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

April 23 and 24.

(Before the LORDS JUSTICES)

Re THE LONDON AND NORTHERN ASSURANCE CORPORATION (LIMITED);

STACE AND WORTH'S CASE.

Companies—Attempted amalgamation—Void or voidable—Ultra vires—Acceptance of shares as a consequence of amalgamation—Shareholder acting as director—Winding-up—Liability of shareholder.

The articles of association of the L. and N. Co. provided (in effect) that the power of appointing directors should vest in the shareholders, and that upon any amalgamation or sale of its business an extraordinary general meeting should approve and sanction it. That company entered into an agreement with the I. Co. for an amalgamation, and it was provided that the property of every kind of the latter should be transferred to the former; that the board of directors of the amalgamated company should consist of a stated number of members of each of the boards of the two companies, who were to be selected by themselves, and that the proposal should be sanctioned by the shareholders of both. S. and W. had been directors of the I. Co., and became entitled to shares under the agreement; they were entered on the register in respect of them, certificates were made out and forwarded, both of them were chosen to be directors of the amalgamated company, and both acted. The agreement was never ratified by the L. and N. Co., or by the amalgamated company:

Held, under these circumstances, that S. and W. were not contributories of the amalgamated company, inasmuch as the agreement for amalgamation was ultra vires, and therefore void from the beginning; and as the allotment of shares to S. and W. was purely part of the amalgamation, and not a separate and independent contract on their part to accept shares.

This was an appeal by the official liquidator of the above-named company, which is now being wound-up in the chamber of James, V. C., against an order whereby his Honour refused to settle on the list of contributories the names of the two respondents, Col. Stace, and Mr. Worth. The circumstances were as follows:—

Both of these gentlemen were in the summer of 1867 holders of shares in, and directors of, a company at that time carrying on business, entitled The Life Investment Mortgage, and Insurance Company (Limited).

At the time the company now in course of winding-up, the London and Northern Assurance Corporation (Limited), was also in existence, and was duly registered under the Companies Act 1862, with articles of association, which provided in the usual manner for the appointment of directors, and for calling general meetings of the company, their most material provisions being these:—

52. That until the holding of the first ordinary meeting, the number of the directors by whom the affairs of the company shall be managed, shall be such (not less than four, or exceeding twelve, inclusive of the managing director appointed by these presents) as the directors for the time being may from time to time deem expedient.

Then followed certain other clauses which provided for what was to happen until the holding of the first ordinary meeting, and what powers the directors were to have until that time. And the clause continued thus:

The number may at any time be varied, either by increasing or diminishing the same, by a vote of an extraordinary meeting under the provisions in that behalf contained in the 44th clause of these presents, so that such number be never less than three, and that every director shall hold not less than 100 shares.

Digitized by Google

Then the 53rd clause stipulated who should be the first directors of the company, and the 61st clause provided:

That every vacancy in the office of director occasioned by death, disqualification, or resignation, or any other cause, previously to the annual day of election, may be filled up by the remaining directors; and every shareholder who shall be so appointed a director, shall continue in office only until the next immediately subsequent ordinary meeting.

Then several of the intermediate clauses, which were very much in the ordinary form, provided for the appointment of a certain proportion of the board of directors, one-third the first meeting, another third the next meeting, and so on. Then followed provisions as to amalgamation with other companies, or the purchase of their businesses, the material passages relating to which were contained in the 78th and 133rd clauses as follows:

The 78th:

That the directors may also, from time to time, take over, or purchase, the whole, or any part, of the business and assets of any company or society, either for a consideration in money to be paid or received, or by the issue of shares.

And the 133rd clause:

That if at any time it shall be thought expedient that the company shall be dissolved, or amalgamated with any other company, or its business, estate, or effects disposed of to any other company, it shall be lawful for an extraordinary general meeting to declare that such dissolution or amalgamation of the company, or disposition of the business, estates, or effects thereof, shall take place, and the same shall take place accordingly.

The corporation, therefore, being thus constituted, an agreement for amalgamation between these two companies, which was now in question, was entered into on the 21st Aug. 1867, and its material provisions and stipulations were:

That from and after the 15th Sept. then next the two companies shall be amalgamated and form one, under the style or title of the above-named London and Northern Insurance Corporation (Limited), and under and subject to the terms and conditions of their articles of association.

That for the furtherance and carrying out of the aforesaid amalgamation, the said Life Investment, Mortgage, and Assurance Company (Limited) do hereby agree to sell, transfer, and assign to the said London and Northern Insurance Corporation (Limited) all their books, goods, chattels, premiums, income, investments, bills, loans, and all and every book-debts, agents' balances, capital in arrear and owing, and other assets, for and in consideration of, and subject to, the terms hereinafter contained; and the said London and Northern Assurance Corporation (Limited) agree to purchase and accept the transfer of the same accordingly.

That the London and Northern Corporation should issue shares in exchange for those of the Investment Company in manner following, that was to say, that shares of 5*l*. each, fully paid up and without further liability, should be given to every holder of fifty shares or upwards in the corporation, upon which 2*l*. per share had been paid, at the rate of two shares of 5*l*. each in the London and Northern Corporation for five shares on which 2*l*. per share had been paid in the Investment Company, with analogous provisions, which it is needless to state, for cases where a person was holder of fewer than fifty shares, or had paid less than 2*l*. per share.

Then the 10th clause of the agreement provided:

That the chairman of the London and Northern Assurance Corporation shall continue to be chairman of the amalgamated board; that the deputy chairman be chosen from the directors of the Life Investment, Mortgage, and Assurance Company (Limited) should they (that is, the directors of the Investment Company) desire it.

And the 11th clause provided:

That the directors of the amalgamated board shall consist of the present five directors of the London and Northern Insurance Corporation (Limited), and of seven of the directors of the Life Investment, Mortgage, and Assurance Company (Limited), to be selected by themselves.

The agreement itself also contained a clause providing that after the completion of the transfer of the business from the Investment Company to the London and Northern Corporation, a meeting of the shareholders of the company resulting from the amalgamation should be held, to sanction what had been done.

Notwithstanding this last proviso, no such meeting was ever held. An extraordinary general meeting of the Investment Company was held, which duly ratified the agreement, but it was never in any manner confirmed by the London and Northern Corporation, nor was the agreement ever registered.

The respondents, Col. Stace and Mr. Worth both held upwards of fifty shares in the Investment Company. Their shares were exchanged under the provisions of the agreement, and certificates of the shares to be held by them in the amalgamated company were prepared, but none were ever sent to Mr. Worth. Col. Stace received and retained those relating to his shares. Both of them continued as directors of the amalgamated company, and took part in its business as such. The amalgamated company appeared to have had transferred to it all the assets of the Investment Company.

In the winding-up of the amalgamated company the official liquidator inserted both names in the list of its contributories.

The case was brought before James, V. C., in court, in February last, when his Honour ordered both names to be removed, considering that the amalgamation was wholly void, and that all that took place was part of that amalgamation, and not an independent contract on the part of Stace and Worth to take the shares. His Honour, after giving that judgment, desired to have the case re-argued, which was accordingly done, and on the 16th March his Honour expressed his adherence to his original opinion, and removed the names.

Against this order the official liquidator appealed.

Amphlett, Q. C. and Higgins supported the appeal, and referred to or commented on

Re The Cachar Company's case, L. Rep. 2 Ch. App. 412; 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 222;
Re The Financial Corporation, L. Rep. 2 Ch. App. 714; 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 684;
Levita's case, L. Rep. 3 Ch. App. 36; 17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 337;
Clinch v. The Financial Corporation, L. Rep. 4 Ch. App. 117; 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 334;
Alabaster's case, L. Rep. 7 Eq. 273;
Oakes v. Turquand, L. Rep. 2 Eng. & Ir. App. 325; 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 808;
Hare's case, 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 15;
The Marquis of Abercorn's case, 7 L. T. Rep. N.S. 225;
Austin's case, L. Rep. 2 Eq. 435; 15 L. T. Rep. N. S. 140;
The Imperial Bank of India, China, and Japan v. The Bank of Hindustan, China, and Japan, L. Rep. 6 Eq. 91;

The nature of the arguments sufficiently appears in the judgments.

Kay, Q.C., and Bagshawe, appeared for the respondents.

Lord Justice SELWYN said:—I think we ought not to call upon you, Mr. Kay, in this case, for neither the Lord Justice nor I entertain any doubt of the correctness of the conclusions at which the learned Vice-Chancellor has arrived, after having, as it appears he had, twice considered this case. He has decided that the names of these two gentlemen, Messrs. Stace and Worth, ought not to be included in the list of contributories of the London and Northern Insurance Corporation (Limited).

The questions that have arisen depend to a certain extent upon the construction of the articles of association of that company. It appears that the memorandum of association was dated the 21st July 1865, and that the certificate of incorporation was dated the 26th July of the same year. The company having been incorporated, as is usual, under a memorandum of association, and certain articles upon which a considerable portion of the argument has turned, it is necessary to refer to some of those articles, and in particular to those articles relating to the appointment of the directors, the powers of the directors, and especially their powers so far as the purchase or acquisition of the business of any other company is concerned. [His Lordship then referred to the provisions of the articles for the appointment of the first directors, the holding of meetings and otherwise, and proceeded:] The result of this is that these articles are very much in the ordinary form, providing first of all provisionally what is to happen until the first ordinary meeting of the company shall take place, appointing certain gentlemen to be directors until the first ordinary meeting, and afterwards vesting in the body of the shareholders, as is usual, the power of appointing, in certain proportions, the directors of the company. In substance, therefore, immediately after the first directors went out of office, the sole and exclusive power of appointing directors is vested in the general meeting of the shareholders, and in them alone; and although the 61st clause gives the power of filling up vacancies in the office of directors, there is, in my judgment, no authority whatever in this board of directors to do that which has been attempted to be done in this case—viz., on the occasion of the purchase of the business of another company, assuming this to be merely that, so to constitute the board as in fact to give to that company the power of appointing the majority of the directors. These are clauses of an ordinary character, and when reliance is placed upon the clause which says that, in matters not provided for, the directors shall have power to act as they may think fit, it is plain that cannot provide for the appointment of the directors themselves, which is so carefully provided for by those articles.

Digitized by Google

The result, therefore, is that, setting aside these merely temporary provisions, which relate to the period before the first ordinary meeting is held, and those temporary provisions with respect to the "death, disqualification, or resignation, or any other cause, previously to the annual day of election," the power of appointing directors is vested in the shareholders. That is expressly provided for by the articles, and, that being so, we come to the clause relating to the purchase of the business. [After referring fully to the agreement of the 21st Aug. 1867 his Lordship said:] The result, therefore, of this agreement is, that the directors of this company, who had under their articles of association no authority whatever for taking away from the shareholders the power which was vested in them by those articles of association of, from time to time, appointing the governing body, have by this agreement assumed the management of that which they term here the amalgamated company; that which, whether it be treated as an amalgamated company or as a company continuing the same as it was before, but only having purchased the business of another company, is nevertheless to have a governing body, so constituted that the majority of that governing body shall not be in the least degree chosen by the shareholders of the London and Northern Corporation, but shall be the nominees of the Investment Company, and shall be selected by them. Upon that I entertain no doubt whatever that it was wholly ultra vires, that this cannot be considered, as it has been treated in argument, as a collateral or outlying portion of the agreement, but that it is the very substance of the agreement, because it is agreed by this that the two companies are to be amalgamated, subject to the terms and conditions of the articles of association of the London and Northern Corporation as now existing, and upon the terms which are here mentioned, that is to say, as stipulated in the second clause that, subject to the terms and conditions thereinafter mentioned, they agree to accept the transfer of their business. Those terms and conditions are in the most essential and material part these—that the governing body of the company which is to exist after the date of this agreement is to be so constituted that the majority of that governing body are to be appointed by the Life Investment and Assurance Company, and not by the shareholders of the London and Northern Corporation. I think, therefore, that as to this essential part of the agreement it is wholly beyond the powers of one of the parties, at least, to enter into, and consequently that this agreement was wholly and entirely void.

But the matter does not rest there, because there is in this agreement itself a provision which seems to have had reference to some notion entertained on the part of its framers that without some subsequent sanction or confirmation it would not be valid. It is not disputed that, so far as the Investment Company were concerned, the ratification of the shareholders was duly obtained. But this agreement provides that on the completion of the amalgamation a meeting of the shareholders of the amalgamated company shall be called to confirm the same. It is plain, therefore, that the parties to this agreement considered that at all events it was proper that notice should be given to the shareholders of the amalgamated company, which, of course, would include all the shareholders of the original London and Northern Corporation, and that those shareholders should have the opportunity of meeting and considering and discussing the question and that they should be then called upon to confirm it. The agreement having been dated the 21st Aug. 1867, and containing that clause, it appears that the matter proceeded to a certain extent. It is said that there were no assets in fact to transfer, but that all that has been done is certain business, which otherwise would have been done by the Investment Company, which has in fact been done under the name of, and for, and by, the London and Northern Corporation; and that certain policies have been granted by the London and Northern Corporation under and in pursuance of that agreement, and that the matter so continued until the 9th June 1868, when the resolution to wind-up the London and Northern Corporation was passed, and which was followed on the 20th of the same month by the usual supervision order. But no explanation whatever is given of any reason why the meeting, which was provided for by this agreement, was not called, and indeed it must be taken as an admitted fact in the case, that the shareholders of the London and Northern Corporation have had no notice of this agreement, and have had no opportunity of considering or confirming the same. No such confirmation has ever taken place. Therefore, upon that which is the material question in the case, I entertain no doubt that the agreement was not, as it has been said, a voidable agreement, but one which was absolutely and entirely void.

That being so, there remains the question whether there has been any separate and independent agreement entered into by the two gentlemen who are the subjects of this appeal, Messrs. Stace and Worth, by which, notwithstanding the invalidity of that agreement, they have rendered themselves personally liable to be placed upon the list of shareholders in this company. It is said that the shares were allotted to them in pursuance of this agreement. The agreement stipulates for the issuing of certain shares by the London and Northern Corporation in exchange for, or in consideration of, the shares held by the shareholders in the Investment Company, and the property of the Investment Company, and the shares which were to be so issued in exchange were to be fully paid-up shares; and accordingly, and in pursuance of that agreement, certain fully paid-up shares were, it is said, allotted to these two gentlemen, and, although there may be some conflict of evidence about it, one at least of these two gentlemen, it is said, has accepted these shares, or has taken the certificate of the shares. But the issuing and registration of these shares as fully paid up shares was done in pursuance of the agreement which I have already said is, in my judgment, void. There is no evidence of any independent separate agreement whatever. I do not doubt, as in fact was expressed by the full court in that case which has been referred to of Clinch v. The Financial Corporation that, notwithstanding a void agreement of this kind, there may be a separate and independent transaction between different individuals by which they may render themselves liable to take shares in the company, although the general agreement may turn out to be invalid. The matter then goes on, as I have already said, until the winding-up; the company acquires no property; it does probably acquire some business by means of this transaction; there is no confirmation by the shareholders, and then the company itself is ordered to be wound-up. Under these circumstances I apprehend that the cases to which reference has been made, and especially that which was the decision of the House of Lords in Oakes v. Turquand, have no application to the facts of the present case; for if I am right in the conclusion to which I have already adverted, viz., that this was an agreement in itself absolutely void, and that there was no separate and independent agreement at all, then it cannot be said upon the authority of Oakes v. Turquand that the parties here were in a position which enabled them to give validity to the contract. In that case there was a voidable contract, which was capable of being adopted and ratified by the persons who were upon the list of shareholders. In the present case there is a contract which these persons could not have enforced against the company, and which the company could not have enforced against them. Therefore I think that the decision in Oakes v. Turquand has no application to the present case, and, entertaining that opinion, it appears to me to be clear that these two gentlemen cannot now be properly included in the list of contributories. And it is a fortunate circumstance that no creditor can possibly have been deceived or prejudiced by the result of the Vice-Chancellor's decision, which it is our intention to confirm, because even if a creditor had looked at the list of shareholders as it existed at any time, and even if he had been advised that this was a perfectly valid amalgamation, or a valid transfer of the business of one company to the other, still the list of shareholders so inspected by him would have disclosed the fact that the shares which had been allotted to Messrs Stace and Worth were fully paid up shares, and, consequently that it was not the intention of the parties to this transaction that any liability should be undertaken as between the creditors and these gentlemen, or by either of them. I think, therefore, that in this case the decision of the Vice-Chancellor must be affirmed, and the appeal motion be refused, with costs.

Digitized by Google

Lord Justice GIFFARD, having stated the facts, said that in his opinion the agreement was void and not voidable. His Lordship proceeded:—That being the case, the next question is whether, notwithstanding that, Messrs Worth and Stace ought still to be on the list of contributories. First of all, Levita's case was quoted as an authority to show that they must be; but when one looks at Levita's case, it is nothing more than an application for shares by Levita, and a state of things which precludes him from saying, not only as between himself and creditors, but as between himself and the company, that he was not a shareholder of the company. In point of fact there had been a simple individual application for shares by him, and events had taken place which precluded him from saying that he was not a shareholder. That of course puts that case entirely out of the question.

Then the case of the Imperial Bank of China and Hindustan has no application whatever, for all that I held in that case—although I set aside the agreement—was that the very large majority of the shareholders had bound themselves individually to give effect to their individual contracts. But that does not of course prove that there has been any individual contract in this case.

Now for the purpose of making out an individual contract in this case, it is said first of all that these gentlemen have taken shares. All that they have done is this—they have entered into this agreement, and upon the footing of that agreement with regard to one of them, certificates of shares have been handed over, and their names have been entered on the register in respect of fully paid up shares; besides that they have acted as directors, and signed their names to several policies, thereby probably imposing a liability on this company. But no one of those acts constitutes a contract between them and the company. There is in fact nothing in the shape of contract between them and the company except that agreement of the 21st Aug., which, as I have already stated, is an agreement which is void.

Although I quite agree that the facts of Alabaster's case do not go the length of this case, I think the principle to be deduced from Alabaster's case is included in this case; and I must, therefore, hold that these gentlemen ought not to be contributories, because there never was a time at which either they or anyone could have said to the company, "We are shareholders of the company, and you can't say the contrary," or a state of things which would have enabled the company to say to them, "You are shareholders of the company, and you cannot say the contrary."

That being so, there never having been an agreement which was enforceable either on the one side or the other, it is impossible that these gentlemen can be held to be contributories, and therefore the decision in the court below will be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed with costs.

Solicitor for the official liquidator appeal ing. Snell.

Solicitor for Messrs. Stace and Worth, James Townley.

April 28 and 29.

(Before the LORDS JUSTICES.)

DEAR v. VERITY.

Specific performance—Lease—Agreement by letters—Alleged parol variation—Uncertainty as to—Condition precedent.

By three letters which passed between the parties, the defendant agreed to demise to the plaintiff a dwelling-house and its appurtenances. The agreement was in the letters complete, but the defendant refused to grant the lease on the terms which the letters expressed, on the ground of a verbal understanding that the lease should contain a covenant by the plaintiff to expend 1000*l.* in improvements. The plaintiff denied that this was any part of the terms, and resisted the insertion of such a covenant, but he expended upwards of 500*l* on the property:

Held (affirming the decision of Stuart, V. C.), that the evidence in support of the alleged addition failing to establish it, the plaintiff was entitled to such a lease as the letters taken alone provided for:

Taylor v. Portington, 7 De G. M. & G. 328, commented on and distinguished.

This was an appeal by the defendant from a decision of Stuart, V. C., reported 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 268, where the facts are fully stated.

Karslake, Q.C., and Rowcliffe supported the appeal, and referred to

Taylor v. Portington, 7 De G. M. & G., 328;
Clarke v. Grant, 14 Ves. 519;
Clowes v. Higginson, 1 Ves. and B. 524;
Swaisland v. Dearsley, 29 Beav. 430; 4 L. T. Rep., N. S. 432;
The Wycombe Railway Company v. Donnington Hospital, L. Rep. 1 Ch. App. 268; 14 L. T. Rep., N. S. 179.

Greene, Q.C., and Cottrell for the respondent, the plaintiff.

Lord Justice SELWYN said:—Mr. Greene, I think we ought not to call upon you in this case, because the court entertains no doubt as to the correctness of the conclusion at which the learned Vice-Chancellor has arrived. As I have before had occasion to observe in this case, I am not at all prepared to extend that which the Lord Justice Knight Bruce used to call "the boundary line" which divides negotiation from contract in such a manner as to convert letters written merely for the purpose of negotiation into a concluded contract; but in the present case there is, in my judgment, no doubt whatever that on the 27th Sept. 1865, both the plaintiff and defendant intended to enter into, and did in fact enter into, a concluded agreement. The documents are before us, and the plaintiff in his affidavit gives an account of the manner in which those documents were prepared, and after saying that he entered into a negotiation with the defendant he says, "I wrote and handed to the defendant a letter" (which is the first of the series in question) "in the words following: 'I make you an offer of 90*l* per annum for your house on a lease;'" and then there are the other matters with respect to the repairs and so on. Then he says: "I handed the last-mentioned letter to the defendant at the office of a Mr. Mason, a house agent in Windsor, and after perusing the same the defendant remarked that he should prefer the word 'agree' to be used instead of the word 'offer,' and accordingly, in compliance with the defendant's request or suggestion, I then wrote on the fly leaf of the sheet of paper on which the letter marked A was written a further letter in the words and figures following"—which is written on the same piece of paper on the second page. "'I agree to take this house on a lease of 3, 7, 14, 21, or 42 years at my option, rent to commence from the 29th Sept. 1865; and I further agree to do all the painting, papering, repairing, decorating, &c., during the term of lease, and I further agree to pay for the said lease not to exceed (say) eight guineas.'" Now this gentleman has been cross-examined, and the learned Vice-Chancellor has had the opportunity of seeing his demeanour during that cross-examination, and we have only had the opportunity of hearing his evidence read; but the Vice-Chancellor appears to have entertained no doubt whatever as to the accuracy of the testimony of this gentleman, and I must say the cross-examination appears to me to confirm the testimony of the written evidence; but that on which I place more reliance are the documents themselves. I think it is impossible to look at them without seeing that that is the correct representation of what actually took place, because it is the common case of both parties that the rent of 90*l.* was the rent agreed upon. Omitting that, as to the two letters, the letter on the first page and the letter on the second page, we have no other difference between them except this that the one is an offer and the other is a formal agreement. This gentleman did not know that an offer with a formal acceptance amounted to an agreement. Then it appears to me that the only reason why the trouble should be taken of writing this second letter was to get rid of the former imaginary difference between an offer made and accepted and the agreement; that is the only possible reason why that is written, and therefore that shows to my mind conclusively that the object of both parties was really to agree to something which would amount to a concluded contract between them. That was done at the suggestion of the defendant himself, and it must have been at his suggestion, because, as the plaintiff says, the words "I offer" were altered into "I agree." That is really the only substantial alteration that took place in these two letters.

That alteration having been made at the defendant's suggestion, he on the same day wrote a letter in which he says: "I agree to accept your terms for this house, as per your letter (or letters) dated the 27th Sept., 1865." It is in my opinion perfectly immaterial whether the word was "letter" or "letters," because here are these two documents themselves written on the same piece of paper. The rent is admitted to have been agreed to be 90*l.* a-year, and, whether it refers to one or to both letters, I think there was no concluded agreement between these two parties.

That being so, the question is whether the statement contained in the 8th paragraph of the defendant's answer relating to the circumstances of the collateral agreement which he says was entered into, and by reason of which he was induced to sign the letter I have just read, is established in evidence, or not, in every part of it; because, if that be established, it is perfectly clear that upon all the authorities the plaintiff would have no ground to come to this court and ask for specific performance. On the other hand if it is not made out, then I think there is no uncertainty at all in the contract contained in these letters; for it is to be observed that that which is to be done by the defendant is not, as was the case in the authority to which allusion has been made, upon a condition precedent to the agreement, something to be done by the landlord to the property before the lease was granted, but it is something which is to be done by the lessee himself, and which, of course, was to be done by him for his own benefit. He says, "I agree to do all the painting, papering, repairing, decorating, &c., during the term of the lease"—all that was to be done by him. I think that there is no such uncertainty as would prevent this court from decreeing specific performance of the agreement, and settling a proper lease between the parties.

I come then to that which is really the material matter in the case, namely, whether there was any such collateral agreement as that the lessee should agree to enlarge the dining-room, and to put a new storey to the house, and to do that at an expense of 1000*l.* In the first place it has been greatly urged upon us that all the probabilities of the case are in favour of the representation so made by the defendant. Having considered the evidence, his Lordship rested his decision upon the testimony of Mr. Mason, who took an active and important part in the transaction, and whose evidence he read as follows: "I was in my front office, and they came in, and the plaintiff asked my leave to make use of my pen and ink, and they then went into my inner room. I happened to want something in that room and went into it. They appealed to me as to the bargain they were making as to letting the house, and my impression is that the rent spoken of was 90*l.* I refused to give my opinion on the matter; but my impression at the time was that it was plenty of money for it. I said 'I shall leave you to fight it out,' and I went out of the room, and I heard no more than that they were wrangling to get the best of each other. My impression was that the defendant was gettting a good rent for his house, and that 70*l.* or 80*l.* was a reasonable rent for it at that time. My impression from his manner was that the plaintiff considered that he was making a good bargain, but he was not aware that, while the property at Sunning-hill was on gravel, the defendant's house was on dark clay, and was, therefore, much less valuable. Nothing passed in my presence as to the plaintiff laying out 1000*l.* in improving and enlarging the premises." Now, upon the conflict of testimony as between the plaintiff and defendant, I think the court is bound to incline the balance in favour of that side where you have a witness of the character of Mr. Mason making a statement so clear and positive, and I must say, so extremely probable, but which is entirely in opposition to the statement of the defendant. I think, therefore, that the explanation which Mr. Mason there gives really disposes of the whole truth of this transaction. It was in the autumn of the year, and the defendant was in possession of property which was in the occupation, up to that time, of a tenant who was entirely insolvent, who had neglected the house in such a manner as to reduce it to the position which is described by the witness as being entirely uninhabitable, and he was very desirous to get a respectable tenant willing to lay out a considerable sum of money in improving the property.

Digitized by Google

Under these circumstances, and bearing in mind the value which Mr. Mason puts upon the property, I think the contract which the defendant entered into was, so far from being unreasonable in its terms, much nearer the real value of the property, as established by the evidence, than the contract which he asks the court to perform, viz., that the rent of 90*l.* should be paid in addition to the double burden upon the lessee of laying out 1000*l.* upon these particular alterations and additions, and also undertaking the repair of the property. I think the simple question we have to decide is the question of fact, and that that question is decided in favour of the plaintiff by the probabilities of the case, by all the written documents in the case, but above all by the independent testimony of Mr. Mason. I think, therefore, that this appeal fails, and must be dismissed with costs.

Lord Justice GIFFARD said:—The defence in this case has been put upon two grounds—the one, that the letters, if they contain an agreement, are too uncertain for this court to perform it; the other, that the circumstances stated in the eighth paragraph of the answer, have in substance been proved.

Now, as regards the uncertainty, the case of Taylor v. Portington was relied upon, but I consider it unnecessary for this court to say on the present occasion whether Taylor v. Portington would or would not apply, because Taylor v. Portington is different in principle to this case. It was a case in which a lessor agreed, as a condition precedent to granting a lease, to do repairs, and decorations, and so forth; but it was not an agreement that there should be in the lease granted a specific covenant of a particular kind. Here there is no condition precedent at all, but the condition is that the lease shall be granted containing certain covenants, and that at once makes a distinction which puts Taylor v. Portington entirely out of the case, and it is no more than the ordinary case of a man agreeing to grant a lease, the lessee undertaking to farm in a particular manner; this court probably could not say that the farm was carried on in the particular mode, and could not on that account say that a lease could not be granted. I am, therfore, clearly of opinion that we need not consider Taylor v. Portington, and that there is no ground for saying that the terms of those letters are uncertain.

Then with respect to the facts of the case, the letters themselves are plain, and it is not a case in which parties were corresponding at a distance from each other, but it was a case in which they went both together into a room for the specific purpose of coming to an agreement, and these letters were written in that room, both parties being present for the purpose of coming to a formal agreement and for no other purpose whatever.

Then as regards the letters themselves, the Statute of Frauds is entirely out of the question; and the Statute of Frauds being out of the question, even if you take nothing but the second letter and the acceptance of it, and the seventh paragraph of the answer, I should be clearly of opinion that there was an agreement which this court would carry into effect. It is obvious that the rent was a mere accidental omission and mistake from the second of the two letters. The 90*l.* had been agreed upon when the first letter was written, and the answer admits that the 90*l.* was agreed to; and, there being no Statute of Frauds, the second letter and the acceptance would be abundantly sufficient. I think upon the evidence that it is quite clear you can refer not only to the second letter but to the first, and that there was an acceptance of everything which was contained in the two letters which preceded the acceptance.

That being so, we really come to the eighth paragraph of the answer, and the question is, whether the eighth paragraph of the answer can satisfy the mind of any rational person that this plaintiff, in point of fact, represented or promised that, if a lease was granted, there should be contained in that lease a covenant that he would lay out 1000*l.* That really and truly is the whole case. The property was in a wretched state of repair, there is no question about that; and I am satisfied that there has been a very considerable expenditure, probably to the full amount of 500*l.*, upon that property. That being so, let us just consider what it is that the eighth paragraph of the answer states. It first of all states that the parties met together for the very purpose of coming to the agreement. It states in the next place that the first letter was written by the plaintiff, and it states that the objection made to that first letter was that it did not contain any provision as to the plaintiff's laying out 1000*l.* in building out the dining-room and raising the house a storey, and that the defendant handed back the letter to him on that account. Now I ask what you would say to any man if you objected to a letter of that kind, and handed it back, and he changed the word "offer" into "agree," and handed back to you a letter in all other respects identically the same. I think any man would say at once, 'That is a most impudent thing to do, and I will not deal with you if that is the course of proceeding you are going to take.' But what is the defendant's story? The defendant's story is, that although he made that objection, he has handed back to him a letter which is in terms the same, except that it is much more in the form of an actual agreement than it was before, and then that he is satisfied with this that "the plaintiff said that with a note of acceptance from me it would constitute an agreement between us." That is what he says took place between him and the plaintiff when the second letter, which was stronger than the first, was handed back to him, and when that term was omitted. Then the defendant says: "I objected to that letter as I had done to the first, that it did not contain any provision as to the plaintiff building out the dining-room;" and then he says that the plaintiff said: "All that will be put in the lease: we are not writing out a lease now, and cannot put everything in an agreement." But it does not rest there, because he literally rests his whole case upon this—that that being the conversation between the parties, that being the transaction, Mr. Mason comes in and does what the defendant describes, and Mr. Mason says he did nothing of the sort. I am satisfied the defendant was under a total misapprehension and mistake as to what did take place. It is quite clear that he has stated what is not accurate, when he says that he acted upon that advice and representation of Mr. Mason as concluding the whole thing, when this matter was going on between the parties. That being so, if he is inaccurate as to that, one must look pretty closely as to what the reasonable probabilities of the case are; and I say that no rational person can come to the conclusion that the transaction was such as is represented by the eighth paragraph of the answer. And when we look at the two letters, we find in the first letter the word "offer," which the plaintiff says the defendant objected to; and we find in the second letter the word "agree," which the plaintiff says was the thing which the defendant stated should be put into the letter in order that there might be an agreement, it being common ground between the parties that they met for the purpose of agreeing, and with no other object.

That being so, I am quite satisfied that, although the court does exercise discretion in enforcing specific performance, this is a very clear case for specific performance; and that, if in any case specific performance ought to be enforced in equity, unquestionably this is that case. The appeal, therefore, must be dismissed with costs.

Solicitors for the appellant, Gregory, Rowcliffes, and Rawle.

Solicitors for the respondent, the plaintiff, Rickards and Walker.

Thursday, June 3.

(Before the LORDS JUSTICES.)

CATT v. TOURLE.

Public-house — Demurrer — Conveyance in fee — Covenant for right of vendor to supply beer — Uncertainty — Want of mutuality — Restraint on trade.

The plaintiff, a brewer, conveyed land in fee to the trustees of a building society, who covenanted that the plaintiff, his heirs and assigns, should have the exclusive right of supplying all ale, beer, and porter which might be consumed in every house or other building which might be erected on the land, and which should be opened or used as an inn, public-house, or beershop. The defendant, who was also a brewer, bought a piece of the land of the trustees, and thereon built and opened a public-house, which he supplied with beer of his own brewing. The plaintiff then filed this bill, alleging that the defendant had purchased the land with notice of the covenant, and stating that he had always been and still was ready to supply to the defendant beer of good quality at fair market prices, and he prayed that the defendant might be restrained from supplying the house with beer from any other brewer than the plaintiff. To this bill the defendant demurred, but it was Held (affirming the decision of Stuart, V. C.), that the covenant was not bad for uncertainty, or want of mutuality, or as being a restraint on trade, and the demurrer was overruled.

This was an appeal by the defendant against a decision of Stuart, V. C., overruling a demurrer to the plaintiff's bill for want of equity. The case when before his Honour is fully reported in 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 551, and it is unnecessary to state the facts in this place.

Greene, Q. C. and Townsend supported the appeal, and Karslake, Q. C. and Ayrton his Honour's decision.

The authorities cited were:

Collins v. Plumb, 16 Ves. 454;
Wilson v. Hart, L. Rep. 1 Ch. App. 463; 14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 499;
Mitchell v. Reynolds, 1 P. Wms. 131;
Lumley v. Wagner, 1 De G. M. & G. 604;
Holmes v. The Eastern Counties Railway Company, 3 K. & J. 675;
Rolfe v. Rolfe, 15 Sim. 88;
Hills v. Croll, 2 Ph. 60;
Tulk v. Moxhay, 11 Beav. 571; and on appeal, 1 H. & Tw. 105; 2 Ph. 774;
Piggott v. Stratton, 1 De G. F. & J. 33; 1 L. T. Rep. N. S. 111;
De Mattos v. Gibson, 4 De G. & J. 276; 3 L. T. Rep. N. S. 121.

Lord Justice SELWYN said: This is an appeal from a decision of Stuart, V.C. overruling a demurrer to the bill for want of equity, and the appellant therefore comes before us having thrown upon him the burden of showing that, under the circumstances stated in this bill, the plaintiff cannot be entitled to any relief whatsoever.

Now, the bill states that the plaintiff has for a considerable time carried on, and still does carry on, the business of a brewer, and that he was entitled to "certain land in the town of Brighton which was suited for building, and so capable of being and was intended by him to be dealt with in a manner to promote his business." It then states the purchase by a certain society of a portion of that land; it states the treaty which led to that purchase, and the deeds which were then executed; and after stating the deed by which the conveyance was made, it states the deed of even date which contains the covenant in question, which is a covenant (amongst other things not material to the present purpose), "that the said Charles Catt, his heirs and assigns, should have the exclusive right of supplying all ale, beer, and porter which might be consumed in every house or other building which might be erected on any other part of the said piece of land, and which should be opened or used as an inn, public-house, or beershop." It then states that "the defendant purchased the said lot with notice as a member of the said society or with notice in fact, or that but for his neglect to make proper inquiry into title in his said purchase, he would have had express notice of the hereinbefore stated indenture of covenants, or the defendant became otherwise bound by the same indenture." It then states that the plaintiff, in exercise of his exclusive right, has always been, and now is, willing, and previously to the institution of this suit has offered to the defendant, to supply to the orders from time to time of the defendant for consumption in the said Duke of Edinburgh beerhouse, ale, beer, and porter, all of good quality, in requisite quantities, and at market or fair and reasonable prices, as specified in the same offer; but the defendant refuses such offer, and denies the plaintiff's said exclusive right, and insists that the defendant has the right of supplying the said beerhouse from breweries other than the plaintiff's. Then the prayer of the bill is in accordance with the paragraph which I have just stated, repeating the same offer, and asking for an injunction in support of the exclusive right so set up.

Now in answer to that case many objections have been raised to the legality of this covenant and to the jurisdiction of this court to enforce such covenant, or at all events as to the propriety of the court interfering in such a manner as to grant the relief which is sought; and it has been said that, even if the plaintiff has any right, he ought to be left to assert that right in a court of law. I think in the first place it is not very material to consider the question which has been discussed, as to whether covenants of this nature, or this covenant, actually do or does run with the land. We had occasion very recently to consider the authorities applicable to this question, many of which have been cited to us to-day. The first is the case of Tulk v. Moxhay, before Lord Cottenham, who says, "That the question does not depend upon whether the covenant runs with the land is evident from this, that if there were a mere agreement and no covenant, this court would enforce it against a party purchasing with notice of it; for if an equity is attached to the property by the owner, no one purchasing with notice of that equity can stand in a different situation from the party from whom he purchased." Then he went on to observe—with respect to questions which have arisen with reference to devolutions of covenants of this kind having been decided upon certain definite principles as regards the covenants running with the land. In like manner in the case of Wilson v. Hart, which was decided by the then Lords Justices, where the owner of a freehold house entered into a covenant with the plaintiff, who was a previous owner, that the building should not be used as a beershop, and the house was afterwards let to the defendant as tenant from year to year with express notice of the covenant, it was held, affirming the decision of the present Lord Chancellor, that although the covenant might not at law run with the land, the defendant was bound by it in equity; and the late Knight-Bruce, L. J., in the case of De Mattos v. Gibson, puts the matter as one of principle not depending upon any such distinction. He says at p. 282 of 4 De Gex and Jones, "Reason and justice seem to prescribe that, at least as a general rule, where a man by gift or purchase acquires property from another with knowledge of a previous contract lawfully and for valuable consideration made by him with a third person, to use and employ the property for a particular purpose in a specified manner, the acquirer shall not, to the material damage of the third person, in opposition to the contract, and inconsistently with it, use and employ the property in a manner not allowable to the giver or seller."

Now it appears to me that upon the statements in this bill the defendant is clearly bound by notice of the present covenant, and that, therefore, assuming the covenant to be otherwise unobjectionable, he cannot be heard to say that he, having purchased this property and no doubt having purchased it at a smaller price in consequence of the title being incumbered with the restrictions contained in this covenant, can now openly disregard the provisions of that covenant.

The objections which have been raised are: first, that this covenant is void for uncertainty; but I think the material question to consider is, what is it which the vendor here covenants for? In the first place, this is a covenant entered into as a part of a transaction which resulted in the sale and purchase of a piece of land; it is one of the covenants contained in the deed of even date contemporaneously with the conveyance of the land; it is a part of that transaction, and what the vendor covenants for is that he shall have the exclusive right of supplying all ale, beer, and porter which shall be consumed in any building erected on this particular piece of land which shall be used as a beer-house. Now that is a right which, of course, is capable of being abused, capable of being waived, capable of being lost; and if at any time, either in the progress of this suit or any other time, it can be shown that it has been so abused, so waived, or so lost, then there would be good ground for saying that this court ought not to interfere in favour of a person who might otherwise be entitled to the benefit of it. But I am at a loss to see how it can be said that there is anything like uncertainty in this covenant. It might be said that the covenant is too wide, that it is too general; but it appears to me to be impossible to say with any reasonable chance of success, when it reserves the exclusive right of supplying all ale, beer, and porter that may be consumed, that this is a covenant in any degree uncertain.

But then the authority of Collins v. Plumb is cited, and it is stated that that is a clear authority for the proposition that a covenant of this kind is so uncertain that a court of equity will not enforce it. I confess I entirely agree with the learned Vice-Chancellor, that the case of Collins v. Plumb does not in the least degree govern this case. Lord Eldon observed, as stated in the report, that it was very infirm in its terms. It was a covenant not to sell or dispose of water from a well to the injury of the proprietors of the waterworks, their heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, and then Lord Eldon says, "I never met with such a covenant as this, upon which I must try in each instance whether the act of selling the specified quantity of water is a prejudice to the proprietors of these waterworks." He is there obviously referring to the very peculiar language of that particular covenant, and the question as to whether it was, or was not to the prejudice of the proprietors of the waterworks was necessarily involved in the very terms, and expressed by the terms of the covenant itself; of course it must, therefore, have been expressed in the terms of the injunction, and therefore he said that a court of equity could not have any jurisdiction which it ought to exercise upon such a covenant as that. But that covenant has no resemblance to the present covenant, because this is not a covenant not to sell ale, beer, or porter to the prejudice of the plaintiff; it is a covenant that he shall have the exclusive right of supplying all ale, beer, and porter consumed upon these premises. Therefore the question as to whether it is to his prejudice is one that cannot be raised, because the extension of a man's trade is of course to his benefit, and the diminution of that trade must be to his prejudice. Therefore it clearly appears to me that the case of Collins v. Plumb has no application to the present case.

Then it is said, secondly, that there is a want of mutuality. What I have already said with respect to the nature of this covenant, and the right which is acquired thereby by the vendor, and the circumstances under which that right was acquired, I think has disposed of that objection as to the want of mutuality. But I go even further than that, and I say that, even supposing it had been expressed in terms as being a mere option, supposing there had been a covenant for a valuable consideration being a part of the transaction of the sale and purchase of the land, that so long and so often as the vendor chose to exercise a particular right—that is, the right of supplying all ale, beer, and porter—he should have that exclusive right, would it be said because it was optional on his part, therefore there was a want of mutuality, and therefore it could not be enforced? I apprehend that, being for valuable consideration, such a covenant, although it was expressed to be only conditional upon the exercise of a volition on the part of one side or the other, that being expressed in the covenant, would not be any objection to the validity. I think, therefore, there is no objection as to the want of mutuality. Of course a right so acquired is one which, like all other rights, must be reasonably exercised, and of course, as Mr. Greene put it, if a man having a right to sell ale, beer and porter were to sell some poisonous concoction which he chose to call ale, beer, or porter, that would not be a reasonable exercise of that right; neither would it be so if he were to sell good ale, porter, &c., at an unreasonable price.

Then the third objection that has been urged is, that this is an unreasonable restraint of trade. Now in the first place I think the rule which is laid down in the leading case which has been cited, and which is always referred to, of Mitchell v. Reynolds, is that, where the restraint is not general but partial, and does not have valuable consideration, then it cannot be said to be an unreasonable restraint. But here it is said that it is unreasonable in one respect, because it is perpetual. I think the rule upon that subject has been well settled by authority, and as I understand the rule, it is this—that where there is a restraint on a partner from carrying on trade, when it is unreasonable in law, then the partner carrying on trade can apply to the court to have it removed. The restraint may be limited as to space though general as to time, and falls within this rule that a restraint preventing a partner from carrying on trade within a certain limit of space, though unlimited as to time, may be good, and the limit of space may be according to the trade he carries on. As an instance of these covenants, I may mention also the case of Wilson v. Hart. It was a specific covenant entered into with a person, his executors and assigns. And then with respect to this particular covenant, it does seem to be one which the court cannot fail to take judicial notice of, as being a covenant which is extremely common. Every court of justice has had occasion to consider these brewers' covenants, and therefore the courts must be taken to be cognisant of the distinction between what are called free public houses and brewers' public houses, which last are subject to this very covenant. Certainly, in my opinion, we should be introducing very great uncertainty and confufusion into a very large and important trade, if we were now to entertain any doubt, or suggest any, as to the validity of a covenant so extremely common as this is. I think there would be no ground for that sort of distinction which has been relied upon, viz., that such a covenant might be good for 21, 50, or 100 years, but that it is not good if it is entered into as part of a transaction where the fee simple of a property is conveyed, and in accordance with such conveyance the covenant is made with the vendor, his executors and assigns. I think, therefore, that no such objections to the covenant can be sustained, especially when they are raised as they are raised at the present stage of this cause; because although at some future period of this cause, upon a motion, as in the case of Hills v. Croll, circumstances may be shown which render it improper for the court to interfere; or, as has been suggested, it may be shown at some future time either that the right claimed by the plaintiff is one as to which he has placed himself in such a situation that he ought not to be allowed to exercise it, or that the defendant had not notice of the covenant when he purchased the property, all these things may be proper grounds of objection upon the hearing of the motion, or upon the hearing of the cause, and then it might possibly be said that the case of Hills v. Croll might have some application to the question. But this raises the general abstract question whether a person stated to have notice of such a covenant is to be bound by it or not. Then if we are to look at those cases in my opinion it is very difficult to reconcile the case of Hills v. Croll with the case of Lumley v. Wagner, which last-mentioned case has been repeatedly followed, and if Hills v. Croll is to stand with that case at all, it can only be upon the particular circumstances of the case. What we have to deal with here is the general abstract question, and upon that I can only say that I entirely agree with the conclusion at which the learned Vice-chancellor has arrived, and I think this appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Lord Justice GIFFARD said:—The appeal in this case is from an order overruling a demurrer, and therefore the whole question to be decided is, whether upon the statements in the bill the plaintiff is entitled to any relief. One thing at least I think is certain, and that is, that if the plaintiff cannot sustain a bill in this court he is without remedy altogether. It is pretty plain that this is a covenant which does not run with the land.

Then with respect to the allegations in the bill, the transaction is a simple one; it is a sale by the plaintiff of land, and when he sold that land he stipulated for a particular covenant. The bill states that the plaintiff was at the date of the sale, and has been, and still is, a brewer, carrying on a particular business at a particular place in Brighton, and it states that the defendant had notice of the covenant in question; and then it states this, which is very material, in the 14th paragraph of the bill, that "the plaintiff in exercise of his exclusive right has always been, and now is, ready and willing, and previously to the institution of this suit, has offered to the defendant to supply to the orders from time to time of the defendant, for consumption in the said Duke of Edinburgh beerhouse, ale, beer, and porter, all of good quality, in requisite quantities, and at market or fair and reasonable prices, as specified in the same offer," and the terms of the covenant are, "that Charles Catt, his heirs and assigns, shall have the exclusive right of supplying all ale, beer, and porter, which may be consumed in every house or other building which may be erected on any other part of the said piece of land, and which shall be opened or used as an inn, publichouse, or beershop." And Mr. Catt himself is plaintiff; therefore we have nothing to do with what the state of things might be if he had assigned the deed, or if he had died, or anything of that description; but simply a question between Mr. Catt, being vendor, and this gentleman who was the purchaser of this property with notice of the covenant in question.

Now first of all upon that covenant it was said that the case was like Collins v. Plumb, which it certainly is not. If in the case of Collins v. Plumb the words had been left out at the end of the covenant "to the injury of the plaintiff," then the case would have been very like it, because the covenant in Collins v. Plumb was not to sell to the injury of the plaintiff, but that the defendants might sell water as long as they did not injure the plaintiff; and therefore on each occasion, as Lord Eldon said, it would have been necessary to try the question whether the sale was to the injury of the plaintiff or not. Nothing of that description would be necessary here. As I have already said, we must assume the 14th paragraph of the bill to be true, and therefore it must be admitted that there has been no breach of any kind on the part of the plaintiff in offering to make, and making the requisite supply of that which it would be inferred he was bound to make from the contents of the indenture in question.

Then beyond that it is said that this covenant is uncertain, which it clearly is not. I do not see how anything can be more certain than that a man is to have the exclusive right of supplying a particular public-house with ale, beer, and porter. There undoubtedly is nothing uncertain about that. And again, it has been held in the case of Holmes v. The Eastern Counties Railway that a grant of an exclusive right of that description contained in a covenant, is equivalent to a negative covenant. That being so, it brings the case in principle completely within the cases which have been decided on negative covenants, the cases of Holmes v. The Eastern Counties Railway Company, Rolfe v. Rolfe, and Lumley v. Wagner. With respect to the case of Hills v. Croll, there is great similarity between that case and the present. Lord St. Leonards, in his judgment in Lumley v. Wagner, said that he decided that case under the particular circumstances of it. If the principle in Hills v Croll lays down this proposition that, wherever there is an obligation which the court cannot enforce, therefore it is to decline to act upon a negative covenant, all I can say is that the principle laid down in Hills v. Croll is distinctly opposed to Rolfe v. Rolfe, and is distinctly opposed to Lumley v. Wagner.

Then with respect to its being a covenant in restraint of trade, that again is clearly not so; and in point of fact it does not go beyond the ordinary brewer's covenant, except in this particular, that in the ordinary brewer's covenant you generally have the lessor and lessee, or the mortgagor and mortgagee, whereas this is a sale of a piece of land under different circumstances. If authority were wanted there is abundance of authority on the subject, that a covenant of this description is not void according to the principles which are clearly laid down in this court.

Upon all these grounds I am clearly of opinion that the demurrer was properly overruled in the court below, that there is no ground for this appeal, and that it must be dismissed with costs.

Solicitor for the defendant appealing, H. Smith, agent for Dempster, Brighton.

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Senior, Attree, and Johnson, agents for Hill and Fitzburgh, of Brighton.

ROLLS COURT.

Reported by HENRY PEAT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Tuesday, June 29.

KIRKMAN v. LEWIS.

Will — Construction — Gift of residue — Statute of Mortmain—Illegal gift—Uncertainty.

A testator by his will directed the residue of his personal estate to be converted into money and the money applied in the construction of a well and the erection of a public pump and tank in any convenient place in the village of L., and if there was any surplus, he directed the same to be paid to the rector for the benefit of a school there:

Held, that the gift for the construction of the well, &c., was void by the Statute of Mortmain; and that, as it was impossible to ascertain what the surplus would be without sinking the well, &c., the whole gift was void, and the next of kin were entitled to the residue of the testator's personal estate.

This was a suit for the administration of the estate of Abraham Kirkman, which now came on for further consideration, the only question being as to the validity of the bequest of the residue of the testator's personal estate.

By his will, dated the 10th June 1865, Abraham Kirkman, after directing the payment of his debts and funeral expenses, gave various specific and other legacies; and as to all the residue of his personal estate and effects he directed the same to be converted into money, and the money applied in the construction of a well and the erection of a public pump and tank in any convenient place in the village of Llangorse, and if there should be any surplus, he directed the same to be paid to the rector for the benefit of a school there.

Sir R. Baggallay, Q. C. and Bagshawe, for the plaintiff, did not take any part in the argument as to the validity of the residuary bequest.

Wickens, for the Attorney-General, after an intimation of his Lordship's opinion that the gift for the construction of the well, &c., was void under the statute of Mortmain, submitted that since the decision in the House of Lords of Philpott v. St. George's Hospital, 6 H. of L. Cas. 338, the construction of the statute was by no means to be taken as it used to be, and that on the authority of that and other cases, where the purchase of land was not necessary, the gift was valid. Here the gift was not necessarily void, as it did not require the purchase of land. But even assuming the gift for the well, &c., to be void, the gift of the surplus for the school was valid, as the cost of the construction of the well, &c., was ascertainable; but he submitted that if the gift for the well failed, the whole residue would go to the purposes of the school. He cited

Fisk v. Attorney-General, 17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 27; L. Rep. 4 Eq. 521;
The Magistrates of Dundee v. Morris, 3 Macq. 134.

Jessel, Q. C. and Kingdon for the next of kin, contended that it could not be known whether there would be any surplus till the well, &c., were constructed, and that the gift of the surplus was, therefore, void for uncertainty. It was not a gift of the residue, but a simple direction that if there was any surplus, it should be paid to the rector for the benefit of the school. Moreover, the case was covered by authorities. They cited

Chapman v. Brown, 6 Ves. 404;
Fowler v. Fowler, 33 Beav. 616;
Attorney-General v. Hinxman, 2 Jac. & W. 270;
Mitford v. Reynolds, 16 Sim. 105; 1 Phil. 185.

Southgate, Q. C., Cutler, Bury, and Sladen, appeared for other parties.

Lord ROMILLY.—I cannot say that there has not been a considerable fluctuation in the decisions on the statute of Geo. 2 (Statute of Mortmain); but I do not think that any case has gone to this extent, that where a gift is made for a purpose which this court cannot carry into effect, and there is a direction that the surplus shall be carried to a good purpose, that gift is good. It is quite clear that the gift for the construction of the well, &c. is void by the Statute of Mortmain. It is impossible to ascertain what the expense of sinking a well would be; and till the well has been sunk and the tank and pump erected, it is impossible to say what the surplus will be, or whether there will be any surplus. I am of opinion, therefore, that the whole gift is void, and that the residue, if any, belongs to the next of kin.

Solicitor for the plaintiff, Ralph Watson.

Solicitors for the other parties, Raven and Bradley; J. and R. Gole; G. H. Oliver; Kynaston; Gasquet.

Digitized by Google

April 29 and 30.

RUSHBROOK v. LAWRENCE.

Mortgage—Equity of redemption—Release—Agreement in fieri—Abandonment of agreement.

Mortgagees brought an action of ejectment, in July 1853, against the mortgagor, who was in possession of the mortgaged property. The action was compromised, upon these terms: that the mortgagor should give up possession to the mortgagees on the 29th Sept. then next, and should release to them (if required) all his right, claim, and interest in the mortgaged property, the release to be prepared at the expense of the mortgagees; the mortgagees agreeing, in consideration of the mortgagor agreeing to give such possession and execute such release, to forego all claim in respect of costs of the action, but in case default should be made by the mortgagor in the giving of such possession, or the execution of such release (if required), the mortgagees should be entitled to the costs:

A release was never required, and the mortgagor continued in possession till 1865, when the mortgagees sold the property under the trust for sale contained in the mortgage-deed, and realised more than sufficient to pay their principal, interest, and costs:

Held, that the compromise was an agreement in fieri, which had been abandoned by all parties and could not now be carried out, and that the mortgagor was entitled to the surplus proceeds of sale, after paying to the mortgagees their principal, interest, and costs.

This was a suit by the heir-at-law of a mortgagor against a mortgagee to recover the surplus of the proceeds of sale of the mortgaged property after payment of the mortgagee's principal, interest, and costs. The defendant resisted this suit on the ground that the plaintiff had released his equity of redemption.

By an indenture dated the 28th March 1825, Frederick Rushbrook, the father of the plaintiff, demised a piece of land in the borough of Cambridge to John Ingle the elder for the term of 1000 years, subject to a proviso for the cesser of the term on payment of 600*l.* and interest to Ingle or his representatives. In 1835 the mortgagor charged the same property with the payment of a further sum of 200*l.* to Ingle's executors.

By indentures of lease and release by way of mortgage, dated the 25th and 26th Aug. 1837, Frederick Rushbrook conveyed the same property and an adjoining piece of land to Aaron Chevell upon trust, if Rushbrook should fail to pay 200*l.* and interest on the day therein named, to sell the property, and out of the proceeds of sale to retain the 200*l.* with interest and costs, and to pay over the surplus to the person who would have been entitled to the equity of redemption in case the property had not been sold.

Frederick Rushbrook died intestate on the 24th Aug. 1841, leaving the plaintiff Frederick Henry Rushbrook his heir-at-law, then an infant of the age of eleven years.

No interest having been paid on the mortgage after the mortgagor's death, the executors of Ingle, the first mortgagee took possession of the mortgaged property in 1844, and remained in possession of it till May 1852, when the plaintiff came of age, and took possession of it.

Aaron Chevell, the second mortgagee, died in 1838, having by his will left all his property, subject to certain life interests, to his nephew J. P. Lawrence, whose widow, the defendant Elizabeth P. Lawrence, was now entitled to the 200*l.* secured by the mortgage-deed of Aug. 1837.

In June 1853 the defendant in the present suit and the representatives of Ingle, brought an action of ejectment against the plaintiff for the recovery of the mortgaged property; and on the 14th July 1853 the plaintiff, being unable to defend the action, signed a cognovit in the following words:

I, the above named defendant (i.e. in the action) do hereby confess this action, and that the above named plaintiffs are entitled to the possession of the whole of the hereditaments and premises comprised in the writ of ejectment in this action, subject to terms specified in a consent signed by my attorney and bearing even date herewith.

The consent was signed by the attorneys of both parties and was in these words:

We consent to an order to stay proceedings in this action upon the following terms, viz., the defendant to withdraw his appearance and the plaintiffs to be at liberty to sign judgment forthwith, they undertaking not to issue a writ of possession till the 29th Sept. next; defendant hereby consenting on or before the said 29th Sept. next, to give and deliver up to the plaintiffs or their agent quiet and full possession of all the hereditaments and premises now standing thereon, the possession whereof is claimed by the plaintiffs in the writ of ejectment in this action, the defendant being entitled to the rents and profits to the time of giving up such possession as aforesaid, and the defendant hereby undertaking (if required) to release to plaintiffs all his right, claim, and interest (if any) in the said hereditaments and premises, the said release to be prepared at the expense of the said plaintiffs; and in consideration of the defendant agreeing to give such possession, and execute such release (if required), the plaintiffs do hereby agree to forego all claim in respect of the costs of this action, but in case default shall be made by defendant in the giving of such possession or the execution of such release (if required) then plaintiffs to be entitled to costs to be taxed.

Dated this 14th July 1853.

J. G. B., attorney for the plaintiffs above named;

R. L. J., attorney for the defendant above named.

In pursuance of the arrangement contained in the cognovit and consent, an order by consent was made in the action, and was signed by Mr. Justice Williams. The judge's order was also dated the 14th July 1853, and was almost in the same words as the consent above set out.

The plaintiff stated that he entered into this arrangement through fear of being imprisoned, if the verdict was pronounced against him, and that he believed that the cognovit which he signed was intended only to give to the mortgagees the means of obtaining possession of the mortgaged property, so as to enable them to sell it, and that in signing the cognovit he never intended to prejudice his rights to the equity of redemption.

His attorney in the action stated that he had explained to the plaintiff the effect of the cognovit and consent, viz., that by agreeing to the terms, he would give up all his rights to the property, and that the plaintiff had then replied that he had made up his mind not to contest the matter any longer, as he knew that the property was mortgaged beyond its value, and that there would be nothing payable to him if it were sold.

On the 18th July 1853 judgment in the action by confession was signed according to the terms of the order, but the plaintiff was never required to give up possession of the property or to execute a release.

In March 1854, the plaintiff being about to leave England, gave to one James Cave the key of a messuage standing on the mortgaged property, and at the same time gave him a paper writing in these words:

I, Frederick Rushbrook, do hereby leave James Cave in possession of the garden in the Mile-road, known as Covent-garden, in trust to be delivered up to me whenever I may require it. FREDK. H. RUSHBROOK.

Witness, Mr. Barrance.

March 16, 1854.

On the 5th July 1865, the defendant sold the property by auction under the trust for sale contained in the mortgage-deed of August 1837, and in March 1867, she and Ingle's representatives conveyed it to the purchaser. The purchase-money was 3245*l.*, which after payment of Ingle's and the defendant's principal, interest, and costs, left a surplus of 1500*l.*

Cave continued in possession of the property without paying any rent till March 1867, when, at the defendant's request, he executed a surrender to the purchaser upon being paid certain moneys which he had expended during his occupation.

The defendant, whose attorney in the action had died some years ago, did not know anything of the compromise of the action in 1853, till after the completion of the sale, when her solicitor in this suit casually found out that there had been such a compromise, and on inquiring into the circumstances of it, advised her that she was entitled under it to the surplus of the purchase-money.

Southgate, Q. C. and Rigby, for the plaintiff, contended that the consent was not a release, but an agreement to execute a release, if required. The plaintiff did not intend to part with his equity of redemption, and in transactions of this kind between the mortgagor and mortgagee, the court required strict proof of the intention. They cited on this point:

Vernon v. Bethell, 2 Eden, 110;

Ford v. Olden, 15 L. T. Rep. N. S. 558; L. Rep. 3 Eq. 461.

Moreover, the consent was never acted upon, but was abandoned by all parties; and eventually the defendant sold under the trust for sale in her mortgage deed, and the consent was so far from being acted upon, that the first mortgagee's representatives were paid the costs of the action of ejectment. But even assuming that the release mentioned in the consent was intended to be a release of the equity of redemption, it was not available as a defence to a suit of this kind, except by cross bill: (Howells v. Wilson, 12 L. T. Rep. N. S. 818; 34 Beav. 573.) The conduct of the defendant since 1853, and especially in the matter of the sale, amounted to a complete waiver of the compromise:

Watson v. Marston, 4 De G. M. & G. 230.

Sir Richard Baggallay, Q. C., and G. N. Colt, for the defendant, contended that the plaintiff must have intended to release his equity of redemption, for he had nothing else to release. At the date of the compromise, the equity of redemption was worth nothing, and, therefore, the relieving him from the payment of the costs of the action was a sufficient consideration for the release. The plaintiff had agreed to release his equity of redemption whenever required to do so, and it was not too late to require him to do so now. They cited

Knight v. Marjoribanks, 2 Mac. & G. 10.

April 30.—Lord ROMILLY.—Mr. Southgate, I think you are entitled to a decree in this case. In the first place, I do not think that the case of Knight v. Majoribanks (sup.) in any degree affects this case, because I do not think that the transaction is invalid by reason of its being a transaction between a trustee and cestui que trust; that is not, in my opinion, the reason why this transaction is invalid; it is invalid, in my opinion, because it was a mere proceeding in fieri, a mere agreement entered into which was abandoned by all the parties, and which is endeavoured to be set up after the lapse of fourteen or fifteen years after the transaction took place. I think the proper and fair way of considering this case, and the way in which I propose to consider it, is to assume the perfect accuracy and proof of the three documents upon which the defendant relies. I do not mean to cast the slightest doubt upon them from the fact of one not having been proved, but I mean to assume all the three documents as perfectly valid and existing documents at the time. Then I think it desirable to point out what are the transactions or facts which relate to this case. [His Lordship here stated the facts of the case and continued:] I think it is perfectly clear that the plaintiff was in possession of the property through Cave, and Cave's evidence upon cross-examination is perfectly distinct and plain upon the subject. None of the mortgagees ever took possession. In Jan. 1865 they put up the property for sale, and it was sold for a considerable sum, much more than sufficient to pay principal, interest, and costs upon both mortgages, and the question is, who is entitled to the surplus? The plaintiff's title as mortgagor is clearly made out, and if he has not conveyed away his equity of redemption, he is entitled to the surplus of the purchase-money; and it is to be observed that, the property being amply sufficient, the mortgagees are not much to be pitied if the result is that they only get their principal, interest, and costs paid in full. The state of the case is this: There are three documents, the cognovit, the consent, and the judge's order, which carried into effect the consents of the parties. The cognovit, which was executed by the plaintiff in the present suit was in these words:—"I, the above-named defendant, do hereby confess this action, and that the above-named plaintiffs are entitled to the possession of the whole of the hereditaments and premises comprised in the writ of ejectment in this action, subject to terms specified in a consent signed by my attorney, and bearing even date herewith." I pass over the fact that it seems to me very doubtful whether there was anything of even date therewith, because the document as produced certainly appears to bear date the 17th, and not the 14th, but I assume it to bear even date. The consent is in these words: [His Lordship read it.] It is to be observed that he (Rushbrook) was not to execute the release, unless he was required to do so. The conveyance of the equity of redemption was not to take place by this instrument; that is expressed; he does not say, "I hereby give it up," but that he undertakes to release it if required. It was to be by a written document to be executed by him, which was to be prepared at the expense of the plaintiffs in that action. All those things are perfectly clear. What was the penalty, if he did not do it? The penalty was that he was to pay the costs of the action; that is expressly stated. The mortgagees could have got possession at any time. They got judgment in the action; judgment was entered up on the 18th July; they could have possession at any moment they pleased; and if he did not give up possession, if he did not execute the release when required to do so, the only consequence was that he was to pay the costs of the action. That is the agreement between them. Now what takes place? They never require him to execute a release, no release is ever presented to him, he is never requested to give up possession, he remains in possession continually up to the time of the sale, and in addition to that, out of the produce of the sale, when it took place, they paid themselves the costs of the action—when I say they paid themselves the costs of the action, Mr. Ingle, who is the first mortgagee, does not insist upon this agreement at all; neither he nor his attorney insists upon anything more than that his principal, interest, and costs should be paid; he does not insist that he is to participate in the equity of redemption, which he clearly would be entitled to do under this agreement, if the defendant is entitled to it; but he does not claim anything of the sort. This transaction took place in July 1853, and all parties abandoned it, no party acted upon it in any respect till the 5th July 1865, when the sale took place, which produced more than sufficient to pay principal, interest and costs; therefore twelve years had elapsed. After that time, the agreement having been abandoned on all sides, and the sale having produced a considerable amou then the defendant says, "Here is the agreement, which you were bound by, though none of us acted upon it, by virtue of it, I, who was one of the two mortgagees (because there are two mortgagees who entered into the arrangement, which the other will not have anything to say to), am entitled to take 1500*l.*, which, except for this, would have belonged to the plaintiff whose property it originally was." It is a strong thing to say that. It is possible that at that time the equity of redemption was worth nothing. It is perfectly clear from all the evidence in the case that the giving up the costs against the defendant in the action amounted to very little, because they could have got no costs against him; he was not worth any costs at all; and they apparently did not take possession of the property for this reason, that they could not sell it, and they were afraid of the consequences of being treated as mortgagees in possession. If the plaintiff had simply executed a release to them, that would have been another thing, but it was to be at their expense, and they were to make it complete if they thought fit. Now by what possibility could the plaintiff insist upon that agreement, supposing the case were the other way? Could he come after the lapse of twelve years and say, "You might have had the release if you pleased; though I never offered to execute it, I am entitled now to say that you must not have the costs of the action?" It is quite clear that he could not do anything of the sort. It is, therefore, one of those cases which, it appears to me, are impossible to be supported, that the defendant can stay over for twelve years and say, "I will run the chance of this property in the neighbourhood of a large town becoming valuable, and if that should prove to be the case, I will insist upon having the equity of redemption and specific performance of the contract; if it does not prove valuable, then I will abandon it altogether, and add my costs to the mortgage-money." Because the agreement was clearly this, if the property had merely produced enough to pay the principal and interest, the mortgagees were not entitled to have any costs of the ejectment as against him. I am of opinion that the whole of this arrangement was abandoned on both sides; tacitly abandoned. It is quite clear that the defendant did not know of it at the time; she now says her attention was called to it by the circumstance of an entry in an attorney's bill of costs, which has led to the production of these three documents, all of which only come to this, that the plaintiff agreed to do something, if called upon to do it, which he never was, and which, if he had been called upon to do, might have given the defendant a right which she does not now possess. I am of opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to a decree with costs. In taking the accounts the defendant is to be allowed all sums of money which have been paid in respect of the mortgage to Mr. Ingle. It would be very difficult, I think, to say that this young man (Rushbrook), who was only just twenty-two at the time of this transaction, and evidently in a very low rank of life, could have possessed any real knowledge of what the value of this property was. In this case, if bound by the transaction, all that he would have got would have been, that he would have conveyed away a property worth 1500*l.* to a person who was only a mortgagee for 200*l.*, merely for the sake of being relieved from the costs of the action. The probability is, that if a release had been tendered to him, the suit would have taken another form, it would have been to set aside the release which had been executed by him.

Digitized by Google

Solicitors for the plaintiff, Anderson and Stanford, for Whyley and Piper, Bedford.

Solicitors for the defendant, Kingsford and Dorman.

V. C. MALINS' COURT.

Reported by G. T. EDWARDS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Saturday, July 31.

CARTER v. CARTER.

Settlement—Construction—After acquired property—Will of husband.

On the marriage of C. and F., 5000l. was vested in trustees on the usual trusts, and C. and F. covenanted with the trustees that if F., her executors or administrators, or C., his executors or administrators in her right, should at any one time become absolutely entitled to real or personal estate of the value of 200l. or more, C. and F., their executors or administrators, should vest it in the trustees, on certain trusts. C. and F., his wife, went to New Zealand, where C. acquired real estate, which he left by his will as F. should appoint by deed or will, and in default to her children. The widow dealt with this property by absolute appointment to herself:

Held, that this property was not within the covenant, that the words "during the coverture" were intended to be inserted, and that the words "executors or administrators" made no difference.

The question in this case arose upon the construction of the settlement made upon the marriage of John Markham Carter and Frederica Josephine Fagan. This instrument was dated the 15th Aug. 1869, and made between Edward Carter the elder of the first part, the intended husband (described as son of Edward Carter the elder) of the second part, the intended wife of the third part, and John Bonham Carter, Charles Francis Cameron, and Edward Carter the younger (trustees) of the fourth part; and after reciting the intended marriage, and that Edward Carter the elder had transferred 5000*l.* Reduced Bank Annuities to the trustees upon trusts after mentioned, it was witnessed that it had been agreed between the parties thereto that the trustees should stand possessed of the 5000*l.* until the marriage, and after the solemnisation to continue or change the investment with the consent of the husband and wife and the survivor, and then at their own discretion, and to invest in Parliamentary stocks, or Government or real securities. Then followed trusts to pay the income to the husband for life, and then to the wife for life, and after the decease of the survivor, there was a trust for all or such one or more of the children, with such provisions for maintenance and advancement at such ages, &c. as the husband and wife should jointly by deed appoint, and in default as the survivor should appoint, whether covert or sole, or by his or her will. And in default of such appointment in trust for all the children equally, sons at twenty-one, and daughters at twenty-one or marriage with consent, and if but one, the whole to such one, with a hotch-pot clause. Then followed provisions for maintenance and education, and in default of children after the decease of Frederica Josephine Fagan, in trust for John Markham Carter absolutely.

The settlement then proceeded:

And this indenture further witnesseth that in consideration of the said intended marriage, they, the said John Markham Carter and Frederica Josephine Fagan do hereby for themselves, their heirs, executors, and administrators, and each of them doth separately for himself and herself, and his and her heirs, executors, and administrators, covenant, promise, and agree with and to the said John Bonham Carter, Charles Francis Cameron, and Edward Carter the younger, their executors and administrators, that if the said Frederica Josephine Fagan, her executors and administrators, or the said John Markham Carter, his executors and administrators, in right of the said Frederica Josephine Fagan, shall at any one time hereafter become absolutely entitled to any messuages, lands, tenements, and hereditaments, moneys, or personal effects (not consisting of house-held furniture or personal ornaments) of the value of 200*l.* or more; then and in such case the said John Markham Carter and Frederica Josephine Fagan respectively, or their respective executors or administrators, shall and will, at the expense of the said John Markham Carter and Frederica Josephine Fagan, or either of them, or their or either of their executors or administrators, make, do, and execute, or cause or procure to be made, done, or executed, all such acts and deeds, assignments and assurances whatsoever as the said John Bonham Carter, Charles Francis Cameron, and Edward Carter the younger, or the survivors or survivor of them, or the executors or administrators of such survivor, or his or their counsel, shall think necessary and proper for effectually vesting such messuages, lands, tenements, and hereditaments, moneys, or personal estates in the said John Bonham Carter, Charles Francis Cameron, and Edward Carter the younger, or the survivors or survivor of them, or the executors or administrators of such survivor, or other the trustees or trustee for the time being of these presents; upon, for, within, under, and subject to such and the like trusts, powers, provisoes, and declarations for the investment, alteration, variation, and transfer of the same as are hereinbefore declared concerning the said sum of 5000*l.* Reduced Three per Cent. Bank Annuities, and subject thereto upon trust to pay and apply the interest, dividends, and annual produce thereof to and for the separate use of the said Frederica Josephine Fagan, during her life, and after the decease of the said Frederica Josephine Fagan, upon trust to pay the said interest, dividend, and annual produce to the said John Markham Carter for his life, and after the decease of the survivor of them the said Frederica Josephine Fagan, and John Markham Carter, upon and for such and the like trusts, intents, and purposes, and with under and subject to such and the like powers, provisoes, agreements, and declarations in favour and for the benefit of all and every, or any one or more exclusively of the others or other of the children of the said Frederica Josephine Fagan, including Christina Fagan, the daughter of the said Frederica Josephine Fagan as are hereinbefore expressed and declared of and concerning the said sum of 5000*l.* Reduced Three per Cent. Bank Annuities, and the interest, dividends, and annual produce thereof, or as near thereto as the deaths of parties, and other circumstances, will then admit of, with such additional trusts and powers for sale, and leasing or demising of any messuages, lands, or hereditaments to be so settled, as shall be deemed necessary or expedient.

Then followed a proviso that in case of the failure of children to take under the aforesaid covenants and trusts, then the trust property should be held by the trustees in trust for the wife absolutely if she survived her husband, but if he survived her, there was a general power of appointment given to her by deed or will, and in default to such persons as at her death would be her next of kin under the statute if she had died sole. Then followed a special covenant with respect to property which the wife was entitled to from her first husband. There were then clauses relating to the receipts of the trustees, and a power to appoint new ones. The marriage took effect, and the husband and wife in 1860 settled in New Zealand, where he acquired land and died in June 1863, having made his will dated 18th Sept. 1857, whereby he gave all his real and personal estate to trustees (his wife being one) upon trust for her for life and after to his children, including his step-daughter Christina Fagan, with powers of advancement and other clauses, on which no question turned. By a codicil dated in April 1863 he revoked the gift to one trustee and substituted others, and also the gift to his step-daughter in consequence of her marriage. John Markham Carter left his widow and six children (besides his step-daughter) surviving him, and his widow had dealt with the property so acquired by her husband in various ways. Questions having been raised as to whether the covenant in the marriage settlement applied to this property so left by the will of John Markham Carter, a bill was filed by the trustees and children against the widow, alleging that it did, and this suit was in the nature of a cross-bill to have the settlement rectified so as, without ambiguity, to exclude the property left by the will of the said John Markham Carter, and if not, that the deeds dealing with the property, without prejudice to the rights under it, might be set aside.

C. Hall, for the plaintiff, contended that on the construction not only of the covenant itself, but of the whole settlement, the property left by the husband's will was clearly excluded. The words "during the intended coverture" were certainly not inserted, but they must be implied; and it was observable throughout that the settlement contemplated everything being done by both husband and wife jointly, which could only apply during the coverture. If it were held that this property was within the covenant the effect would be calamitous, inasmuch as the property acquired in New Zealand, and the subject of the husband's will, had been dealt with by the wife. Nothing was within the contemplation of the parties but what took place during the marriage.

Dickenson v. Dilwyn, W. N. for 1869, 210.

Wickens and Casson, for the defendants, insisted that the covenant and settlement must be construed strictly, and no supposition could be entertained as to what was or what was not in contemplation of the parties. Where property was limited, as here, to a married woman for life with a power of appointment, it was settled law that although if the power was not exercised, the property would not be subject to the trusts of the settlement, yet if it was exercised, it would; and that was this case. Moreover, the words "executors or administrators" carried the time of the acquisition beyond the coverture.

Ewart v. Ewart, 11 Hare, 276;
Townsend v. Harrowby, 27 L. J., N. S., 553, Ch.;
Stevens v. Van Voorst, 12 Beav. 305;
Howell v. Howell, 4 L. J., N. S., 242, Ch.
[Dickenson v. Dilwyn (sup.), did not apply.]

The VICE-CHANCELLOR (without hearing a reply): —These cases are not very frequent; but I have had occasion very recently to consider the same question upon a very similar covenant to settle after-acquired property; namely, where the husband had predeceased the wife, and given property to her by his will, a very unusual case. I decided that case on full consideration and argument, and I do not at present see any reason why I should not adhere to the conclusion I then arrived at, unless I see that the present case is different from that. All the authorities were collected in that case, those mentioned to-day and others; and upon them I held that the covenant did not apply to property acquired after the determination of the coverture. In Howell v. Howell, (sup.), and other cases, Stuart, V. C. decided to the same effect, and those cases appear to me so satisfactory that any other decision would be contrary to common sense and reason. This covenant was intended to apply to such property only as was acquired during the coverture, and a well penned instrument would have so expressed it; but in the cases referred to by the defendant's counsel, the words were general, and the question was, whether the words "at any time hereafter," meant during the coverture, that is, the joint lives of the parties, and on principle those words meant that portion of time embraced by the coverture. On that ground I decided that, property passing under the will of the husband not being in the contemplation of the contracting parties, they could not have intended the covenant to apply to such a case. I consider that principle applies with fuller force to the present case, which is much the same as Dickenson v. Dilwyn. There is certainly the difference of the introduction of the words "executors and administrators," but I do not think they make much difference, if any. [The Vice-Chancellor read the covenants.] They are, in fact, merely put in as formal words. I am of opinion that the words used in the covenant, "shall at any one time" meant, "at any one time during the coverture," although it is not so expressed. The fact that happened was, that the husband survived the wife, and as in the will in Dickinson v. Dilwyn there was a power of appointment to the wife by deed or will, and in default to the children. I entirely agree with Mr. Wickens's argument that when she appointed the property to herself absolutely, it was competent to raise the question as to whether property to which she became entitled after the determination of the coverture was embraced in the covenant. I think that the covenant only applied to property coming to her while the coverture subsisted, and I am therefore of opinion that it did not include this property. In Dickinson v. Dilwyn, I considered it impossible that the contracting parties could have contemplated that property given by the will of the husband could be included in the settlement. The difference here is, that the words "executors or administrators" occur, and it was said that they carried matters beyond the termination of the coverture; but what I think was meant by the introduction of those words was, to provide for the acquisition, and death of the party, in which case it would devolve on the executors or administrators, and would still remain liable to the covenant. Cases most similar to this refer to special property, but here the words "executors or administrators" were inadvertently thrown in and have no specific meaning. The demurrer therefore must be allowed, and there is an end of the motion.

Solicitors for all parties, Williamson, Hill, and Co.

V. C. JAMES'S COURT.

Reported by W. H. BENNET and R. T. BOULT, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Thursday, June 3.

Re THE EUROPEAN CENTRAL RAILWAY COMPANY; GUSTARD'S CASE.

Shares—Increase of nominal value of—Notice to transferror.

A railway company had increased the amount of the nominal value of its shares from 20l. to 40l. each, without formal notice to the original applicants for shares. G. applied for and obtained twenty shares, which were allotted to him. These shares with others were transferred by G. to H. The deed of transfer was left at the company's office for registration, but never was registered.

The company was ordered to be wound-up:

Held, that G. was only to be considered as a contributory in respect of the twenty shares for 20l. each allotted to him, and not for shares of which the nominal value had been so increased.

This was an adjourned summons from chambers.

It appeared by the evidence that the European Central Railway Company was incorporated in Jan. 1864. The capital by its prospectus and articles of association was stated to be 1,400,000*l.*, "subject to be increased and modified." It was also stated that the "first issue was to be 700,000*l.*, in 35,000 shares of 20*l.* each. The remaining 700,000*l.* to be raised hereafter in shares, bonds, or obligations as the board of directors may from time to time deem advisable. But the board may from time to time by a resolution passed by a majority consisting of not less than two-thirds of the whole number of directors, consolidate the shares into shares of a larger nominal value, so that the shares when consolidated shall together be equivalent in nominal value to the nominal value of the original shares before the consolidation."

On the 24th Jan. 1864 Mr. Gustard, at the request and solicitation of Mr. H. A. Holden, the promoter, and contractor for the works of the company, applied for twenty shares of 20*l.* each. These shares, on payment of the deposit of 4*l.* each per share, were, on the 22nd April 1864, allotted to him. On the 24th March preceding a resolution had been passed by the necessary majority of the directors, whereby the nominal value of the shares was increased from 20*l.* to 40*l.* each. This resolution was not registered by the registrar of joint-stock companies. It had been annexed as a printed memorandum to the articles of association of the company. By the deposition of Mr. Gustard it appeared that he denied all knowledge or notice of this resolution, and he stated that his application for shares was made on the faith of the statement contained in the memorandum and articles of association of the company that the shares were to be of 20*l.* nominal value. Certain transactions had taken place between Mr. Holden as the promoter and contractor of the company, and by articles of agreement dated the 5th April 1865, between them it was provided that Mr. Holden should produce transfers to himself of 1250 shares, which were to be delivered up to the company on their issuing to him 7500*l.* of debentures, payable in five years. The twenty shares which had been originally allotted to Mr. Gustard formed part of the 1250 shares delivered up by Holden to the company. The twenty shares before mentioned had been transferred by Gustard to Holden by deed of 16th May 1865. This deed had been left for registration at the office of the company, but it had never been registered there. Mr. Gustard had been induced to execute this deed of transfer under the belief that the arrangement between the company and Mr. Holden would have been carried out, and that he (Gustard) would, on the transfer of the shares being made, be released from all liability in respect of them. The question raised was whether Mr. Gustard was to be put upon the list of contributories at all, or, if so, whether in respect of twenty shares of 20*l.* each, or twenty shares of 40*l.* each.

Amphlett, Q. C. and Locock Webb, for Mr. Gustard, contended that, having no notice of the increase of the nominal value of the shares from 20*l.* to 40*l.* each, and twenty shares of the first-named nominal value having been allotted to him, he could only be held to be a contributory for such shares. And that inasmuch he had done all that was necessary for him to do, by having had the deed of transfer of those shares left for registration at the company's office, he ought not to be put upon the list of contributories at all, or held responsible for any liability in respect of them.

E. E. Kay, Q. C. and Bardswell, for the official liquidator of the company, contended that inasmuch as the increase of the nominal shares of the company was provided for by the original prospectus and articles of association, Mr. Gustard was bound by the provision therein contained that the directors should have the power of raising the additional capital by the issue of shares of increased nominal value, and that therefore he must be considered as a contributory for twenty shares the nominal value of which had been so increased by the resolution of the prescribed majority of directors.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said that Mr. Gustard must be held to be a contributory of the company, the transfer of the shares allotted by him not having been duly registered. But his application for the shares having been made on the faith of the memorandum and articles of association of the company, he must only be held as a contributory for twenty shares of 20*l.* each. He had distinctly sworn (and he was not cross-examined), that he never heard of the resolution to increase the nominal value of the shares until the month of May 1866. This was nearly two years after the date of that resolution. He was not affected, however, by laches as he had, at the time executed a transfer of these shares, and might well suppose that all liability in respect of them had ceased. He (the Vice-Chancellor), however, did not consider that the company had been bound to give any notice of the resolution to increase the nominal value of the shares, and their refusal to accept the transfer. It was his (Mr. Gustard's) business to have seen that the transfer had been complete, and duly registered.

Order accordingly.

Saturday, June 5.

Re The European Central Railway Company;

Holden's Case.

Attempted transfer of shares—Set-off.

H. applied for 100 shares in the above company. Eighty shares were allotted to him on the 22nd April 1864. In Nov. 1865 H. contracted to sell these shares to H. A. H. Calls upon them became due, amounting to 320l., which H. remitted to H. A. H. to pay to the company in respect of these calls. The company was alleged to be indebted to H. A. H. in a much larger sum. H. A. H. tendered to the secretary of the company twenty overdue coupons of the company of 15l. each in part payment of the 320l. This offer was refused. The transfer of the shares had never been registered:

Held, that H. was a contributory of the company in respect of eighty shares of 40l. each.

This case also came on as an adjourned summons from chambers.

It appeared that a Mr. Henry Holden in March 1864 applied for 100 shares in the company. Eighty were allotted to him in April 1864. On the 7th July Henry Holden signed a receipt for these shares of "40*l.* each." In Nov. 1865 H. Holden contracted to sell a certain number of shares to his cousin H. A. Holden, and on the 14th Dec. following executed a transfer of them to one Harris, the nominee of H. A. Holden. Calls were then due upon the shares. Amongst the shares so conveyed to H. A. Holden were the eighty shares of 40*l.* each allotted to H. Holden by the company. By the memorandum and articles of association the company might decline to register any transfers of shares whilst the transferror was indebted to the company. H. Holden remitted to H. A. Holden 320*l.*, the amount of calls then due upon the shares so assigned by him to be paid by H. A. Holden to the company. He, however, retained the 320*l.* but tendered to the secretary as a satisfaction and payment of the amount of calls so due, twenty overdue coupons or warrants payable in respect of debentures of the company which had been issued in his favour for work done by him on the railway. These coupons were for 15*l.* each. The secretary refused to receive them as part payment of the calls. The transfer to Harris, the nominee of H. A. Holden, had never been duly registered. The question now was, whether H. Holden was to be held as a contributory to the company and to what extent.

Amphlett, Q. C. and Locock Webb, for H. Holden, contended that he ought not to be held a contributory at all. The company were bound to have registered the transfer of the shares to Harris. The coupons were payable on demand, and as the amount of them must be considered as cash, the tender of the amount of them was a legal tender for the amount of the calls then due upon the shares allotted to H. Holden. At all events, he could be only held liable for eighty shares of 20*l.* each, following the decision of Gustard's case, reported above.

E. E. Kay, Q. C. and Bardswell, for the official liquidator, were not called upon by the court.

The Vice-Chancellor said that H. Holden must be declared a contributory in respect of eighty shares of 40*l.* each, as the circumstances in Gustard's case were entirely different. H. Holden had been accepted as the allottee of shares of 40*l.* each, and he had signed a receipt for them acknowledging that to be the nominal value of each share so allotted. He (the Vice-Chancellor) could not hold that the tender of the overdue coupons in payment of the calls then due upon those shares was a legal tender, and consequently the company were justified in refusing to register the transfer of the shares which brought the case precisely within the terms of the articles of association, giving power to decline the registration of a transfer on the ground of indebtedness to the company by the transferror. The transfer not having been duly registered, H. Holden consequently remained liable as a contributory in respect of the shares so allotted to him.

Order accordingly.

Solicitors: G. E. Gustard; Fox and Robinson.

Monday, June 28.

Cooper v. Cooper.

Appointment—Alleged fraud on power.

When a father agreed to appoint a share of a fund to his daughter, and to secure by bond an equal amount to the trustees of her marriage settlement under which he was to have a contingent reversion in both funds:

Held (in a suit to set aside the appointment), that as the transaction was intended substantially for the benefit of the daughter, and as the father gave a high value for the contingent interest, there was no fraud on the power.

By the marriage settlement of Mr. and Mrs. Daniel, dated the 8th Sept. 1806, property was settled upon the husband and wife successively for life, and after the decease of the survivor, in trust for all the children of the marriage as Mr. and Mrs. Daniell should by deed appoint, and in default of such joint appointment as the survivor should by deed or will appoint, and in default of appointment, in trust for all the children equally.

There were five children of the marriage, and previously to the marriage of one of them, Maria Gertrude Daniell with G. O. B. Trevanion, articles of agreement for a marriage settlement were entered into, by which Mr. Daniell covenanted that he and his wife would appoint a fourth part of the funds comprised in their marriage settlement in favour of their daughter. And that he would execute a bond to the trustees of his daughter's marriage settlement for payment to them in 1840 of the sum of 4567*l.*, with power for him to pay off the same at any earlier period with interest at 5*l.* per cent. in the meantime from the date of the bond. And it was agreed and declared that all the funds so provided for should be settled upon trust for Mr. Trevanion for his life, then to Gertrude M. Daniell for her life, and after the decease of the survivor upon trust for the children of the marriage, as the survivor should appoint. And that in case there should be no children of the marriage, that then the moneys intended to be settled by Mr. Trevanion should go to his executors, administrators, and assigns, and that the moneys intended to be settled by Mr. and Mrs. Daniell should go to the executors, administrators, and assigns of Mr. Daniell.

The marriage took place on the 14th Feb. 1832.

By a deed dated the 10th April 1832, Mr. and Mrs. Daniell appointed a fourth part of the funds comprised in their marriage settlement in favour of their daughter, so that she took a vested interest in the sums transmissible to her executors, administrators, and assigns.

By a post nuptial settlement, dated the 11th April 1832, the fourth part so appointed to Mrs. Trevanion was settled in accordance with the marriage articles, and in default of issue of the marriage there was an ultimate trust in favour of Mr. Daniell, his executors, administrators, and assigns.

Mr. Trevanion died on the 10th Sept. 1832, and there was no issue of the marriage.

On the 17th June 1841, Mrs. Trevanion was married to the plaintiff. By the settlement made in contemplation of the marriage, and dated the 16th June 1841, all the life interest of Mrs. Trevanion under the first settlement was vested in trustees.

Mr. and Mrs. Daniell also appointed another fourth part of the funds comprised in their marriage settlement to their daughter, Sophia Daniell, then an infant, on her marriage with Captain England. By a settlement bearing the same date as the date of appointment, the fourth part so appointed was settled with a similar ultimate remainder in favour of Thos. Daniell, in the event of there being no issue of the marriage. There were, however, children of the marriage, and the share so appointed had been dealt with in favour of the children.

In April 1835, Thomas Daniell became bankrupt. By a deed dated the 15th May 1849, his assignees in bankruptcy executed an assignment (inter alia) of his reversionary interest in the one fourth part appointed to Mrs. Trevanion to the trustees of the Economic Life Assurance Society.

Thomas Daniell died on the 5th March 1866, and the funds, subject to the settlement of the 8th Sept. 1806, were divided by the surviving trustee of the settlement. A fourth part was paid by him to the surviving trustee of the post-nuptial settlement of the 11th April 1832, made on the marriage, and one-fourth to the trustees of the settlement made on the marriage of Sophia England.

The bill was filed by the plaintiff, the second husband of Mrs. Trevanion, to set aside the appointments by Mr. and Mrs. Daniell on the ground that an ultimate interest being reserved to Mr. Daniell, they were a fraud on the power of appointment given by the settlement of 1806.

Kay, Q. C. and W. C. Druce appeared for the plaintiff. They cited

Goldsmith v. Goldsmith 2 Ha. 197;
Birley v. Birley, 25 Beav. 299;
Lane v. Page, 1 Ambl. 233;
Topham v. Duke of Portland, 10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 360; 1 De G. J. & S. 517;
Sugden on Powers, 673, 8th edit.

Sir R. Palmer, Q. C. and Hemming, for the trustees of the Economic Life Assurance Society, contended that the appointment was valid.

Eddis, Q. C. and Hamilton Humphreys, for Mrs. England, also supported the appointment. They cited

Fitzroy v. Duke of Richmond, 27 Beav. 190;
Jebb v. Tugwell, 7 De G. M. & G. 633;
Sadler v. Pratt, 5 Sim. 632;
Palgrave v. Atkinson, 1 Coll. C. C. 190;
Rucker v. Scholefield, 1 H. & M. 36.

Fischer appeared for Mrs. Cooper.

W. F. Robinson, W. H. Deverell, and B. B. Swan, for the trustees and other parties.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—The case of the plaintiff in this suit appears to me to be an illustration of a class of cases in which rules laid down by the Court of Chancery for the prevention of fraud are endeavoured to be strained upon some technical grounds, for the purpose of producing fraud in such a way, that one cannot sometimes help wishing that there were a court of equity to correct what the Court of Chancery is doing in these matters. Luckily in this case one is able to deal not with any technical rule, but with the substance and truth of the case, which is this: A father and mother had a power of appointment among their children. Upon the marriage of one of the daughters, who is now the wife of the plaintiff, the father and mother executed an appointment of one quarter of the fund to the daughter. The terms on which the appointment is made are perfectly unimpeachable; it is an appointment to the daughter absolutely, so as to be a vested and transmissible interest in her. But it is said that looking at the whole transaction, and looking at the articles of agreement which were made before that appointment was in form executed, the court is able to see that there was some corrupt purpose, some indirect and sinister purpose in the mind of the father which makes this appointment a fraud in equity. And the sinister purpose is said to be this: That it was agreed by those articles of agreement that there should be a marriage settlement by which in certainly not a very probable event, or a remote event at all events, the fund so appropriated should come back to the father. The fund was settled upon the daughter for life, remainder upon the husband for life, remainder for the children issue of the marriage, and then with an ultimate trust in default of issue to the donee of the power—the appointor. That no doubt, if it stood alone, would be a grave ground for impeaching the settlement. I do not mean in the slightest degree to question those cases which hold that if a donee of a power, directly or indirectly, obtain for himself a personal benefit by reason of the execution of the power, that such exercise of the power is invalid. But you must look at the whole transaction, and in this case the father not only executes the power of appointment by appointing a sum of 5000*l.* for his daughter, but he binds himself (and he being at that time a man in credit the bond was not a sham) in a bond of 5000*l.*, the interest on which seems to have been paid for a great number of years, and even after his bankruptcy has realised for this very trust the not inconsiderable sum of 1500*l.* He himself puts into settlement that bond of 5000*l.*, and gives an immediate interest to the wife, an interest to the husband, and an interest to the children in this fund. Therefore, taking the whole thing together, it is this: He says, "I will appoint to you the 5000*l.* (or whatever the exact sum is), provided you will enter into a bargain with me that for 5000*l.* more, which I am going to pay down directly, you will give me a contingent reversion in this fund." I must look at the substance of the thing. Was that an indirect advantage to the father? Was it any advantage to the father at all that he should be buying a future reversion at such a high price? It appears to me the substance of the transaction was intended substantially for the benefit of the daughter who was the object of the power, and that the contingent benefit which the father got was a thing for which he gave value over and over again, and therefore it is not within the rules at all which apply to those cases. Upon that ground I am of opinion that the appointment is perfectly good. And it seems to me that, upon other grounds, it would be utterly impossible for me, on behalf of this plaintiff, whose wife was a party to the whole transaction, who took the whole benefit under the settlement, and who, when he married his present wife took, and who is now taking the benefit of the purchase-money under the father's bond, to set aside the appointment. I do not know that I should have heard the case out upon that ground; but I thought possibly he might have some ground for setting aside the appointment to Mrs. England, which he was not estopped from impeaching by reason of his being a participator with his wife in the appointment to her. But I think it is impossible to allow him to question the appointment to Mrs. England, for it seems to stand on the same footing as the appointment to Mrs. Cooper; and, independently of that, there is a second ground that the money had got home to the trustees of Mrs. England, and there having been this acquiescence and consent, I do not think I should allow him to disturb the whole family arrangement made on the footing of that acquiescence and consent. Both of those are subsidiary grounds. I base my judgment upon the broad principle, that there was no corrupt, fraudulent, or sinister purpose in the father, but that it was an honest settlement made by him in execution of the power of appointment for the benefit of his daughter. The bill must be dismissed with costs.

Solicitors for the plaintiff; Druce, Son, and Jackson.

Solicitors for the defendants, Johnson and Wetherall; Young and Jackson; Walters, Young, and Deverill; W. H. Haycock.

Saturday, July 31.

Re PATENT FLOOR CLOTH COMPANY.

Practice—Winding-up.

Where an order to continue a voluntary winding-up under supervision had been made on the assumption that the voluntary winding-up had been regular, but which it appeared had not been regular, the proper advertisements not having been inserted—and the official liquidator having sold property, to the title to which the purchaser had objected this irregularity:

By consent, ordered that the order for continuing the voluntary winding-up should be discharged, and the petition reheard, and order made, without the insertion of the necessary advertisements.

An order had been made by this court, dated the 1ct May 1869, to continue the voluntary winding-up of the above company under the supervision of the court.

The official liquidator of the company subsequently caused to be sold the works of the company. On the abstract of title having been forwarded to the purchaser's solicitor, an objection to the title had been raised that the order of the 1st May was irregular, the resolution for the voluntary winding-up of the company having been come to without the formal notices (required by the Companies' Act) convening the meetings having been duly inserted, as provided for by the Act.

W. N. Lawson now moved that the order of the 1st May 1869 might be discharged, and that the petition upon which it had been made might be reheard before the Vice-Chancellor for the purpose of an order to be made thereon curing the defect.

H. A. Giffard, for the official liquidator, having been instructed to consent to this,

The VICE-CHANCELLOR made an order discharging the order of the 1st May, and on the following day, on the same matter being again mentioned, made an order for a compulsory winding-up without requiring fresh advertisements of the petition to be inserted.

Solicitors: Reed, Phelps, and Sedgwick.

In Parliament.

Reported by FREDERICK CLIFFORD, and PEMBROKE S. STEPHENS, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

COURT OF REFEREES ON PRIVATE BILLS.

Monday, April 19.

(Before Sir T. E. COLEBROOKE, M.P., in the chair; Mr. ST. AUBYN, M.P.; and Mr. RICKARDS.)

KINGSTOWN TOWN BILL.

Objections to locus standi of the DUBLIN, WICKLOW and WEXFORD RAILWAY COMPANY.

Township commissioners—Waterworks—Railway Company—Rating powers.

The Commissioners for the township of K. were empowered to construct waterworks and to levy water rates, but did not exercise the power, and in default of such supply, a railway company constructed, at their own expense, an aqueduct for the supply of their station within the township. A Bill was now promoted constituting a new body of commissioners, and empowering them (inter alia) to contract with the corporation of D. for a supply of water for the township and to levy for that purpose such rates as the existing commissioners were authorised to levy.

Held, that though the Bill proposed to give no new rating powers, the railway company had a limited locus standi against clauses relating to water supply.

The Bill was one "to amend 'The Towns' Improvement (Ireland) Act, 1854,' so far as relates to the town of Kingstown, and for other purposes." The petitioners were owners of the line from which they took their names, and were also lessees in perpetuity of the Dublin and Kingstown line. The township of Kingstown was under the management of commissioners appointed under an Act of 1861, which incorporated the Towns Improvement (Ireland) Act, by which Act the Commissioners were empowered, if they thought proper, to construct waterworks to supply the town with water, and to levy rates upon the township to the extent of 1s. 6d. in the pound, where the enactments of the Act with respect to water had been adopted, and to the extent of 1s. in the pound where such enactments with respect to water had not been adopted. It appeared that the Kingstown Commissioners did not exercise that power of making waterworks in the town, and consequently from 1861 to the present time the only rate levied under the Act of 1854 had been the rate of 1s., the town having been principally supplied by springs and wells. In 1863 the Dublin, Wicklow, and Wexford Railway Company finding they required a considerable amount of water for the supply of their stations and locomotives, made, at a considerable expense, an aqueduct extending for about two miles within the township of Kingstown.

The Bill now proposed to divide Kingstown into four wards, to abolish the present commission, and provide a new body of commissioners for the four wards, in the election of which body it did not appear by the Bill that the railway company would have any voice. Clause 36 in the Bill recited as follows: "Whereas by the Dublin Corporation Waterworks Act 1861 the Lord Mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of the borough of Dublin (in the Act called the corporation) are authorised to bring water from the River Vartry for the supply of the inhabitants of Dublin and of certain extra-municipal districts therein named, and to lay down mains for the purpose thereof: After the passing of this Act the commissioners may give notice to the corporation requiring them to supply water for all public and domestic purposes to the commissioners, to be distributed by the commissioners in the township, and thereupon the corporation shall, within six months after the service of the notice, supply, and thenceforth continue to supply, a quantity of water of not less than twenty gallons per head per day for the population of the township from time to time, and the commissioners shall pay, and thenceforth continue to pay, to the corporation for such supply out of the rates levied under the Act of 1854, a yearly rent equivalent in amount to the sum which would be produced by 6*d.* in the pound on the Government valuation from time to time made of the rateable property in the township as rated under the provisions of this Act." And clause 37 provided for the mode in which the money was to be collected by the corporation. In the last clause of the Bill there was a provision that the expenses connected with the obtaining of the powers of the Act should be defrayed out of the rate, "and the same shall be paid, deducted, and retained by the same persons and in the same proportions as if the same were a rate or rates levied for the relief of the poor, in the township; provided also that nothing in the enactment or in this Act shall be construed to alter or increase the maximum of such rates respectively as fixed by the said Acts." It was contended by the petitioners that such legislation would alter their status, and render them liable to rates for water which they did not want, the fact being that owing to the neglect of the commissioners, the petitioners had been obliged to provide a supply of water for themselves.

The locus standi of the petitioners was objected to on the following grounds:—

1. That the said Bill does not seek to originate authority to levy under its powers any new rate or rates, or to alter or increase the maximum of any existing rate or rates for the purposes of the proposed water supply as in the said petition is alleged, the rating powers and provisions at present enforced under the Towns Improvement (Ireland) Act 1854, which it is not proposed to alter or increase, being ample and sufficient for such purposes.

2. That the Bill does not propose in any manner to alter or increase the maximum of the rating powers of the commissioners of the township as at present existing under the Acts now in force in the township.

3. That in seeking to procure water from an admittedly superior and available source, the Bill only seeks power to apply towards the rent or sum to be paid for the proposed new water supply, the water rate or rates which can be levied under the Acts now in force in the said township, and there is no allegation or complaint by the petitioners that such rate or rates are excessive or will be increased.

4. That the proposed Bill does not authorise the taking or interfering with the lands, stations, water reservoirs, or aqueducts, or other accommodations of the petitioners, nor does the said Bill in any way propose to alter, interfere with, or in any manner affect their rights, privileges, or interests.

5. That the grounds of complaint of the said petitioners, if any, are really not applicable to the said Bill, but are applicable to past legislation.

6. That the petitioners disclose no right to be heard against the preamble of the Bill, as the petition discloses their class interests to be limited to the proposed water supply, and not to extend to the wider and general public objects of the Bill.

7. That the locus standi of the petitioners should in their petition have been limited to their appearance against the clauses of the Bill alleged to be injurious.

8. That the said petition does not distinctly specify the ground on which the said petitioners object to the provisions of the said Bill.

Thesiger for the petitioners.—If the Bill passes, the position of the Dublin, Wicklow, and Wexford Railway Company will be altered, for as the commissioners have not availed themselves of their power to provide a water supply, and as we have been obliged to make an aqueduct at considerable expense for the purposes of our undertaking, it would probably be held that we have an equitable right as against the existing commissioners. At all events, no rate has been levied upon the railway company in respect of water, though in other respects they are large ratepayers. The promoters, however, instead of merely putting themselves in the place of the present commissioners, propose at once to make a contract with the Corporation of Dublin, and to impose rates which would be at all events 6*d.*, if not 8*d.*, in addition to the rates already levied. We object to the constitution of any other body of commissioners, with power to levy increased rates, against whom we should have no equitable rights, unless those rights are reserved by clauses. No doubt the railway company would be properly liable to pay a water rate for public purposes, but under the Bill they would be liable to be rated for water for the supply of the houses throughout the town, and would be obliged to pay their share according to their rateability, whether they took the water or not.

Hume Williams.—We seek to impose no new taxation, and the argument on the other side only goes to this—that the petitioners are entitled to a locus standi limited to the clauses referring to the supply of water.

The COURT allowed the locus standi of the Dublin, Wicklow, and Wexford Company so far as they were affected by clauses 36 and 37 (relating to water supply).

Locus standi allowed, as limited.

Agents for petitioners, Holmes, Anton, Greig, and White.

Agent for the Bill, Sharkey.

Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

Reported by DOUGLAS KINGSFORD, ESQ., Barrister-at-Law.

Wednesday, June 30.

(Present: The Right Hon. Sir WILLIAM ERLE, Sir JAMES W. COLVILE, Sir JOSEPH NAPIER, and Lord Justice GIFFARD.)

JEAN BAPTISTE GIRAUD (app.) v. JOHN BORTHWICK PATERSON (resp.).

Constantinople—Lease—Imprisonment of lessee—Collection of crops by lessor—Re-entry on abandonment—Appeal as to nominal interest.

A. leased a farm at Smyrna to B. for six years. B., after one year's occupation, was imprisoned, and A. then sent a person to collect the crops in B.'s absence. B. on leaving prison abandoned the farm, of which A. thereupon resumed possession:

Held (affirming the judgment of the Supreme Consular Court at Constantinople), that B. was not entitled to damages against A.

In a suit in which damages only are claimed, the proof by the appellant of a nominal interest, which might be the subject of an action, with a mere nominal claim for damages, will be no ground for the Judicial Committee to reverse a judgment, given in favour of the respondent in the court below.

This was an appeal from a judgment of Her Majesty's Supreme Consular Court at Constantinople.

Digitized by Google

The original action was brought in the Consular Court at Smyrna by the appellant, a French subject resident at Smyrna, against the respondent, an English merchant carrying on business there.

The appellant's petition in that court, so far as material, alleged that on April 30, 1860, the respondent leased to him the farms of Bergame and Carabouna in the Sandjak of Smyrna, for the term of six years, to be computed from the following October; and that the respondent, without any forfeiture on the part of the appellant, in July 1861 re-entered on the farms, sold the farming implements and stock, and retained the proceeds. And the petition claimed damages for breach of contract and wrongful seizure and sale.

The respondent's answer to this petition, so far as material, alleged that the appellant was in June 1861, for certain illegal acts committed in the said farms, condemned by the Ottoman Supreme Criminal Tribunal at Smyrna to three months' imprisonment and forbidden to re-enter on the said farms; and that the appellant paid no rent while in occupation of the farms, but committed breaches of covenant, and in Aug. 1861 abandoned the farms.

The cause was tried by the Consular Court at Smyrna, in June 1866, with judgment for the respondent, and an appeal to Her Majesty's Supreme Court at Constantinople was dismissed with costs.

This was the subject of the present appeal. Other facts and the effect of the evidence are stated in the judgment.

Montague Bere, Q. C. was for the appellant.

Manisty, Q. C. and Butt, Q. C. were for the respondent.

Judgment was delivered by Sir WILLIAM ERLE:—The petition on the part of the appellant in this case was, in substance, for damages in consequence of his being wrongfully deprived of his property in a certain farm, and the stock that was thereupon. The matter was litigated in the court at Smyrna, and afterwards in the Supreme Consular Court at Constantinople. The judgment of the Consular Court at Constantinople is, that the appellant had no right to the damages which he sued for, and upon the appeal from that judgment the question is raised whether such judgment is right, and their Lordships have come to the conclusion that it is their duty to recommend that the appeal should be dismissed. The interest of the appellant in the farm in question is derived under the indenture of demise, which gave him an interest of six years, to commence in Oct. 1860. There were the usual terms between landlord and tenant for the reparation of a farm in the country where these farms are situated, and covenants for the payments of rent, for the keeping in repair, and for some course of cultivation, as to which their Lordships would make the general remark that it was essential that the lessee should continue in the occupation in order that he might be enabled to do his duty as tenant, in respect of those covenants. There is another provision in the deed, which bears upon the stock. There was a covenant on the part of the lessor for advances to be made by him amounting to 1055 Turkish liras, 555 down, and 500 by way of further advances; and the lessee, Giraud, in consideration of those advances, and by way of security for them, mortgaged, pledged, and made over to Mr. Paterson all the stock upon the farm. It appears that Mr. Giraud entered upon the farm and continued in occupation. There are provisions about rights to the labour of the labourers, and other rights which led to contests, and which led to an unsatisfactory conduct of the farm. Before a year had elapsed there were proceedings, perhaps of a criminal nature, against Mr. Giraud for assault, under which he was arrested and taken to prison, where he was confined for forty-seven days. Before the time of his going to prison, there had been an omission on the part of Mr. Giraud to collect in the crops at the time when they were ripe, and persons were put upon the farm to collect in those crops for the mutual interest of the landlord and the tenant. Upon the whole of the evidence, as it was reviewed by the judge of the Consular Court, and as far as it has been brought to our attention, the fact of Mr. Paterson putting in persons to come upon the farms and collect in the crops in 1861 was not an eviction by Mr. Paterson of Mr. Giraud. Very much turns upon the point whether or no Mr. Paterson can be considered to have been the cause of, or in any way accessory to bringing about the arrest of Mr. Giraud and taking him to prison. The imputation has been made. It has been attempted to be supported here by a report heard by Mr. Giraud from some of the witnesses that they had been paid by Mr. Paterson to come; but their Lordships are of opinion that there is no sound ground upon which they can rely in fixing upon Mr. Paterson an imputation of such very grave guilt as procuring Mr. Giraud to be wrongfully arrested and confined in prison in order that during the time that he was so confined he might take advantage of his absence, take possession of his farm, and otherwise damage him in respect of his property. Their Lordshigs can find no ground for that imputation. Then, having cleared the ground so far, their Lordships come to that which is the cardinal point on which their opinion turns; and the cardinal point upon which the judgment of the consul in the court below turned. He states that the point is, who first by his own act annulled this contract? Mr. Giraud says that the imprisonment was substantially the breaking of that contract; but it is not found that that was caused by Mr. Paterson. Then whilst Mr. Giraud was in prison it seems that he had formed the intention of what may be described as abandoning the farm. He came to the conclusion that his imprisonment had been procured through Mr. Paterson, and his evidence at page 19, line 63, is in effect that he did not return to Bergame because he knew it was in possession of Mr. Paterson's agents whom he had seen there—the agents that were put there to collect the crops, as we understand the evidence. He goes on to say, "I did not go near Mr. Paterson after I was released, and I did not go back to the farm, and did not intend to go, as I intended to sue him, Mr. Paterson; and as far as I was concerned, I did not care what became of the farm." Their Lordships in this case find a great conflict of evidence about many of the facts, but the cardinal fact of the case, in their judgment, is established by the plain explicit statement of Mr. Giraud himself. They have no hesitation in relying upon that statement, and they gather from it that he, knowing that the farm was vacant, intentionally avoided returning to that farm, intentionally left it for Mr. Paterson at his peril to deal with it as he might choose, but it was a vacant possession which the tenant had abandoned; and according to the passage that I have read it is an abandonment, not without example, probably, in many parts of the British dominions, where the tenant, believing that he has got an interest for some time, does not intend to do his duty as tenant, and cultivate the farm, and keep up as well as he can a performance of the duties which are cast upon him by the lease, but means to keep the nominal interest in the farm, and rest entirely upon the litigation and the damages which he may obtain in the course of the litigation. We do not at all pretend to judge between Mr. Giraud and Mr. Paterson, further than as to the facts upon which our judgment is founded.

Mr. Giraud was of opinion that Mr. Paterson was the cause of his imprisonment. If he was wrong in that, we think that he was not justified in abandoning that farm, and not justified in bringing any litigation upon Mr. Paterson for preventing that farm from being ruined, and taking possession of it, and taking care of it. Mr. Giraud did not intend to go back. So far as the interest in the farm is concerned, their Lordships think that there would be no claim to damages. Then, with respect to the stock that was left on the farm, the amount of the stock is a matter upon which there is much conflicting evidence. Upon one side, Mr. Giraud makes a large claim; on the other side, there is no evidence upon which the consul in the court below could rely, and the provision in the indenture of lease that the whole of the stock on the farm should be considered as mortgaged to secure repayment to the plaintiff of the advances of 1055 Turkish liras, comes in aid of Mr. Paterson to prevent any claim for substantial damages in respect of the stock that was upon the farm, and which was charged as a mortgage security. The term had not, in time, come to an end, but the term virtually, as between landlord and tenant, was at an end; the interest of the tenant was abandoned, and in substance the intention of the parties to that mortgage would be carried out by holding that the landlord, with that mortgage, was entitled to secure himself by the stock upon the farm. This being a suit in which damages alone are to be recovered, if there was a nominal interest which might be the subject of an action in some of the courts of common law, that species of nominal interest for the mere nominal claim for damages would be no ground before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council to recommend that the judgment of the court below should be reversed, and the appellant to be entitled to their Lordships' judgment. Their Lordships will, therefore, recommend to Her Majesty that this appeal be dismissed with costs.

Judgment affirmed.

Agents for appellant, Randall and Angier.

Agent for respondent, T. R. Kent.

Common Law Courts.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

Reported by W. GRAHAM and M. W. MCKELLAR, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Tuesday, May 4.

WAYGOOD AND ANOTHER (Petitioners) v. JAMES (Respondent).

TAUNTON ELECTION PETITION.

Parliament—Election petition—Effect of decision of judge seating a candidate claiming the seat—Second petition—31 & 32 Vict. c. 125, s. 11, paragraph 13.

A petition was presented against the return of C. and claiming the seat for J. The judge decided that C. was not duly elected, and that J. was:

Held, that the decision of the judge was final, and that no further petition could be presented against the return of J.

This was a rule calling on the petitioners to show cause why an election petition should not be taken off the file under the following circumstances:

It appeared from the affidavits that at the late election for the borough of Taunton there were three candidates, Cox, Barclay, and James. The election took place on the 18th Nov. 1868, when Cox and Barclay were declared to be duly elected. A petition was subsequently presented against the return of Cox by two electors, who prayed the seat for James; and the grounds of the petition were bribery, treating, and undue influence. Cox, the respondent, duly gave notice that he intended to object to the return of James, on the grounds of bribery and treating, but at the trial no witnesses were called by the respondent, though his counsel cross-examined the witnesses for the petitioners with a view to prove bribery and treating on the part of James, and in his speech contended that such bribery and treating was proved. The trial took place before Blackburn, J., who, on the 5th March, certified that Cox had been guilty of bribery by his agent, that James had not been guilty of bribery or treating, and on the scrutiny that James was duly elected. The Speaker communicated this certificate to the House, and the House ordered the clerk of the Crown in Chancery to attend the House with the return. On the 9th March the clerk of the Crown attended at the Bar of the House with the return, and erased the name of Cox, and inserted that of James, but made no other alteration in the return. On the 29th March, and within the proper time if any petition could under the circumstances be presented, Sundays and Good Fridays not being counted, this petition was presented by two voters against the return of James, on the ground of bribery, treating, and undue influence. This rule was subsequently obtained calling on the petitioners to show cause why the petition should not be taken off the file, on the ground that the judgment of Blackburn, J. was final, and that no fresh petition could be presented.

Manisty, Q. C. and Cohen now showed cause. By the 31 & 32 Vict. c. 125, s. 5, it is enacted that a petition may be presented against an undue return or undue election. That section is general and absolute in its terms without qualification. By sect. 6 the petition is to be presented within twenty-one days after the return has been made to the clerk of the Crown in Chancery, unless the petition alleges corrupt payments after the return, in which case it is to be presented within twenty-eight days after such payment. There was, therefore, no means of petitioning against the return of James open to any of the constituents up to at least the 5th March, as he was not returned till that date, or the 9th March. By the 7 & 8 Will. 3, c. 7, s. 5, every return must be entered in a book kept by the clerk of the Crown. The entry could not in this case be made before the 9th March, and the entry is to be made within six days after the return comes into the office of the clerk of the Crown. Therefore, as James was not returned until the 9th March, this petition is justifiable and in proper time, unless there is something in the Act to prevent its being presented. By sect. 11, par. 13, of the 31 & 32 Vict. c. 125, the determination of the judge is to be final to all intents and purposes, and he is to determine who is duly elected or returned; and by sect. 53, where the seat is claimed, the respondent may give evidence to show that the election of the petitioner was void in the same way as if he had presented a petition. Under that section Cox might have gone into the question of the undue election of James if he had liked, but it was not compulsory; and the argument on the other side is, that if he avails himself of that power any other petitioner is barred, and that it is immaterial whether he does so in a hostile manner or not. [WILLES, J.—It is the same as if two petitions were tried, and another petitioner proposed to try the question over again.] Any number of petitions may be presented in the first instance, and by sect. 32 if they are not prosecuted vigorously the judge may call witnesses, which seems to meet the case of a petitioner not acting bonâ fide; but there is no such provision for a case like this. If this petition is not allowed, the constituency are at the mercy of the sitting member, who, as soon as his seat is declared void, has no interest in the matter. [WILLES, J. referred to the Southampton case, Rogers on Elections, 8th edit. 470, where a petition was disallowed, on the ground that the charges might have been brought forward on a former petition.] Under this statute there is no discretion vested in the court, and all the arguments of the other side would apply to a case where the recriminatory case had not been gone into at all. By the 5th section a petition may be presented by any member of the constituency within twenty-one days after the return, and there is nothing in the Act which says that that section does not apply to a case like the present. If this petition is not allowed the result will be that a candidate may become a member against whom no petition could ever be presented, and none but the sitting member could advance a recriminatory case.

Digitized by Google

Mellish, Q. C., Giffard, Q. C., and Griffits, in support of the rule.—This is a judgment in rem to determine who is elected, and the question cannot be reopened as if it was an inquiry inter partes. That it is not a mere proceeding inter partes is shown by the provisions in the Act for changing the petitioner and respondent. The House is to take the decision of the judge as final, and it would be an enormous inconvenience that where a gentleman has been charged with bribery, and has fought it out and been declared innocent, any elector may raise the question again. The candidate who claims the seat and thus presents a recriminatory case, is in the position of a petitioner, and the law presumes that the sitting member will duly represent his party; and if the respondent abandons the defence, any elector may come in and conduct the recriminatory case. The whole scheme of the Act is against the contention of these petitioners, and therefore the court ought to give effect to the plain words of sect. 11, which say that the decision of the judge shall be final.

BOVILL, C. J.—In this case a petition, which was presented by two voters, sought to avoid the election of Mr. Serjeant Cox, and claimed the seat on behalf of Mr. James, and upon such petition it is clear, according to the Act of Parliament, that a distinct issue was raised on each point involved in the petition. Sect. 53 of the Act gives jurisdiction to the judge to try the issues with respect to the candidate on whose behalf the seat is claimed. By rule 7 of the rules framed by the election judges, and other rules, provision is made for carrying into effect the intention of the Legislature, and trying all the issues raised on the petition. It is true that the candidate may be no party to the petition, but that was known to the Legislature, and from the nature of things it is probable that the inquiries in such cases will be conducted without collusion. The inquiry is one not as between party and party, but affecting the constituency, and the members and the House of Commons itself. Some inquiry is to be made, and that is now to be before one of the judges, and he is to determine the issues raised. One of those issues may be if a candidate was duly elected at the election. That was an issue distinctly raised in this case, and the parties might go into it or abandon it; but there was an opportunity to discuss and determine it. If the decision be against the candidate, he is disqualified. If it be in his favour, the consequences follow that the return is amended, and there are provisions in the Act to carry out the decision of the judge. In the present case, of all others, the matter is res judicata, as not only was the issue raised, but it was gone into; evidence was not produced by the sitting member, but he was contented with the cross-examination, and in that way evidence was submitted to the judge, and counsel argued the question. Therefore, the issue was raised, evidence upon it was gone into, and the judge gave his decision. I am at a loss to distinguish this case from one where witnesses have been examined, and a scrutiny has been gone into lasting several days or weeks, and a decision given in favour of the candidate. In such a case could it be the intention of the Legislature that exactly the same question should be gone into again, possibly before another judge, and in fact an appeal, without any power of appeal being given in the Act? Sect. 11, paragraph 13, expressly declares that the decision of the judge shall be final to all intents and purposes. Can it be final unless it is to conclude the parties on the matters which were in issue? That it is to be final is shown by the express words of the Act, and there is no power of appeal; and by sect. 13 the House of Commons, on being informed by the Speaker of the certificate and report or reports of the judge, is to order the same to be entered in their journals, and to give the necessary directions for confirming or altering the return, or for issuing a writ for a new election, or for carrying the determination into execution as circumstances may require. In this view of the case it seems that in every instance where the seat is claimed, whether the matter is gone into or not, as it is a case the judge may determine, his determination is equally conclusive whether evidence is given or not. Therefore, if the seat is claimed there can be no new petition; and I can understand why that should be the scope of the Act, as that was substantially the practice which obtained before the Act was passed Where the seat was claimed Parliament would not allow the matter to be gone into again, and here the question was not only raised, but was gone into. Under the former practice, where the petition proceeded on technical grounds, it seems that it was necessary to apply for special permission to allow a petition to be presented. It is sufficient to say that in this Act of Parliament there is no clause to authorise a new petition being presented. The status of the member is decided by the judgment, and that is binding on every person, both electors and candidates. Therefore, I am of opinion that the present rule should be made absolute, not to take the petition off the file, as the petition has been presented, but, on the ground that the matter has been already determined, I think all further proceedings upon it should be stayed.

WILLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. I agree that it is better to stay proceedings on the petition, in order that the court may have jurisdiction over the deposit. On the main question the only doubt I have had is this, that unquestionably James has been subjected to assaults from a less numerous body of opponents than if he had been returned in the first instance, as then any voters might have presented a petition; but, as matters turned out, he was only exposed to the recriminatory charge at the suit of Cox, or, if he had withdrawn, at the suit of any person who might have been substituted as a respondent. It has been said that a member not returned in the first instance goes through a less searching ordeal; but I do not think that that is a practical objection, because, though each voter may present a petition against a person returned, he is not entitled to do so in respect of any private claim—he does so as the representative of the electors of the borough; and the object of the Legislature was that there should be an ample opportunity for investigation. If an unsuccessful candidate petitions and does not claim the seat, no harm can befall; but if he claims the seat, then the respondent is entitled to protect himself, and before the scrutiny to prove a recriminatory case, to show that the petitioner cannot stand in the place of the respondent. If he prove a recriminatory case, the petitioner may go into a scrutiny to turn him out, but he cannot get the seat himself. But the interest of the person who claims the seat, and the person who for the time has it, is sufficient to insure a proper inquiry and all proper means being used. That may account for the Legislature being content with its being in the option of the respondent to bring forward a recriminatory case. Besides this, a respondent who proceeds to trial gives pledges of good faith, and if he feels disposed to cry craven, the Act provides for his doing so, when no great costs are incurred. And then the Act furnishes ample means for advertising, and any other person coming in. We must be guided by the Act of Parliament, and it appears to me not to be competent to bring forward this matter again, especially as it has once been disposed of. There is also the opinion of a distinguished Speaker (see the Southampton case) that these proceedings could not be taken under the old practice. If there should be a case of collusion and fraud, I conceive that under the terms of the Act, if beyond our competence, it is within the general competence of the House of Commons to deal with the return of their members. Therefore, I think that this rule should be absolute.

M. SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. The original petition involved not only the question whether Cox was duly elected, but also if the person for whom the seat was claimed was duly elected. On those questions the decision of the judge must be given, and I think that decision is final. Language could hardly be stronger that that of paragraph 13 of sect. 11. On the trial of the petition, the judge is to determine whether the member whose return or election is complained of, or any and what other person was duly returned or elected, or whether the election was void. The judge was therefore bound to determine who was duly elected, and to certify such determination to the Speaker, and on such determination being certified, it is to be final to all intents and purposes. How can it be said that the determination of the judge that Mr. James was duly elected is not final? The statute gives no means of reviewing it, but, on the contrary, says that it is to be final to all intents and purposes. Mr. Manisty pointed out certain consequences which might arise from the electors not being able to question a decision under such circumstances; but more serious consequences might arise if a second petition were allowed, as besides the expense and vexation of a second inquiry, two judges of co-ordinate jurisdiction might give opposite decisions on the same evidence. If the evil suggested by Mr. Manisty exists, the Legislature must supply the remedy by letting voters in to present a counter petition against a person claiming the seat. The whole scheme of the Act is that there shall be but one inquiry, and that the decision on that is a decision in rem, and shall be final.

BRETT, J.—I am of the same opinion. It seems to me that there are two questions, first, whether under the circumstances any petition could be presented, and, secondly, if it could, whether it is proper that it should be tried. Neither question could arise except in a case where the seat is claimed on the first petition. As to the first question, I think that this petition could not properly be presented before the decision in the first petition, as till that decision was given the candidate claiming the seat was not returned. Then, after the decision by sect. 13, there is not to be a new return made, but the old return is to be altered, and when altered it bears the original date. Therefore I think that this petition could not be presented; and that does not tend to any injustice, as a candidate who claims the seat lays himself open to all the consequences to which a successful candidate is liable on petition. If, however, this is not so, then the next question is if there can be a second trial, and I think not, as the judgment in the first case is a judgment on the status of a person, and binding on all the world. It is to be binding not only on the persons, but also on the House of Commons, as they are obliged to carry out the decision of the judge, and that is strong to show that it is final against all the world. That is also shown by the power which is given by the Act of changing the petitioners and respondents. Two objections were argued by Mr. Manisty—first, that, assuming that the respondent's case was not conducted with strength, and yet without fraud, the decision is binding on the constituency. That is to some extent true, but sect. 32 is the means adopted by the Legislature to meet such a case. It may be that sect. 32 is not effective; but I can give no meaning to sect. 32, except that it was passed to meet the difficulty suggested. Then it is said that the petitioner and the respondent may fraudulently collude, but a judgment in rem may be set aside on the ground of fraud, and it might in such a case be argued that the judgment was not final. What would be the means of re-opening the question I cannot say; it may be that there could be a new trial with substituted parties, or, as suggested by my brother Willes, the House of Commons might themselves deal with the question. But suppose that is not so, then all that can be said is that this is a casus omissus, and does not alter the construction to be put upon the Act. I am, therefore, of opinion that this petition could not properly be presented; and, if properly presented, I think it cannot be proceeded with.

Rule absolute, with costs, to stay all proceedings on the petition.

Attorney for the petitioners, W. A. Boyle.

Attorneys for the respondent, Wyatt and Hoskins.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

Reported by H. LEIGH and E. LUMLEY, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law

Jan. 23, and April 16 and 30.

LENEY AND ANOTHER v. TAPLIN.

Vendor and purchaser—Sale and purchase of goods—Contract contained in a series of letters—Proposal and acceptance—Cheque to be sent on account—Agreement in writing to be drawn up—Conditions precedent to contract—Introduction of new term—Construction of contract—Pleading.

After a personal treaty between plaintiffs and defendants, for the purchase by the former of certain ricks of hay, at which no bargain was come to, defendant, on Tuesday, the 14th July, wrote as follows to the plaintiffs: "Since I saw you, I have been offered 4l. 12s. 6d. per ton, fetched from my farm two of the ricks, and I am to draw the two others to W., five miles. If you like to take the four ricks at 4l. 15s. per ton, delivered at W., reckoning the four ricks to contain sixty tons by rough estimation, and you to give me a cheque for 270*l.* on account of it, and to have an agreement drawn up to what we agreed to." On the 15th, plaintiffs replied as follows: "We will take the four ricks (say about sixty tons), at 4l. 15s. per ton, delivered at W., as per your letter of 14th. We have deferred sending you a cheque, as your name is not signed quite plain enough for the writing of one. We shall therefore be glad if you will send us your name, and we will send you a cheque by return of post." Nothing further passed between the parties till the 18th July, when plaintiffs wrote to defendant the following letter: "We now inclose you cheque for 270l. on account of your hay, and an agreement for you to sign and return to us. We should have sent you a cheque before, but could not make out your name correctly." In this letter there was also inclosed with the cheque a written agreement in the following form: "18th July 1868. Received of Mr. S. Leney 270l. on account of four ricks of hay, about sixty tons, as seen by Mr. E. Leney, at 4l. 15s. per ton, delivered to W., Mr. Leney to take only such as is fit for market." To this the defendant replied on the 20th July, returning the cheque, and saying that, not having heard from the plaintiffs, as he expected to have done, on Thursday the 16th July, he had sold the hay at 4l. 12s. 6d. a ton, to another purchaser, who was to bind and take it away. Thereupon, plaintiffs brought an action for breach of the defendant's contract to deliver the hay, and it was Held, by Kelly, C. B., and Bramwell, B. (making absolute the rule to set aside a nonsuit), that the plaintiffs' letter of the 15th July was a clear and unconditional acceptance of the proposal in the defendant's letter of the 14th, and that thereupon there was a completed contract between them, on the breach of which by the defendant an action lay for non-performance.

Digitized by Google

The sending of the cheque was not a condition precedent to the constitution of a contract, but as soon as the contract was made there was an obligation on the plaintiffs to send the cheque forthwith. And (per Bramwell, B.) had there been a plea that it was not sent within a reasonable time, that is, forthwith, according to the contract, the defendant, upon such a plea, might have succeeded.

Also, per Bramwell, B., upon receipt of the plaintiff's letter of the 18th July, containing the agreement with the new and additional term relating to the plaintiffs' taking only such hay as was "fit for market," the defendant should at once have replied, objecting to the introduction of such new term:

Held, contra, by Martin and Cleasby, BB. (discharging the above rule), that there was no completed contract between the parties, the plaintiff's letter of the 15th not complying with, and being no fulfilment of the terms of the defendant's letter of the 14th July, inasmuch as neither a cheque nor an agreement was sent therewith. And the agreement that was afterwards sent, on the 18th July, was not what the defendant stipulated for, as it contained a fresh term in addition to the original proposal. There never was, therefore, in this case, that "concurrence of intention in both parties" which is necessary for the completion of a contract.

The plaintiffs who were hay contractors living at Paddington, sued the defendant, a farmer of Great Missenden, in the county of Buckingham, for a breach of contract in failing to deliver two ricks of hay, and a rick of clover, and a rick of sanfoin, the four ricks containing together about sixty tons, which the defendant had bargained and sold to the plaintiffs, and the plaintiffs had bought of the defendant at the price of 4l. 15s. per ton, to be delivered by the defendant for the plaintiffs at Wycombe, and which contract of delivery the defendant had disabled himself from performing by selling and delivering the said goods to another person, whereby the plaintiffs lost certain sums, &c.

The defendant pleaded a plea denying the contract, on which plea issue was joined.

At the trial before Martin, B., in Middlesex, on the 8th Dec. last, it appeared that, in the month of July 1868, one of the plaintiffs called on the defendant at his farm, and treated with him for the purchase of certain ricks of hay, but no bargain was then come to between them. On Tuesday, the 14th of the same month, however, the defendant wrote and sent by post the following letter to the plaintiffs:

July 14, 1868.

Dear Sir,—Since I saw you I have been offered 4l. 12s. 6d. per ton, fetched from my farm two of the ricks, and I am to draw the two others to Windsor, five miles, when I go for coals. If you like to take the two single ricks in the fields, and the clover and sanfoin ricks in the rick yard, at 4l. 15s. per ton, delivered at Wycombe, reckoning the four ricks to contain by rough estimation sixty tons, and you to give me a cheque for 270l. on account of it, and to have an agreement drawn up to what we agreed to. I keep the rough rick for my own feed.—Yours obliged, OWEN TAPLIN.

In reply to this letter the plaintiffs, on the 15th July, wrote and sent the following answer by post to the defendant:

20, Bridge-terrace, Harrow-road,
Paddington, London, 15 July, 1868.

Dear Sir,—We will take the two ricks hay and the rick of clover and sanfoin (say about sixty tons), at 4l. 15s. per ton, delivered at Wycombe, as per your letter of the 14th inst. We have deferred sending you a cheque, as your name is not signed quite plain enough for the writing of one; we shall therefore be glad if you will send us your name, and we will send you cheque by return of post.—Yours truly, S. and E. LENEY.
Mr. Owen Taplin. Per WM. GIBSON.

Nothing further passed between the parties until, on the 18th July, the plaintiffs wrote and sent to the defendant a letter, inclosing their cheque for 270l., and also an agreement for the defendant's signature, which letter and agreement were as follows:—

20, Bridge-terrace, Harrow-road,
Paddington, London, 18th July, 1868.

Sir,—I now enclose you cheque for 270l. on account of your hay, and an agreement for you to sign and return to me. I should have sent you a cheque before, but could not make out your name correctly. Your reply by return will oblige.—Your's truly, S. LENEY.
O. Taplin, Esq. Per WM. GIBSON.

Rignall Farm, Great Missenden,
18th July 1868.

Received of Mr. S. Leney the sum of 270l. on account of four ricks of hay about 60 tons, as seen by Mr. Edward Leney. Two ricks standing in the fields, and a rick of clover and a rick of sanfoin, both standing in the rick yard, at 4l. 15s. per ton delivered to High Wycombe Station. Mr. Leney to take only such as is fit for market, 270l.

In reply to that letter the defendant wrote the following letter to the plaintiffs:

Rignall, July 20.

Sir,—I was away from home when your first note came, or I should have replied to have saved you the trouble of sending me a cheque for the hay, and which I return to you. I wrote to you on Tuesday about the hay, and of course thought I should have your reply by Thursday, and not hearing from you, having made arrangements with another party to look at the hay, and having driven seven miles the second time, they bought it of me at 4l. 12s. 6d.; they to bind it, and take it away within five weeks. I am very sorry to disappoint you, but not hearing from you I quite came to the conclusion that you had declined it at the price.—Yours truly, OWEN TAPLIN.
To Mr. Samuel Leney.

The above letters were all put in evidence, and the learned Baron was of opinion at the close of the plaintiff's case that there was no contract, no part payment, and no delivery or acceptance, to satisfy the Statute of Frauds, and he directed a nonsuit to be entered, reserving leave to the plaintiffs' counsel to move; and accordingly in Hilary Term last a rule nisi was moved for and obtained by J. O. Griffits, for the plaintiff, to set aside the nonsuit, and to enter a verdict for the plaintiffs for 30l. (the agreed amount of damages), pursuant to the above leave, on the grounds that there was evidence in support of the contract declared on; that the letters proved at the trial amounted to a contract, and that upon the evidence the plaintiffs were entitled to the verdict. Against which rule,

Powell, Q. C., A. Codd, and F. Turner for the defendant showed cause.—The ruling of Martin, B. was correct. This was a proposal to sell the four ricks reckoning them as sixty tons at so much a ton, and then a cheque was to be sent on account and an agreement in writing to be drawn up. But the proposal was not accepted in its original terms. No agreement or cheque was sent until the offer was withdrawn, and the agreement, when it was subsequently sent, contained a new term. The defendant was clearly, therefore, released from his original offer. A proposal must be accepted in its precise terms in order to complete a contract thereon. Vollans v. Fletcher, 1 Ex. 20; 16 L. J., N. S., 173, Ex.; and numberless other cases, establish that point. (They were here stopped by the court, who called on)

O'Malley, Q. C. and J. O. Griffits for the plaintiffs, to support their rule, who contended that the letters of the 14th and 15th July constituted a complete agreement between the parties. With regard to what was called the "new term" in the acceptance of the proposal, it was in evidence, and was not contradicted, that it was usual in the hay trade to insert such a condition, and that such a condition was incorporated in every bargain for so large a quantity of hay at such a price. [CLEASBY, B.—Your main point, of course, is that the two letters of the 14th and 15th July constitute a contract.] That is so. There is no plea of the party not being ready and willing to perform the contract, or that a cheque was not sent in proper time. The simple question is, aye or no, was there a contract? The plaintiff's letter of the 15th is a clear acceptance, word by word, in the terms of the defendant's proposal of the 14th. Had the market been falling and the plaintiffs failed to send a cheque, the defendant might have sued them for breach of contract in not sending it; or, if the hay had not been sent, the defendant might have been sued by them. [CLEASBY, B.—Do you say that the seller was bound if the purchaser did not send the cheque?] The contract was complete, though he may not have been bound to deliver until the cheque was sent. We contend that the letter of the 15th is simpliciter an acceptance; and in the defendant's letter, written at the time of a rising market, there is no attempt to excuse himself on the ground now put forward. Thomas v. Dering and others, in the Rolls, 1 Keen, 729, 6 L. J., N. S., 267, Ch., is an authority in favour of the plaintiffs. Lord Langdale says, "It is true that mention is made in the letters of an intended formal contract to be afterwards drawn up, but there are many cases in which a correspondence, referring to the future execution of a more formal agreement, has been held to constitute in itself a valid contract; and I think that the correspondence is equivalent to a contract in the present case." That is precisely this case.

A. Codd and F. Turner, for the defendant, contra.—Thomas v. Dering does not apply, for we say that the letter of the 18th is not in compliance with the letter of the 14th, and is not, therefore, a contract ad idem. [KELLY, C. B.—Suppose the letter of the 15th had contained a cheque, would there then have been a binding contract?] No. There was to be an agreement drawn up. The letters of the 14th and 15th July formed no contract, and no action would lie upon them. The letter of the 18th introduced a new term, as to the plaintiff's liberty of selecting such hay only as he chose, which he had no right to insert, and the defendant was not bound to accept. The case of Thomas v. Dering (ubi sup.), relied on by the plaintiffs, has been much shaken in the House of Lords: (see Sug. V. & P., last edit., p. 141); Ridgway v. Horton, 6 H. of L. Cas., per Lord Wensleydale, at p. 306; The Governor and Guardians, &c., of the Poor of Kingston-upon-Hull v. Petch, 10 Ex. 610; 24 L. J., N. S., 23, Ex. (per Parke, B.) where it was held that the acceptance of a tender, where it was the intention of the parties that a written contract should be executed, was not a binding contract. The written agreement in the present case was an equally important term of the contract, and was meant to obviate all chance of dispute: (Honyman v. Marriott, 6 H. of L. Cas. 112. [CLEASBY, B.—Is not the effect of the letter of the 14th July rather this: If you will send me a cheque for 270*l.* on account, then I will enter into an agreement with you?] There was no complete contract between the parties.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 16.—The learned judges differing, and being equally divided in opinion, the following judgments were now delivered seriatim:

CLEASBY, B.—The only question for our consideration in this case is, whether or not there was a completed contract between these parties; and I have come to the conclusion that there was none. In order to the completion of a contract it is necessary that there should be, in the words of Lord Coke, "a concurrence of intention in both parties," and until that is the case there can be no complete contract, and, until there is such a complete, contract either party is at liberty to withdraw from the arrangement. Where a proposal for a contract is made by letter the person making it cannot withdraw until the time limited for its acceptance by the other party, when, if it be not accepted, he is at liberty to withdraw. The contract here relied upon by the plaintiff is contained in some three or four letters. The first of them is the letter of the 14th July 1868, from the defendant to the plaintiffs, and it is as follows. [Reads the letter.] Now the effect of that letter, to my mind, is this: I have certain ricks of hay on my farm containing, as I estimate them, so many tons weight, which I will enter into a contract with you to sell to you at 4*l.* 15*s.* a ton, delivered, if you, the plaintiffs, will do two things, that is to say, send me a cheque for 270*l.* on account, and have an agreement in writing drawn up stating the terms of our contract. I can see no other construction to be put upon it. It cannot be that the defendant meant to let the plaintiffs take the hay whenever they liked, and as much or as little of it as they liked, and to pay for it whenever they liked. That being so, then comes the plaintiffs' answer to that letter; it is dated the 15th July, and is in the following terms. [Reads the letter.] That letter does not comply with, and is not a fulfilment of the terms of the previous letter of the defendant, for neither a cheque nor an agreement is sent to him; and, according to my construction of it, there was then no contract; nor have I any doubt in my own mind that Taplin, the defendant, might then have written to the plaintiffs, and have said, "As you have not complied with the terms of my letter of the 14th by sending me a cheque for the 270*l.*, and an agreement in writing, I shall withdraw from the bargain altogether." Presently afterwards, however, on the 18th July, comes another letter from the plaintiffs, and it is said by the learned counsel who have argued the rule on their behalf, that, even if before this date the contract was not completed, yet this letter, coupled with the two previous letters, makes it so. That letter is as follows. [Reads the letter.] With that letter there is sent to the defendant a receipt, which they call an agreement, and which is in these terms. [Reads the agreement.] I cannot help reading the cheque for 270*l.*, and the agreement together, for I find them put together on the 14th July, when the defendant writes. [Reads this letter.] And the plaintiffs so understood it, for on the 18th they send a cheque for the amount, and what they call an agreement. But is it such an agreement as the defendant stipulated for? I think it is not; it contains something additional, a fresh term in addition to the terms originally proposed in the letter of the 14th. Had the plaintiffs sent the cheque, and such an agreement as was intended by the original proposal, in proper time, the contract no doubt would have been complete. They did not do so, however, and meantime the other party, the defendant, had withdrawn from the contract and sold the hay to another person at a lower price. Here then we have on the 14th July, a proposal of the defendant for a contract, the terms being that a cheque and a written agreement should be sent to him by the plaintiffs. On the 15th a letter from the plaintiffs, agreeing to the bargain, but containing no cheque and no written agreement, is sent; and on the 18th a cheque is sent, together with an agreement, differing in some of its terms from that originally contemplated. There has been, therefore, no "concurrence of intention in both parties" in the present case, and accordingly I am of opinion that the plaintiffs' rule should be discharged.

BRAMWELL, B.—I think that this rule ought to be made absolute. There is a difference of opinion upon the bench; and perhaps this case may be cited to prove that what is the common notion about the uncertainty of the law is correct, but the fact is, there is not the slightest doubt in the mind of any one of us as to what the law is. The only question is as to its applicability to the facts of the case. Here a man contracts as follows:—"I will sell you certain ricks of hay at 4*l.* 15*s.* per ton, to be delivered at Wycombe." Then there is written this, "reckoning them to contain by rough estimation sixty tons, so then you may safely pay me down 270*l.*, and that will leave a balance of 15*l.* coming to me." The meaning of the expression, "You will give me a cheque for 270*l.* on account" to my mind, is "you will pay cash, 270*l.*" There is no magic in the cheque, but the meaning is this, "I will sell my ricks of hay at 4*l.* 15*s.* per ton, and you must pay 270*l.* on account, and by rough estimate there may be at least sixty tons." What do the plaintiffs say? "We will take the two ricks of hay, and the rick of clover and sanfoin, say about sixty tons, at 4*l.* 15*s.* per ton, delivered at Wycombe as per your letter of 14th inst." Whatever the meaning of the first letter was, that is the answer. My brother Cleasby, it seems, understands the meaning of the parties to be that there was to be no contract even until the cheque was sent. With all respect for his opinion, I think it should be taken in this sense, that, as soon as the contract was made, there was an obligation to send the cheque, but I do not think the sending of the cheque can be any part of the contract. Suppose the agreement had actually been to pay in cash 270*l.*, the payment of cash was to immediately follow. I test the case in this way, suppose the plaintiffs had simply said, "We accept your offer which is contained in your letter of the 14th July," could it be doubted that the defendant could have maintained an action for the 270*l.* cash down? If that be so, there was a contract between them by those two letters. In every case, where a man says "I will sell you such and such goods, and on the terms of ready money," there is no contract until the ready money is paid. It seems to me the two letters mean this, and that is all; the defendant says "I will sell you the hay at 4*l.* 15*s.*, and you pay 270*l.* down," and the plaintiffs say, "We buy it on those terms," then that is the contract between them. It places the parties at once under a contract, and, as I read it, it was the duty of the plaintiffs to send the cheque within a reasonable time, and that is forthwith. They ought, therefore, immediately to have sent the cheque, and had there been a plea that it was not sent within a reasonable time, or forthwith, according to the contract, the defendant, upon such a plea, might have succeeded. But there is no such plea here. There was here, in my opinion, a contract which involved the duty of sending the cheque, which duty is not actually performed by the plaintiffs. As I understand the proposition of my brother Cleasby, it is that these letters are not quite ad idem with what the defendant contends he offered and the plaintiffs accepted. But I do not think so. Again, if the agreement had been in conformity with the original proposition, and the defendant had taken it, there would have been a good contract, because there would have been an acceptance, although afterwards revoked. Then it is said the agreement is not in conformity with the original offer. It certainly is not. The agreement is only to take some of the ricks at a price; that does not seem to alter the matter, as what the defendant ought to have said thereupon was, "You have accepted my offer, and now you send me an agreement not in conformity with it." Suppose a man says to me, "I will give you a lease for a whole term in consideration of a premium of 50*l.*, which you must pay down," and I write to him and say, "I accept the offer, and I send you a cheque for the 50*l.*, and also the lease," and the lease contains certain covenants that are not usual, is he not entitled to say, "I object to those covenants"? I should say yes. Therefore in the first place, in my judgment, the sending of the cheque was not a condition precedent to the constituting a contract; and, even supposing it were so, then, when the plaintiff's second letter was sent, the defendant was bound to object to the new clause in the agreement. It seems to me, therefore, upon these two grounds, more particularly upon the first, that the plaintiffs are entitled to succeed.

MARTIN, B.—I am of opinion that my brother Cleasby's view of this case is right, and that there was no contract between these parties. I quite agree with my Brother Bramwell that there is no difference amongst us as to the law upon this matter, but only as to how a contract of this sort ought to be read. I think it should be according to the obvious, natural, meaning of the words used, and it is not because there may be a condition as part of it, that there should be a different construction put upon the words of it from that which their common, ordinary, and natural meaning justifies. The only safe course for a person who professes to make a contract without answering a legal proposition, is simply to say, "I accept this offer;" and if a person, not a lawyer, goes into the matter and makes statements he will most likely defeat his own object. That opinion is not the result of what I have heard in this case, but of long experience in other similar cases. I have known many cases fail exactly upon the same ground. The offer is this: "If you like to take these two single ricks in the fields, and the clover and sanfoin in the rick yard, at 4*l.* 15*s.* per ton delivered at Wycombe, you can have them." There is no doubt upon that. Then come the following words: "Reckoning the four ricks to contain, by rough estimation, sixty tons, and you to give me a cheque for 270*l.* on account of it, and to have an agreement drawn up to what we agreed to." In my opinion the plain, obvious, and natural meaning of the words, neither twisting them in one way or the other, is this: "I consider that by rough estimation, as between you and me, these four ricks contain sixty tons, and the proposition is to sell them at 285*l.*" The answer to that proposal is, "We will take the two ricks of hay and the ricks of clover and sanfoin (say about sixty tons) at 4*l.* 15*s.*, to be delivered at Wycombe." That is not accepting it at all, but proposing a different thing altogether from the original proposal of the defendant, which was that a cheque for 270*l.* was to be sent back with the acceptance of the offer. As it seems to me the proposal was to sell certain hay, taking it at sixty tons, and the condition is made that a cheque for 270*l.* should be sent, and it was not sent. It is said, and perhaps truly enough, that the reason why it was not sent was that the name of the defendant was not written plainly enough, that is, the letter says it could not be easily understood. If it be, as I believe it to be, a portion of the bargain, that there was to be no binding contract upon the defendant, unless the cheque was sent, that is immaterial. It was not sent. If it was a condition precedent, it must be done before the contract, the thing itself, can be performed. The first two letters are those of the 14th and 15th, but then upon the 18th July the plaintiffs write this letter, "I now enclose you cheque for 270*l.* on account of your hay, and an agreement for you to sign, and return to me. I should have sent you a cheque before, but could not make out your name correctly." Mr. Codd argued that it was essential, in order to the completion of this contract, that an agreement in writing should have been drawn up. Now I am not of that opinion. The case which he cited seems no doubt to establish that it must, in every case, be a question whether that is or not a condition precedent to the matter being concluded. But then there, is in the present case the receipt, or agreement, which is as follows. [His Lordship here read the receipt contained in the plaintiff's letter of the 18th July.] In my opinion, however, the defendant, in point of truth and fact, never intended to agree to the contract as contained in the first letter. There was, I think, no contract between these parties, and I am of opinion, therefore, that a nonsuit ought to be entered, and the present rule accordingly should be discharged.

Digitized by Google

KELLY, C.B.—I am of opinion that this rule should be made absolute. The question between the parties is whether the proposal of the defendant, contained in the letter of the 14th July, is accepted by the plaintiffs in their answer of the 15th, and the first objection which is made arises upon certain words in the defendant's letter of the 14th July. That letter is as follows: [Reads it, and the plaintiff's answer.] Now I am of opinion that that is a clear, direct, and unconditional acceptance of the proposal made by the defendant in his letter of the 14th. The question is made, and indeed necessarily arises upon the meaning of this clause in this letter, "reckoning the four ricks to contain by rough estimation, sixty tons." And perhaps I may add that to me individually, as a difference of opinion exists as to its construction, this is ambiguous; it may mean that the four ricks are to be taken to contain sixty tons. If so, one would naturally ask why are the words, "by rough estimation," introduced? If they are taken to contain sixty tons there is no rough estimation in the business. "We agree that, whatever may be the amount, it may be taken to be 60 tons;" or it may mean this, "we reckon the four ricks to contain by rough estimation sixty tons," and that is the more literal construction of these words, and I think if we are bound to put a construction upon the words, we must put that construction upon them which is most in conformity with the language actually used; I therefore that a man writing "reckoning the four ricks to contain by rough estimation sixty tons," must be held to mean, "I reckon the four ricks to contain by rough estimation sixty tons, whatever may be the weight." I think that the answer of the plaintiffs, if they meant that they were to be taken at sixty tons without weight or measurement at all, or that the defendant reckoned them to contain about 60 tons, is conclusive, direct, and positive, and is not, like the letter of proposal, ambiguous, but entirely plain and unambiguous. They say, "We will take the two ricks, and the two other ricks, say about sixty tons, at 4*l.* 15*s.* a ton, as per your letter of the 14th instant." Now, we must not construe letters between parties of this description on a nice use of terms to be found in them, but we must take them according to a reasonable and correct calculation of their real meaning in the best way we can. I think when we find such a letter containing three or four terms or conditions of the contract, and the answer referring one by one to those terms, "we take the two ricks and the two others, say about sixty tons, at 4*l.* 15*s.*, delivered at Wycombe, as per your letter of the 14th instant," that the reasonable construction of this answer to the proposal is that the plaintiffs, by this answer, did in its language accept the proposal in the terms in which it was made in the letter to which the answer refers; and this language is, "as per your letter of the 14th inst." I think that those words govern the whole of the antecedent matter, and show that the writer really intended to accept the proposal, as he says, "as per your letter of the 14th inst." I think it must be held to be a complete, final, and unconditional acceptance of all the antecedent matter there introduced. If that construction is wrong, the fault must rest with the person who writes a letter in terms so ambiguous that not only are the judges unable to agree as to what its meaning is, but even of the five learned counsel who have argued the case, not one can take upon himself to give a determined or positive construction of its language. Another objection is made, that the 270*l.* cheque was not sent. Now, the language of the letter upon that point is this, after proposing the sale of the hay and mentioning the quantity and price, "You to give me a cheque for 270*l.* on account of it," and that is contended to be a condition precedent, not as to the performance of the agreement, but a condition precedent to any contract being made between the parties. I own that, but for my high respect for my learned brothers who have put a different construction upon the letter, I should have been inclined to say, it is quite impossible to come to such a conclusion without totally disregarding all that the parties have said, or written, or done in this matter. The plaintiffs say, in effect, "We agree to what you have proposed, according to the terms of your letter, and with regard to the 270*l.* we will send you a cheque for it, but we cannot make out your name, but will send it as soon as you tell us your name." Is that a condition? Is it anything other than this, as put by my brother Bramwell, "I propose to sell to you a quantity of hay, which I consider to weigh sixty tons, at 4*l.* 15*s.* a ton, and you are to pay me in ready money, and so it will come to about 285*l.* You must send me a cheque for 270*l.* on account." I think there is no doubt that when the contract was accepted the sending of the cheque, if sent, was a part performance of the contract, and no doubt a condition precedent to the right of the plaintiffs to put an end to the contract, and, if so, to maintain the action. And the question that arises is not that upon which no doubt can exist, whether it was a part of the contract that the 270*l.* should be sent, or, in other words, and substantially speaking, whether the price should be paid for the hay on the day on which the contract itself was completed and signed. I cannot understand upon what ground it is suggested that the defendant did not mean to part with the property in the hay. I can quite understand that he did not mean to part with the possession of it. It would be impossible ever to effect and complete a contract in any case, if the act to be done, independently of the letter or proposal, in pursuance or part performance of the contract, is to be made a condition precedent to the contract itself being made and completed. With respect to the sending of the 270*l.*, the plaintiffs did all they could. In the first place, there is no plea upon the record that they did not send it; but what they did is this—they said, "We agreed to your proposal; we purchased the hay at the price of 4*l.* 15*s.* a ton, or, in other words, at the price of 285*l.* We quite agree to your proposal that a cheque should be sent for 270*l.*, which we would have sent, but we cannot understand your name," and as soon as they have ascertained what the name was they sent the cheque; and it is to be observed here that no time is mentioned. It is not "Send me a cheque by return of post, or within twenty-four hours;" nothing of the kind is even suggested. The question merely is, whether all the terms of the contract have been completely stated by the defendant, and completely accepted by the plaintiffs. The defendant said, "You are to give me a cheque for 270*l.* on account;" and they did give him a cheque for 270*l.* on account, and I think that they did so within a reasonable time. Then we come to the remaining question, whether, before this contract was made, before there was any contract at all between the parties, it was necessary that there should be a further agreement in writing, in addition to the letters of proposal and acceptance. I cannot imagine upon what conceivable ground such a construction can be put upon the defendant's letter of the 14th. But on whatever ground it is put, my opinion is that by the letter of the 15th July the plaintiffs accepted the proposal contained in the defendant's letter of the 14th; and I quite agree that it was part of the proposal or contract which the plaintiffs accepted that there should be an agreement, just as, in the case of a lease, there is an informal and incomplete agreement for a lease, and the more formal agreement is afterwards prepared and executed by the parties; that is not only expressly assented to, but it is acted on by the plaintiffs themselves just as they had acted upon the former condition, not to the making of the contract, but to the performance of it with respect to the cheque. What they say is this, "When we saw his name we sent him a cheque for 270*l.*, and, as he also required that there should be a written agreement between us, we inclosed one." But then a term is introduced which is not warranted by the preliminary agreement. The answer to that, as has been already observed, is this, "You accepted in your letter of the 15th the proposal in my letter of the 14th, and you accepted my terms, and I do not find in my letter to you, or in yours to me, a single word about that which you now propose, namely, that we are to take only that which is fit for market." Admit, though it appears both parties were equally bound under this preliminary agreement or contract to execute some agreement that should contain the terms of the contract, and no other, that but for the decision expressed by a high authority, I should have no hesitation in saying I was clearly, and without approach to a doubt, of opinion that this proposal was completely and positively accepted upon the part of the plaintiffs, and as they have performed the conditions precedent they are entitled to maintain this action, and the rule to set aside the nonsuit should be made absolute. As, however, the court equally divided in opinion, if the parties desire to have the opinion of the court of error, the usual course in such case will be adopted, and my brother Cleasby will withdraw his judgment, and in that case the rule will be made absolute.

Digitized by Google

The judgment of the court subsequently was that the rule should be made absolute, unless the defendant consented within a fortnight to a stet processus, which was eventually consented to, and entered accordingly.

Stet processus entered.

Attorney for the plaintiffs, Clarke, 13, St. Mary's-square, Paddington, W.

Attorney for the defendant, Alfred T. Cox, 20, St. Swithin's-lane, E.C.

NISI PRIUS (IRELAND).

Reported by OLIVER J. BURKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

June 29 and 30.

(Before PIGOT, C. B. and a Special Jury.)

MURPHY AND OTHERS v. PALGREAVE.

Collision at sea—Reasonable apprehension of—Negligence—Amending summons and plaint at the trial.

Plaintiffs on the 1st Feb. 1869 were, it being then daylight, in their yawl, which was at anchor, fishing in the bay of Dublin, when the defendants' steamer, on board of which there was no look-out at the time, bore down upon them. Plaintiffs, to save themselves from a collision, jumped overboard into the water.

Said plaintiffs then brought their action, and Pigot, C.B., before whom the trial was had, told the jury that if the plaintiffs, through a reasonable apprehension of danger ensuing to them from the negligent acts of the defendant, committed acts themselves, namely, jumping into the water, whereby they suffered damage, however slight, that the defendants should be liable in damages for the consequences.

The summons and plaint in this action contained two counts for negligence. The first stated that the proprietors of a steam tug named William Hall, by means of their servants so unskilfully and negligently managed the said steam tug in the Bay of Dublin, that they ran foul of and struck against a certain yawl boat, in which the plaintiffs were at the time fishing. The second count complained that, by the negligence of the defendants' servants a great and dangerous swell was produced, whereby the plaintiffs' yawl boat was swamped, and the plaintiffs thrown into the water. The defendants filed several defences, traversing the doing of the acts complained of, and traversing also their negligence, and that of their servants, and alleging that the accident was caused by the plaintiffs' negligence, and a further plea of contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiffs.

The facts, as elicited from the evidence adduced by the plaintiffs and the defendants, are shortly these:—On Sunday, the 2nd Aug. 1868, the plaintiffs, four in number, with a little child, hired a yawl, and proceeded in her down the river Liffey and anchored in the Bay of Dublin outside the Poolbeg Lighthouse, for the purpose of enjoying a day's fishing, as they were accustomed to do for many years. The defendants were the proprietors of a steam-tug ship, named the William Hall, which used to ply between Dublin and Kingstown as a passenger boat. On the day in question, the plaintiffs had not long been moored at their fishing ground when they perceived the William Hall turning the lighthouse very short, and altogether out of what was proved to be the usual course for steamers, and bearing down directly, from a distance of about fifty or sixty yards, on their yawl.

Digitized by Google

The plaintiffs stood up and shouted, and when the steam-tug was within ten yards of their boat three of the men, who could swim, jumped into the water, believing that it was the only chance they had for saving their lives. The steam-tug passed the yawl-boat, merely touching her without injuring the remaining man and child, who did not jump out. The tug reversed her paddles and took up the men who were struggling in the water, and having proceeded to her destination, landed them in Dublin on her return. It was proved by passengers on board that there was no look-out that day in the bow of the vessel, and the captain of the steamer confessed that he turned the lighthouse so short that he could have done nothing in so short a distance either in directing the helm or stopping her, so as to avoid running down the yawl-boat, if the steamer was directly pointed towards her.

Ebrington, Q. C. and Corrigan, for the defendants, asked his Lordship to nonsuit the plaintiffs, as the evidence did not support the summons and plaint, which alleged a collision and upsetting into the water, and it was proved that no collision took place.

Butt, Q. C., O'Driscoll, and Boughey, for the plaintiffs, then asked to amend the summons and plaint so as to make it conformable to the state of facts proved.

PIGOT, C. B. said that, on the evidence, he should nonsuit the plaintiffs, but as he thought, on the authority of Jones v. Boyce, 1 Stark. 193, the plaintiffs were entitled to recover damages if, in jumping out of the yawl-boat, they acted under a reasonable apprehension of danger to their lives, he would allow the plaintiffs to amend their summons and plaint. He thought there was ample proof of negligence on the part of the defendants in not having a look-out at the bow of the vessel, and, according to the captain's confession, in managing the vessel, and putting her in such a position that he could not avoid the consequences of his own act. The plaintiffs were entitled to be moored fishing on the high seas in the ordinary course of a steamer, and the steamer should, in such a case, alter her course, if it be not attended with risk and danger to herself. The steamer was within a few yards of the yawl-boat when the fishermen saw her; and it was for the jury to say if, taking human nature as it ordinarily is, the occupants of the boat had not acted under a reasonable fear and apprehension of danger from the approaching steam-tug when they jumped into the water.

The jury, however, much to the surprise of his Lordship, found for the defendants.

Election Petitions.

Reported by F. O. CRUMP, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

STAFFORD BOROUGH ELECTION.

Thursday, May 13.

(Before BLACKBURN, J.)

Charities—Charitable gifts may be bribery—Intimidation by vigilance committee—Treachery by agent—Acts not affecting the election—Costs.

A member was in the habit of sending down to his agent annually a sum of 250l. to be distributed in Christmas gifts. He gave no directions as to how it should be expended, and made no inquiries:

Held, that the giving of Christmas gifts was not a matter to avoid the election, unless it was shown that the gifts dispensed by a responsible agent had influenced votes.

Where there is some evidence of intimidation, in considering whether the freedom of election has been so interfered with as to affect its validity, the extent of the majority obtained by the sitting members must be considered.

A member is responsible for the act of an agent done contrary to instructions, but if the agent treacherously or traitorously agrees with the other side, then if he does a corrupt act it would not vacate the seat unless it is proved that the corrupt act was at the especial request of the member himself or that some untainted and authorised agent of the member directed the act to be done.

But the seat would be affected if a man being an agent is tricked by the other party into committing a corrupt act, he himself honestly still intending to act as agent.

It was shown that committees were formed, having at their heads paid agents for the purpose of getting the men together, so that they might be corrupted at any moment at which it might become necessary. It was not proved that "the tip" to vote was given, but it was proved that several of the voters so collected together did not vote for the other side. Further, the names of many voters were written by an agent upon a card, and it was Held, that the proceedings of these organisations and of the agents amounted to bribery.

An agent of the sitting member organised a vigilance committee for the purpose of detecting bribery on the other side, and in a public speech exhorted his audience not to allow their voters to vote. This advice was followed on the following day:

Held, intimidation for which the member was responsible.

Semble, it is illegal to employ a number of persons to actively search for corrupt practices on the part of opponents, and if they use violence in so doing it will amount to intimidation.

There being cross petitions, and each side having failed in part and succeeded in part:

Held, that they should bear their own costs.

At the last election for Stafford borough there were three candidates, Mr. Pochin, and Mr. Chawner in one interest, and Col. Meller in another. The first and the last were elected. Petitions were presented on both sides, and Mr. Chawner claimed the seat on a scrutiny, but Mr. Pochin having been unseated for intimidation by his agents, Mr. Chawner as his colleague was ineligible as a candidate, and therefore the scrutiny was not gone into.

In the petition, Chawner v. Meller, Fitzjames Stephen, Q. C., and the Hon. Chandos Leigh supported it, and Giffard, Q. C. and Motteram were for the respondent.

Ballantine, Serjt. and F. W. Wheeler appeared for Mr. Pochin.

BLACKBURN, J. commenced by referring to the corruption which had prevailed at previous elections. In doing so, his Lordship said:—There is one thing further I wish to observe upon with regard to former elections. It appears that during the period since 1865 (I have not inquired whether it was before that), each sitting member has been in the habit of distributing in the borough at Christmas what are called "charities" and "Christmas gifts." Col. Meller's account is that he has habitually at Christmas sent down a cheque for 250l. It is to be observed, that he sent down that sum to his agent Mr. Fernie, without any directions at all, and without looking after how he spent it, and without any inquiry as to what was done with it. Col. Meller tells us that it was done under the impression that it was to be distributed in charity equally among friends and foes. I dare say Col Meller was good enough to think so at the time. I do not think, after what he has heard now, he will entertain that opinion any longer. That was the course taken then. Then it appears that Mr. Bass, the sitting member, did not, according to Mr. Brough's account, send down a particular sum; but Mr. Brough spent what sum he pleased in charity, without any directions from Mr. Bass, and without any inquiry from Mr. Bass as to what were the amounts; and Mr. Brough had the amounts disbursed in charity repaid to him. It appears that he spent habitually 300*l.* a year at Christmas in charities; and at Christmas 1867, when it was well known that there would be soon an election coming on, the sum which was distributed swelled up to 720*l.* Now, I do not for a moment mean to say that there may not be very many munificent charities distributed to that amount, and more, by many people; but when I find that charities are distributed in a borough by those who are seeking to contest it as candidates, and are distributed without check by the election agent of the borough, I am not charitable enough to draw any other conclusion than that they do it with the intention of giving the voters money, in the hope and expectation that it will influence the future election. And there is the further very great danger attending it, that the knowledge that they have been doing so will cause men at the future elections to give their votes in the expectation and hope that they will hereafter receive payment. When that is brought home to any person, I think it would undoubtedly mean corruption. In the present case, I have hesitated and paused about it in this way. With regard to corrupt practices, whether they be bribery, or whether they be intimidation, I take it that there is this important distinction to be made. By the statutes, and by the usages of Parliament before them, where any candidate is by his agent, or by himself, guilty of any corrupt practice, the seat must be vacated, and the member is incapable of sitting again during that Parliament; but it is required that it should be shown to be brought home to the agent. Any corrupt practice, whether bribery, intimidation, or treating, brought home to the agent, will vacate the election. But there is another principle which I apprehend, though it has been very little acted upon, still exists in Parliamentary law, and it is in itself good sense, and I think will probably be acted upon whenever it is required, that is, that although it does not appear to have been done by any agent, yet, if there has been general corruption, something that makes the election no longer a fair and free one, either general corruption preventing the election representing what it ought to represent, namely, the feelings of the constituents, or general intimidation, so that you may say it is evident that the election was not a free one: in that case, although it is not brought home to the agent, the election would not be good by the common law of Parliament. It must be very difficult in such a case to prove, and very difficult to be able to say whether or not a case is of sufficient magnitude to amount to that. I have hesitated and paused before coming to a decision on the question of the Christmas gifts after the last election; it is not brought home to any particular voter, any man who at the election has voted for Col. Meller upon the ground of his having received a payment after the election, so as to bring it distinctly under the Corrupt Practices Act. As Mr. Bass is not himself a candidate, I cannot inquire further into that; and though there was a point which passed through my mind as to whether any previous corruption upon the part of Mr. Brough might not affect any person who adopted him as his agent, I think that could hardly be sustained, unless it was made out more specificaliy that there were particular votes influenced by it. I do not see that I can treat the giving of Christmas gifts as a matter to avoid the election at present. The other view I took was, could there be such extensive corruption as would avoid the election? I am not quite sure whether that is a matter that has ever been acted upon; and though it passed through my mind, and I thought about it, I think I could not go to that extent. I therefore think I must proceed to consider what it was that happened at this election, and then to see what has been proved. I may remark, since I am now talking about what will generally avoid an election, that the same thing applies to intimidation. There is no doubt at all, and common sense would have no doubt about it as being the only true view of the terms of the Act of Parliament. Amongst other corrupt practices mentioned is this: "Every person who shall directly or indirectly, by himself, or by any other person on his behalf, make use of, or threaten to make use of, any force, violence, or restraint, or inflict or threaten the infliction by himself, or by or through any other person, of any injury, damage, harm, or loss, or in any other manner practise intimidation upon or against any person in order to induce or compel such person to vote, or refrain from voting, or on account of such person having voted, or refrained from voting at any election, shall be deemed to have committed the offence of undue influence." I think the reading of those words requires no explanation. It is obvious that when a mob has possession of a town, and beats those who come to the polling booth, or otherwise intimidates them, that is plainly exercising intimidation, and is undue influence, and in my opinion it is the very worst kind of undue influence. It is very bad for a master to threaten and dismiss his men: it is very bad in a landlord to eject his tenant. All these are very bad, improper acts, but they are justifiable acts if it were not for the effect they would produce upon the freedom of election, because they have a right to do so if it were not done to interfere with the freedom of election. But to riot, and to beat people, and disturb the peace of the town is worse. It is a crime in itself, and is committed for the purpose of producing an undue effect upon the election. This is a thing that is very likely to happen without the members or the agents being guilty of it. Where this happens to such an extent as not to let the election be free, though not traced to the agent, it will make the election void; but whether it has happened to such an extent as to make the election not free, is a question requiring very great consideration; the judge must exercise his own common sense, and say whether he thinks it is so great an intimidation as would prevent its being a free election; and that, as in every other thing in which discretion is to be exercised, one cannot always feel sure that one is right, and it is tolerably certain that wherever a man decides upon his discretion, there will be plenty of people who will say that he is wrong. In my own experience, it seldom happens when I have to decide a matter by discretion, that I do not myself feel very serious doubts, whichever way I decide, whether I am right or not. I frequently hesitate, and come to the best conclusion I can, and act upon it, and I feel great doubts frequently in such matters whether I am right or not. In the present case I come to the conclusion that I do not think the evidence given of rioting and intimidation was sufficient to avoid the election upon that ground. I quite assent to the distinction which Mr. Giffard pointed out. While I say that I think it was not sufficient to avoid the election, I assent to the observation he made, that in considering whether an election was free or not, it would be necessary to see what is the positive majority; and if we had entered into a scrutiny here, and it happened that Mr. Chawner had succeeded in establishing that he had a majority of one or two votes, or a very small majority of that sort, over Col. Meller, then no doubt the intimidation which would not have been enough to upset the election of Mr. Pochin, who was returned with a majority of eighty, might well have affected the election; whether it would be enough for that, would be a question to be considered afterwards. If it were so proved that in the majority of good votes received, Mr. Chawner was in a majority, but a very small one, that would be a question that would arise hereafter. But then it is equally clear that whenever intimidation is brought home to the agent it would upset the election, however slight the intimidation might be, provided it be intimidation.

Digitized by Google

Evidence had been given that committees were formed for collecting and holding the voters together. On this his Lordship said: — I cannot help feeling that where there are committees of the sort, formed in this way, where a paid agent is put at the head of the committee, to get the men together in that way, and where at a meeting he has always a body of committeemen round him, and a chairman of the committee at the head, it seems to be exactly the sort of machinery and organisation which anyone would devise who intended to have the ready means of corruption at hand if at any time it should be thought desirable that there should be corruption practised. It may easily be imagined that the scheme of a man in conducting electioneering matters may be of this kind: We are not going to bribe yet, but I will so arrange matters and have such an organisation, that if at any moment it become desirable to do it it may be done; I will arrange an organisation by which I may do it at a moment's notice. Such an organisation as this would consist of getting paid agents, to whom you could give the word at the time, and who could be trusted for that purpose, and putting each of them in communication with the more corrupt and corruptible voters, and being in readiness (as the phrase has been used more than once here) "to give the tip" that so much would be paid to them. I acknowledge I think that was the intention of that organisation as it seems to me; and accordingly a great part of the evidence which has been given by the people themselves tends to point to the fact that that was what was expected. It is very true that many of those who came and gave evidence were voters who having been upon the committees no doubt professed that they would vote for Col. Meller; with probably an understanding expressed or implied to this effect: if Col. Meller's agents will tell us we are to be the better for it hereafter we will vote for him; and there is no doubt that many of these did vote for Pochin and Chawner afterwards; but when one looks at the evidence they gave, the whole effect of it seems to show that they assembled together in just such bodies as I have mentioned. In the Unicorn case the witnesses may have meant to say simply that they had entered into that committee in order that they might be in the way to get any bribe which would afterwards be offered. Whether they went there with the pre-determination, being really adverse to Col. Meller and friendly to Pochin and Chawner, to take any bribe which was offered and then to tell about it, or whether they went there with the determination of doing the double treachery, of getting any bribe they could get and earning what they could afterwards, I cannot say. But this appears plain that at the Unicorn a witness called to-day says they did demand to be paid; that it was to be "No tip, no vote;" and that Machin, the chairman at the Unicorn, one of the paid agents, was endeavouring to get them the promise of this tip, as it was called, which a witness who was called to-day says he positively refused to give for two very good reasons; one that he did not wish to go to gaol himself, and the other, that he had no authority to do it. That leads me to the conclusion that there was such matter of fact at the Unicorn at least; but I must observe this, that if the evidence was to the effect that Machin, though he was then a paid agent of Col. Meller, was at that time planning to betray Col. Meller, that it was what is called a plant, then I do not think that Machin could any longer be considered an agent of Col. Meller, so that his acts would vacate the election. I wish to point out the distinction which I make, that according as the law stands at present, if a member employs an agent and that agent contrary to his wish, and contrary to his directions, commits a corrupt act, the sitting member is responsible for it; but where he employs an agent, and the agent treacherously or traitorously agrees with the other side, then if he does a corrupt act it would not vacate the seat unless it is proved that the corrupt act was at the especial request of the member himself or some untainted and authorised agent of the member who directed the act to be done. The distinction is pretty obvious, and I mention it to avoid any difficulty or doubt that there might be hereafter, from its being supposed that I have said anything more than I do say; I say if Machin was a treacherous agent he loses the power of upsetting the seat by reason of his unauthorised acts of corruption; it would require actual proof of authority in order to make it so. It is a very different affair if a man being an agent has been tricked by the other party into committing a corrupt act, he himself honestly still intending to act as an agent. As to the particular case of the Unicorn, it seems to me that what took place there shows that they were quite prepared to do what I have already stated that I believe the organisation was intended to do. They were quite prepared, upon receiving notice that a particular sum would be given then or hereafter, to act upon it and give their votes corruptly; but I think it is very doubtful whether Machin was not in treacherous collusion with the other side, and it seems pretty plain from the fact of what took place that the notice or tip was not given, and that the men who were at the Unicorn did go and vote for Pochin and Chawner just because they were not satisfied that anything was going to be given; I feel no doubt, therefore, that as far as that part of the case was concerned, they were not satisfied that anything was going to be given to them, and that the notice that there would be payment made was not made to that party, at any rate. Then we come to another case upon which we have had evidence to-day; that is, the committee at the Fountain, at which Arrowsmith presided. There we find exactly the same thing; Arrowsmith is one of the paid agents; and my impression is, upon the whole, that these people were all there ready to corrupt, but that it was not intended that they should corrupt; that they had no instructions to corrupt, and that Arrowsmith volunteered and went beyond his directions; but it would equally upset the election as if he had done it with instructions. I have tried in vain to imagine to myself any reason why Arrowsmith should write the names of these men, and why they should be anxious to have their names written upon the cards as a kind of voucher, not only that they had voted, but that they had been members of Arrowsmith's club at the Fountain, when they did vote, except what the witnesses said, namely, that it was done in order that they might be the better for it hereafter, when, if there was anything going upon the part of Colonel Meller, they were to be paid it; and that Arrowsmith wrote the names as part of his promise that it should be so. I can therefore come to no other conclusion than that it was an act of corruption quite sufficient to upset the election on the part of Colonel Meller, and I must act upon it. My impression is, of course, that though there was every preparation for corruption, it did not come to any actual corruption, notice being given. Therefore, according to the evidence, upon the whole, the result is that upon this part of the case, as far as it goes, I do not think I can say that there is reasonable ground for believing that corrupt practices extensively prevailed at the last election. It is the last election only that I speak of; if the Act of Parliament had extended to the two previous elections I should not have had the slightest hesitation in giving my opinion upon them. [Having considered the alleged bribery, which he held not to be proved, his Lordship went on:] But then it appears that Mr. Follows, who was an agent of Mr. Pochin and Mr. Chawner, on the night of the nomination did proceed to organise what they were pleased to call a vigilance committee. As far as I could understand Mr. Follows's account of it, what was intended was that there should be seven men named who were to be a vigilance committee, and that he was to get some thirty or forty people, non-electors, who were to go about the town, and in some way or other discover corrupt practices on the other side; in fact, however, as I understand it, something occurred which took the nomination of these people out of his hands, and it was by no means the people whom he named alone, but a very considerable number of others, who went about that night. Now, I must mention, in bearing upon the question of intimidation, what follows: I cannot myself see how any large body could be legitimately or properly employed in a matter of that sort; I can understand that when you have reason to believe there are corrupt practices going on upon a particular side, that, in order to discover where they are going on, you may employ a single scout or spy to act as a detective to find it out; but the essence of his finding it out must be that he is to go quietly and without alarming them. I cannot imagine how you can legitimately employ a number of persons for any such purpose. It seems to me the only thing you could expect, if you sent a number of persons round, would be that they would commit violence and intimidation; and, accordingly, so it happened. No sooner did the men go to the different houses than you find that the windows were broken there by the mob, and that there was intimidation. Then during the night it appears that the same people kept going about, and they were allowed to come in to make their reports and to drink. And certainly refreshing them with drink under those circumstances would very considerably increase the probability of violence the next day. The first thing that happened the next day was, as one witness who was called, the foreman to some stationer, describes, that going early in the morning, at half-past seven, to his work, carrying some documents belonging to his trade, a number of men surrounded and seized hold of him, and insisted upon it that he was bribing, took his papers away from him, satisfied themselves that they were not bribery papers, gave them back to him and then dismissed him, telling him that if he dared vote for Colonel Meller they would break his neck; and he says this produced the effect of terrifying him and making him not come to vote afterwards. Whether he did or not would depend upon whether he was very anxious to come and vote for Colonel Meller, or whether he was a bold man or not; but this much is plain, that this is just the sort of thing you would expect a vigilance committee sent about in this way to do. I do not say that the mere employing of a vigilance committee of that sort would be conclusive evidence that intimidation was intended, but it would very likely be the means of producing it. When, very shortly after they were appointed, there was found to be violence used, all who employed such people were certainly bound to take care that they did nothing to encourage violence afterwards. Then during the course of the day there appears to have been a good deal of violence, and various people were struck and beaten. Now, we come to the question, "Is there sufficient ground, besides what I pointed out in the employment of this vigilance committee, for saying that this intimidation, as to which I have already expressed my opinion that it was not sufficient to avoid the election upon the ground of general intimidation, was exercised by any of the agents of Mr. Pochin and Mr. Chawner?" The matters upon which that turns are what Mr. Follows did, and what Mr. Brough did. As far as Mr. Follows is concerned, it appears plainly enough that he having taken the notion into his head that there had been bribery to some of these seven men at the Shoulder of Mutton [evidence had been given of this], and which afforded strong ground for suspecting some one had bribed them, came to the conclusion immediately that he was therefore justified in rushing after Mr. Lea and Mr. Brookfield, and preventing them continuing their canvass at all. Whether he did this deliberately, upon the notion that now had come the time when they were in a majority, and therefore to stop the poll would be a good thing, or whether it was only in his excitement at the time, he undoubtedly did take a course more calculated to increase any violence going on than otherwise. He knew what sort of violence was likely to happen. He had witnessed the day before when, in much less excitement, there had been an attack upon Mr. Vincent. Nothing could justify the knocking him off his horse. He had witnessed that, and knew perfectly well what was likely to happen. Then we have a statement of the speech he is said to have made from the cannon, and the exhortation in terms not to allow Meller's people to vote. If that is an accurate report of the speech, it undoubtedly was an exhortation to do that which was afterwards done by the mob, which is enough to prevent the seat being held when it is shown to be done by an agent. As to that, Mr. Follows hardly denies that he was in a state of excitement, and that he did use such language, or something like it. And I must place a good deal of weight upon what Mr. Giffard says, that in such a matter as that it is not very likely that a person would deliberately write down words the day following, and come here a long time afterwards and swear unless he really and truly believed that they were accurate. I therefore cannot but come to the conclusion that Mr. Follows did encourage violence with the view of intimidating persons from exercising their votes; and, having come to that conclusion, that must prevent both Mr. Pochin and Mr. Chawner being eligible candidates for this borough. Under those circumstances, I must certify that the election in both cases is void. I have only further to add this about the costs. It seems to me that in this case, in which each side has been successful, and each side has failed, I should not saddle either side with the costs of the other. I treat the two petitions as really and substantially the same thing; the petition against Mr. Pochin, whether or no Col. Meller himself is substantially the petitioner I do not know, but one of the persons who were put forward as petitioners acknowledged, when he was called as a witness, that he bore a grudge against Mr. Pochin for having refused to pay him some demand upon the last election, and, viewing it in that way, if he is an independent petitioner, I cannot think him a very meritorious one. And in each case, I must say that each party must bear his own costs.

Digitized by Google

Agents: Chilton and Co., 25, Chancery-lane, for Thomas Lawrence Brough, of Stafford; Baxter, Rose, and Norton; Wyatt and Hoskins.

Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

Reported by DOUGLAS KINGSFORD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Feb. 2, 3, and 19.

(Present, The Right Hon. LORD CHELMSFORD, SIR JAMES W. COLVILE, and SIR JOSEPH NAPIER.)

GIBLIN AND OTHERS v. MCMULLEN.

Victoria—Deposit of property at a banker's—Liability of gratuitous bailees—Gross negligence—Nonsuit.

A box containing debentures and other securities was deposited at a bank, the depositor keeping the key. The bank received no payment for their care of the box, which was kept in a strong room with similar boxes of other customers, and with property belonging to the bank.

The debentures were stolen by the cashier of the bank.

In an action by the depositor against the bank, the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, but a rule to enter a nonsuit was afterwards made absolute.

On appeal to the Judicial Committee,

Held, that the bank were not bound to more than ordinary care of the deposit intrusted to them, and that the negligence for which alone they could be made liable would have been the want of that ordinary care which men of common prudence generally exercise about their own affairs.

It is not, however, sufficient to exempt a gratuitous bailee from liability, that he keeps goods deposited with him in the same manner as he keeps his own, though this degree of care will ordinarily repel the presumption of gross negligence.

The term "gross negligence" is not intended as a definition, but is useful as expressing the practical difference between the degrees of negligence for which different classes of bailees are responsible.

The modern rule as to nonsuit is that in every case before the evidence is left to the jury there is a preliminary question for the judge, not whether there is literally no evidence, but whether there is any upon which a jury can properly find a verdict for the party producing it, upon whom the onus of proof is imposed.

A nonsuit may be directed even after the defendant has entered on his case, and evidence given by the latter may be used for the purpose of a nonsuit.

This was an appeal against a judgment of the Supreme Court of Victoria. The then plaintiff, Mr. Richard Lewis, brought an action against the defendant (the present respondent), as inspector of the Union Bank of Australia.

The declaration stated that the plaintiff delivered to the said bank certain railway debentures to be safely kept and taken care of by the bank for reward, and the bank received the debentures into their care and keeping, for the purpose and on the terms aforesaid, yet the bank kept the debentures in a negligent manner, and took no care of the same, whereby they were lost to the plaintiff. The second count charged the bank with negligence as gratuitous bailees.

The defendant pleaded not guilty, and a traverse of the delivery and receipt of the debentures by the bank.

At the trial, in Nov. 1866, on the close of the plaintiff's case, the counsel for the defendant applied for a nonsuit. The judge refused to stop the case, but gave leave to move to enter a verdict for the defendant. It was understood, however, that the rule, if absolute, should be for a nonsuit, and not to enter a verdict. The defendant then called evidence, and the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff for 10,450*l.*

The rule to set aside the verdict and enter a nonsuit was subsequently made absolute, the respondent thereupon signing final judgment.

The appellants were the executors of Mr. Lewis, who died in Nov. 1867.

The circumstances of the case are fully stated in the judgment.

The Solicitor-General (Sir J. D. Coleridge, Q.C.) for the appellants.—In all cases where negligence is imputed to a bailee, whether gratuitous or for hire, the question is, what amount of attention, care, and skill can be insisted on by the bailor, so that on damage for its omission he may have an action against the bailee. This question is one of fact for a jury. A confusion has arisen from the use of the word "gross," as expressing the degree of negligence for which gratuitous bailees are to be liable, and from misusing the term "negligence" as if it were an affirmative word. Willes, J. stated the principle correctly in Grill v. General Iron Screw Collier Company, 14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 715; 35 L. J., N. S., 330, C. P. "I own I entirely agree with the dictum of Cranworth, L. J. in Wilson v. Brett, 11 M. & W. 113; 12 L. J., N. S., 264, Ex., that 'gross negligence' is ordinary negligence with a vituperative epithet. That was the law laid down in Wyld v. Pickford, 8 M. & W. 443, and upheld and recognised in the Exchequer Chamber in the judgment of Crompton, J. in Beal v. South Devon Railway Company, 3 H. & C. 337; 11 L. T. Rep. N. S. 184. The confusion seems to have arisen in using the word 'negligence' as if it was an affirmative word, whereas in truth it is a negative word; it is the absence of such care, skill, and diligence as it was the duty of the person to bring to the performance of the work which he is said not to have performed. Then, if you begin with that, what is the amount of care, skill, and diligence which a man ought to bring? In the case of a gratuitous bailment it is said, if you employ a man of no skill to ride your horse, he is bound to use such skill as he possesses, and that you can require no more, and that he is liable for gross negligence in that sense. But if you employ a man to ride your horse who professes to be a groom, he would be answerable unless he had competent skill in horseriding. Therefore, the word "gross" is a word which, as pointed out by Sir Patrick Colquhoun in his summary of the Roman civil law (ss. 1530-3), is used as a description, not as a definition. If we have to separate law from fact, and to leave the question of fact to the jury, we could not get nearer to a practical definition of 'gross negligence' than such negligence as is actionable." This, then, was a question rightly left to the jury, and their finding ought not to be disturbed. And the evidence given at the trial was sufficient to support the verdict. When a banker takes charge of extremely valuable securities every care for their safety ought to be supplied, and that such was not taken may be presumed from the fact that additional precautions have been adopted since this loss occurred. It may be true that Fletcher had been long in the employment of the bank, and the nothing was known against him, but it would appear from the evidence that a gentleman from England called on the manager of the bank and told him that he had expected to receive money from Fletcher and had not received it. This should have put him on his guard against Fletcher. Then there is evidence that violence had been attempted on the box, and it was suggested that Fletcher took the box away, had it picked by a locksmith, and then returned it. If this were possible, there must have been negligence in the arrangements at the bank. The mere fact that the bank took as great care of Lewis's strong box as they did of their own property would not rebut their liability. Lord Holt's dictum in Coggs v. Bernard, 1 Sm. L. Cas. (5th edit.) 179, was that if a mere depository "keeps the goods bailed to him but as he keeps his own, though he keeps his own but negligently, yet he is not chargeable for them, for the keeping them as he keeps his own is an argument of his honesty. . . . As suppose the bailee is an idle, careless, drunken fellow, and comes home drunk, and leaves all his doors open, and by reason thereof the goods happen to be stolen and his own, yet he shall not be charged, because it is the bailor's own fault to trust such an idle fellow." But this was clearly overruled in Doorman v. Jenkins, 2 A. & E. 256, where Denman, C.J., directed the jury that it did not follow from defendant's having lost his own money, at the same time as the plaintiff's, that he had taken such care of plaintiff's money as a reasonable man would ordinarily take of his own; and he added that that fact afforded no answer to the action if they believed that the loss occurred from gross negligence. [Lord CHELMSFORD said the degree of negligence for which a particular bailee is liable must be a matter of law on which the jury would have to be directed by the judge, and referred to Shiells v. Blackburne, 1 H. Bl. 159.] The case of Shiells v. Blackburne has been misunderstood, and has been supposed to show that the question of negligence is a matter of law, but the verdict was there set aside because the court thought that there was no evidence of negligence to go to a jury, and that they had found the fact erroneously: (See the comments of Patteson, J., in Doorman v. Jenkins, 2 A. & E. 263.)

Digitized by Google

Watkin Williams (Beresford with him) on the same side.—The rule to set aside the verdict and to enter a nonsuit ought not to have been made absolute, but should have been discharged. The judge at the trial below ought to have left to the jury the question whether the bank was guilty of that particular degree of negligence for which gratuitous bailees are liable. The defendant at the trial instead of relying on the objection that plaintiff had not made out a case for the jury chose to go into evidence of his own. Some of this evidence, particularly the fact of the change made in the bank arrangements after the discovery of the loss, was favourable to the plaintiff. This evidence might have been in answer to the application for a nonsuit. [Mellish, Q.C. agreed that it should be considered whether upon the whole evidence there ought to have been a nonsuit.] We admit that the bankers were gratuitous bailees; that they are not liable for deposited property stolen by a clerk or servant employed about the bank, unless they have knowingly hired or kept in their service a dishonest servant, and that they were only bound to take ordinary care; but whether they took this care is a question for the jury. The rule given by Lord Loughborough in Shiells v. Blackburne, 1 H. Bl. 168, is that "if a man gratuitously undertakes to do a thing to the best of his skill, where his situation is such as to imply skill, an omission of that skill is imputable to him as gross negligence." Here the bankers if they neglected precautions which their business ought to have suggested were guilty of gross negligence. As observed by Lord Denman in Doorman v. Jenkins, 2 A. & E. 265, it is "impossible for a judge to take upon himself to say whether negligence is gross or not." In Wilson v. Brett, 11 M. & W. 113, a person conversant with and skilled in horses, rode a horse at the owner's request, for the purpose of showing it for sale; the horse fell and was injured, and the judge in summing up told the jury that the rider, the defendant in the action, having been shown to be skilled in the management of horses, was bound to take as much care of the horse as if he had borrowed it. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, and the court refused a new trial on the ground of misdirection. Alderson, B. observes: "This defendant being shown to be a person of competent skill, there was no difference between his case and that of a borrower; because the only difference is, that then the party bargains for the use of competent skill, which here becomes immaterial, since it appears that the defendant had it." And in the judgment of Rolfe, B., who tried the case, occurs the passage, "If a person more skilled knows that to be dangerous which another not so skilled as he does not, surely that makes a difference in the liability? I said I could see no difference between negligence and gross negligence—that it was the same thing with the addition of a vituperative epithet—and I intended to leave it to the jury to say whether the defendant, being as it appeared by the evidence, a person accustomed to the management of horses, was guilty of culpable negligence." [Lord CHELMSFORD said that Wilson v. Brett was a case of misfeasance, not of negligence, and that he saw no objection to the term "gross" negligence, which was useful in expressing the degree of negligence for which certain classes of bailees are responsible. The term, moreover, had been approved by Lord Holt, Sir William Jones, and other eminent authorities.] A similar rule was laid down in Beal v. South Devon Railway Company, 3 H. & C. 341; 11 L. T. Rep. N. S. 184. See, too, the cases of

Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company v. Shand, 1 Moo. P. C. N. S. 272; 12 L. T. Rep. N. S. 809; Dansey v. Richardson, 3 E. & B. 144.

Mellish, Q.C. for the respondent.—Where bankers take charge of their customers' goods under such circumstances as the present, it must be understood that the customers will take their chance of loss. If whether they have taken proper care is to be a question dependent on the opinion of a jury, what banker would accept such a liability without reward? There was no evidence of negligence, except that the cashier was allowed to have access by himself to the strong room. The plaintiff knew that this was the custom of the bank, and after the deposit of his property if any change was made it was for his benefit, rather than to his disadvantage. And, indeed, to allow access to the confidential servant alone would probably involve less risk than to let two go together. The boxes were kept in the strong room for the convenience of depositors, and it cannot be contended that there was any negligence in the bankers because they did not put these bonds in the one of the two inner rooms which they reserved for bullion and unsigned notes. Lord Holt, in his judgment in Coggs v. Bernard, in saying that, when a man takes goods into his custody to keep for the bailor without reward, the bailee will be chargeable if guilty of "some gross neglect," clearly means "wilful" negligence, which would be near to fraud. [Lord CHELMSFORD.—It is difficult of definition; but gross negligence seems to mean "utter carelessness."] For he bases this part of his judgment on Justinian's Institutes, Book III., tit. 15, where the liability of a depositary is thus defined: "Ex eo solo tenetur, si quid dolo commiserit; culpæ autem nomine, id est, desidiæ ac negligentiæ, non tenetur." And this rule was acted on in an American case, very like the present, Foster v. Essex Bank, 17 Mass. 478, where a cask of doubloons was deposited by the plaintiff with the defendants, and the cashier or clerk of the bank stole a great portion and afterwards absconded. The bank was held not to be liable on the grounds expressed in the following passage from the judgment of Parker, C. J. (p. 497), "It will not be disputed that if (this contract) amounts only to a naked bailment, without reward, and without any special undertaking, which in the civil and common law is called depositum, the bailee will be answerable only for gross negligence, which is considered equivalent to breach of faith; as everyone who receives the goods of another in deposit, impliedly stipulates that he will take some degree of care of them. The degree of care which is necessary to avoid the imputation of bad faith, is measured by the carefulness which the depositary uses towards his own property of a similar kind. For although that may be so slight as to amount even to carelessness in another, yet the depositor has no reason to expect a change of character in favour of his particular interest, and it is his own folly to trust one who is not able or willing to superintend with diligence his own concerns. . . . The dictum of Lord Coke that the bare acceptance of goods to keep implies a promise to keep them safely so that the depository will be liable for loss by stealth or accident (Southcote's case, 4 Co. 83), is entirely exploded . . . having been fully and explicitly overruled by all the judges in Coggs v. Bernard . . . 'Now the law seems to be settled that such a general bailment will not charge the bailee with any loss, unless it happen by gross neglect, which is construed to be an evidence of fraud. But if he undertakes specially to keep the goods safely and securely, he is bound to answer all perils and damages that may befall them for want of the same care with which a prudent man would keep his own:' (2 Bl. Comm. 453.) And this certainly is the more reasonable doctrine, for the common understanding of a promise to keep safely would be that the party would use due diligence and care to prevent loss or accident; and there is no breach of faith or trust if, notwithstanding such care, the goods should be spoiled or purloined. Anything more than this would amount to an insurance of the goods, which cannot be presumed to be intended, unless there be an express agreement and an adequate consideration therefor. The doctrine, as thus settled by reason and authority, is applicable to the case of a single deposit in which there is an accommodation to the bailor, and the advantage is to him alone. He shall be the loser, unless the person in whom he confided has shown bad faith in exposing the goods to hazards to which he would not expose his own. This would be crassa negligentia, and for this alone is such a depositary liable." The court then went into the facts, and proceeded (p. 504): "Upon this state of facts, we think it most manifest that, as far as the bank was concerned, this was a mere naked bailment for the accommodation of the depositor, and without any advantage to the bank, which can tend to increase its liability beyond the effect of such a contract. No control whatever of the chest or the gold contained in it was left with the bank or its officers. It would have been a breach of trust to have opened the chest or to inspect its contents. The owner could at any time have withdrawn it, there being no lien for any price of its custody, and it was not right that the bank had authority to remove it to a place of greater safety without the orders of the owner. If it be possible to constitute a gratuitous bailment, or simple deposit, this was one. . . . Such deposits are in deed simply gratuitous on the part of the bank, and the practice of receiving them must have originated in a willingness to accommodate members of the corporation with a place for their treasures, more secure from fire and thieves than their dwelling-house or stores. . . . . (P. 507): The contract being, then, only a general bailment, the third question to be discussed is whether the contract has been cancelled by the bank. . . . The rule to be applied to this species of bailment is that the depositary is answerable in case of loss for gross negligence only or fraud which will make a bailee of any character answerable. Gross negligence certainly cannot be inferred here, for the same care was taken of this as of other deposits, and of the property belonging to the bank itself. . . . We have thus prepared the way for the discussion of the great question in the case, and we believe the only one on which doubts could be entertained. The loss was occasioned by the fraud or felony of two officers of the bank, the cashier and chief clerk. We shall not consider whether the act of taking the money was felonious or only fraudulent, as the distinction is not important in this case, the question being whether there was gross negligence, and that fact may appear by suffering goods to be stolen, as well as if they were taken away by fraud. . . . No fraud is directly imputed to the bank, it being found that the directors who represent the company were wholly ignorant of the transactions of the cashier and chief clerk in this respect. The point, then, is narrowed to the consideration, whether the corporation, as bailee, is answerable in law for the depredations committed on the testator's property by two of its officers. (Authorities were reviewed by the court.) . . . I think it may be inferred from all this, as a general rule, that to make the master liable for any act of fraud or negligence done by his servant, the act must be done in the course of his employment; and that if he steps out of it to do a wrong, either fraudulently or feloniously, towards another, the master is no more answerable than any stranger. The cases of innholders, common carriers, and perhaps ship masters or seamen, when goods are embezzled, are exceptions to the general rule, founded on public policy. We are then to inquire whether, in this case, when the gold was taken from the cask by the cashier and clerk, they were in the course of their official employment. Their master, the bank, had no right to meddle with the cask or open it, and so could not lawfully communicate any such authority, and that they did not in fact give any, is found by the verdict. . . . The cask was never opened but by order of the owner, until it was opened by the officers for a fraudulent or felonious purpose. It was no more within the duty of the cashier than of any other officer or person to know the contents or to take any account of them. If the cashier had any official duty to perform relating to the subject, it was merely to close the doors of the vault when banking hours were over, that this together with other property should be secure from theft. He cannot, therefore, in any view be considered as acting within the scope of his employment when he committed this villainy, and the bank is no more answerable for this act of his than they would be if he had stolen the pocket book of any person who might have laid it upon the desk while he was transacting some business at the bank. . . . The undertaking of banking corporations, with respect to their officers, is that they shall be skilful and faithful in their employments; they do not warrant their general honesty and uprightness." The principles above stated are all applicable to the present case; though the latter is weaker against the bank than the American case, for in that it appears that an exact account of the gold deposited was left with the cashier, who gave a receipt for it, while here the bank knew nothing about the contents of the plaintiff's box. There are doubtless observations in Doorman v. Jenkins, 2 A. & E. 256, tending to show that the question of negligence is for the jury. But there was some evidence of gross negligence in the opinion of the court. And many modern cases establish the proposition that, unless there is some evidence upon which the jury can reasonably find that negligence existed, the question should be withdrawn from them. Thus in Toomey v. London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway Company, where the plaintiff while waiting at the defendants' station mistook the lamp room for the urinal, fell down some steps and was injured, Williams, J. says, "It is not enough to say there was some evidence; for every person who has had any experience in courts of justice knows very well that a case of this sort against a railway company could only be submitted to a jury with one result. A scintilla of evidence, or a mere surmise that there may have been negligence on the part of the defendants, clearly would not justify the judge in leaving the case to the jury; there must be evidence upon which they might reasonably and properly conclude that there was negligence." And this rule was adopted and approved in Cornman v. Eastern Counties Railway Company, 4 H. & N. 781, and in Cotton v. Wood, 8 C. B., N. S., 568. In the latter case Erle, J. observes (p. 573), "The very vague use of the term 'negligence' has led to many cases being left to the jury in which I have been utterly unable to find the existence of any legal duty or any evidence of a breach of it." And Williams, J. adds, "There is a rule of the law of evidence, which is of the first importance, and is fully established in all the courts, viz., that, where the evidence is equally consistent with either view, with the existence or non-existence of negligence, it is not competent to the judge to leave the matter to the jury." A still stronger case is that of Crafter v. Metropolitan Railway Company, 1 L. Rep. C. P. 300, where the plaintiff was injured by falling, in consequence of the slippery brass nosings on the stairs. Two witnesses of the plaintiffs, one of whom was a builder, stated that in their opinion the staircase was a dangerous one, and the defendants called no witnesses to contradict. Yet it was held that there was no evidence to go to a jury. M. Smith, J. remarks, "The court is, in an especial manner, bound to see that the evidence submitted to the jury in order to establish negligence is sufficient and proper to go to them." [Lord CHELMSFORD referred to Ryder v. Wombwell, L. Rep. 4 Ex. 32; 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 491.]

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Jos. Brown, Q.C. (Murray, and J. D. Wood with him), on the same side.—It is admitted that plaintiff's box had the same care as other customers' property, and as the property of the bank. The appellants are in fact urging that we ought to have taken special care of plaintiff's property. Even in the case of a bailment of goods to be kept for hire, it was held by Lord Kenyon in Finucane v. Small, 1 Esp. 314, that positive negligence must be proved, and that if "the goods were lodged in a place of security, where things of much greater value were kept, this is all that it was incumbent on the defendant to do; and if such goods are stolen by the defendant's own servant, that is not a species of negligence of a description sufficient to support this action, inasmuch as he has taken as much care of them as of his own:" (See too Story on Bailments, ss. 63, 65, 66, 67, 71–3, 75–9.) Doorman v. Jenkins (ubi. sup.), differs from the present case, for there the plaintiff did not get the care he expected, which here he did. And it would not fix the bank with liability to show that there were some additional precautions which they might have adopted, for as said by Montague Smith, J., in Crafter v. The Metropolitan Railway Company, 1 L. Rep. C. P. 304, "the line must be drawn in these cases between suggestions of possible precautions and evidence of actual negligence, such as ought reasonably and properly to be left to a jury."

Watkin Williams replied.

Judgment was delivered by Lord CHELMSFORD:—This is an appeal from a judgment of nonsuit of the Supreme Court of the colony of Victoria in an action by the appellant's testator against the respondent. The action was brought against the defendant as inspector of the Union Bank of Australia, to recover damages for the negligent keeping of certain railway debentures delivered to the bank to be safely kept and taken care of. The plaintiff, who resided at Hobart Town, in Tasmania, had an account with the Union Bank of Australia from the year 1857. From the earliest period of his becoming a customer of the bank, he had placed in their care a box, of which he kept the key, containing securities, deeds, and debentures. The bank received no consideration for taking care of the deposits of their customers. In the month of Jan. 1862, the plaintiff purchased the railway debentures in question and put them in his box. The box appears always to have been kept in a strong room underground, in which the boxes of other customers of the bank were placed. There were also in this strong room the manager's box, containing bills for discount and collection, worth from 1,500,000*l.* to 2,500,000*l.*, teller's boxes, worth 50,000*l.*, and securities of the Royal, Central, and Agra Banks, in which the Union Bank was interested. The access to this room could only be obtained by passing through a compartment of the office which was separated from the part where the clerks were employed by a partition about 5ft. high. In this compartment Fletcher, the cashier, always sat during bank hours, and a messenger slept there during the night. There was a wooden door in this compartment which opened upon a flight of steps leading to the room where the plaintiff's box was deposited. This room had two iron doors, which were opened by separate keys. Fletcher always kept the key of the wooden door, and also, during the day, the keys of the two iron doors, but at the time the debentures in question were placed in the box one of the keys of the iron doors only was kept by him at night, the other being taken care of by another officer of the bank. Beyond the room where the box was there were two other rooms; in the outer of the two uncoined gold was kept, in the inner, bullion, and unsigned notes of the bank. The manager kept the key of the outer of these two rooms, and one of the directors of the bank that of the inner one. The plaintiff had frequent opportunities of seeing how and where his box with the debentures was kept. The customers were permitted to have access to their boxes during the bank hours, but always in the presence of a bank clerk. The plaintiff occasionally went down to the strong room to take the coupons from his debentures for collection, but generally the box was brought up to him. The coupons when taken from the debentures were always given by the plaintiff to Fletcher to collect for him. On the 19th April 1864, the plaintiff went to the bank and asked for his box. Fletcher brought it to him. The plaintiff opened the box, took out his debentures, and carried them away. He then cut off the coupons, took back the debentures, replaced them in box, locked it, and gave the coupons to Fletcher to collect for him as usual. Before the plaintiff's next visit to the bank,

Digitized by Google

Fletcher had abstracted the debentures. The exact time at which this act of dishonesty was committed cannot be ascertained, but it must have been before the month of July 1864, as Fletcher then left the bank on leave of absence and never returned. Up to the time of his leaving he had always maintained a good character. The plaintiff did not come again to the bank till the 3rd July 1865. He then went into the strong room and took out of his box some gas shares. On the following day he returned to the bank and had his box brought up to him, when he discovered that the debentures were gone. All the material facts above stated were proved in the course of the plaintiff's case; that the bank were gratuitous bailees; that the plaintiff had known for years the manner in which the bank kept the property of their customers deposited with them, and the means which they employed for its protection, and that the debentures were dishonestly taken away by Fletcher. At the close of the plaintiff's case, the counsel for the defendant applied for a nonsuit on the ground that the bank being gratuitous bailees no evidence had been given of such negligence as would render them liable for the loss of the debentures. The judge refused to stop the case, but reserved leave to the defendant to move to enter a nonsuit. The defendant thereupon went into his case and called witnesses. The only material additions which he made to the facts proved by the plaintiff's witnesses were the keeping in the strong room in which the plaintiff's box with the debentures placed, not only of the boxes of other customers, but also of the before-mentioned valuable property belonging to the bank; the good character of Fletcher, and his leaving the bank in the end of the month of July 1864; and that after Fletcher left, but before the loss of the plaintiff's debentures was discovered, a rule was made in the bank that two clerks instead of one (as formerly) should go with a customer wishing to examine his box in the strong room. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff upon an issue as to the delivery of the debentures to be kept by the bank without reward, and also upon the plea of not guilty (which raised the question of negligence), and they assessed the damages at 10,450*l.* The defendant, upon the leave reserved at the trial, moved for, and obtained a rule from the Supreme Court to set aside the verdict and to enter a verdict for the defendant or a judgment of nonsuit. That rule was afterwards made absolute, the Chief Justice stating that "in the opinion of the court the defendant was entitled to a verdict, but that as at the trial, when leave to enter a verdict was reserved, there was an understanding that the rule, if absolute, should be for a nonsuit, and not to enter a verdict, the rule would be absolute accordingly." In the argument of the appeal the counsel for the appellant, admitting that the bank were gratuitous bailees, and therefore not responsible except for the highest degree of negligence usually styled "gross negligence," insisted that it was a question of fact for the jury whether the bank had been guilty of this species of negligence, and that the judge would not have been justified at the close of the plaintiff's case in withdrawing the question from the jury and directing a nonsuit, and that after the defendant's case had been gone into, and the jury had pronounced a verdict upon all the evidence on both sides, it was not competent to the court to give a judgment of nonsuit or to do more than to direct a new trial upon the question of negligence. The learned counsel contended that the bank had been guilty of negligence, because there being two iron doors with protecting locks to the strong room where the plaintiff's debentures were, the cashier was permitted to keep both keys. And they urged that the bank by their own act admitted that they had not been sufficiently careful, as after Fletcher left, they made a rule that two clerks should always accompany the customers to the strong room instead of only one, as had previously been the practice. The first question to be considered is, whether the Supreme Court was right in directing a nonsuit to be entered. It was the duty of the court to do what the judge ought to have done at the trial; and if, at the close of the plaintiff's case, there was not evidence upon which the jury could reasonably and properly find a verdict for him, the judge ought to have directed a nonsuit. Formerly it used to be held, that if there were what was called a scintilla of evidence in support of a case, the judge was bound to leave it to the jury. But a course of recent decisions (most of which are referred to in the case of Ryder v. Wombwell, L. Rep. 4 Ex. 32; 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 491), has established a more reasonable rule—viz., that in every case before the evidence is left to the jury, there is a preliminary question for the judge, not whether there is literally no evidence, but whether there is any upon which a jury can properly proceed to find a verdict for the party producing it, upon whom the onus of proof is imposed. If, therefore, the plaintiff's evidence in this case was such that the judge ought to have considered that it fell short of proving the bank to have been guilty of that species of negligence which would render them liable to an action, he ought to have withdrawn the case from the jury, and directed a nonsuit. But the appellant's counsel insisted that, as the defendant at the trial did not rest upon his objection to the sufficiency of the plaintiff's case, but went into evidence of his own, he did it at his peril; and that if he proved any facts which were favourable to the plaintiff, they might be used in answer to the application to the court for a nonsuit, upon the leave reserved at the close of the plaintiff's case. It is unnecessary to determine whether this position is correct or not, because the counsel for the respondent agreed that the appellant's counsel might be at liberty to use in argument any facts which they could extract from the defendant's evidence in support of their case. But it may be convenient to see how the plaintiff's case stood upon his own evidence, before considering whether it was at all improved by any facts obtained from the defendant's witnesses. Did the plaintiff, then, give any evidence of the bank having been guilty of that degree of negligence which renders a gratuitous bailee liable for the loss of property deposited with him? From the time of Lord Holt's celebrated judgment in Coggs v. Bernard, 1 Sm. L. Ca. 177, 5th edit, in which he classified and distinguished the different degrees of negligence for which the different kinds of bailees are answerable, the negligence which must be established against a gratuitous bailee has been called "gross negligence" This term had been used from that period, without objection, as a short and convenient mode of describing the degree of responsibility which attaches upon a bailee of this class. At last, Lord Cranworth (then Baron Rolfe), in the case of Wilson v. Brett, 11 M. & W. 113, objected to it, saying that he "could see no difference between negligence and gross negligence; that it was the same thing, with the addition of a vituperative epithet." And this critical observation has been since approved of by other eminent judges. Of course, if intended as a definition, the expression "gross negligence" wholly fails of its object. But as there is a practical difference between the degrees of negligence for which different classes of bailees are responsible, the term may be usefully retained as descriptive of that difference, more especially as it has been so long in familiar use, and has been sanctioned by such high authority as Lord Holt and Sir William Jones in his Essay on the

Digitized by Google

Law of Bailments. In the case of Grill v. General Iron Screw Collier Company, L. Rep. 1 C. P. 612; 14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 715, Willes, J., after agreeing with the dictum of Lord Cranworth, and stating that the same view of the term "gross negligence" was held by the Exchequer Chamber in Beal v. The South Devon Railway Company, 3 H. & C. 337; 11 L. T. Rep. N. S. 184, said: "Confusion has arisen from regarding negligence as a positive instead of a negative word. It is really the absence of such care as it was the duty of the defendant to use." It is hardly correct to say that the Court of Exchequer Chamber in the case referred to adopted the view of Lord Cranworth as to the impropriety of the term "gross negligence." Crompton, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "It is said that there may be difficulty in defining what gross negligence is, but I agree in the remark of the Lord Chief Baron in the court below, where he says 'There is a certain degree of negligence to which everyone attaches great blame. It is a mistake to suppose that things are not different because a strict line of demarcation cannot be drawn between them;'" and he added, "for all practical purposes the rule may be stated to be, that the failure to exercise reasonable care, skill, and diligence, is gross negligence. M. Smith, J., in the case in which the above-mentioned observations of Willes, J. were made, said: "The use of the term gross negligence is only one way of stating that less care is required in some cases than in others, as in the case of gratuitous bailees, and it is more correct and scientific to define the degrees of care than the degrees of negligence." The epithet "gross," is certainly not without its significance. The negligence for which, according to Lord Holt, a gratuitous bailee incurs liability is such as to involve a breach of confidence or trust, not arising merely from some want of foresight or mistake of judgment but from some culpable default. No advantage would be gained by substituting a positive for a negative phrase, because the degree of care and diligence which a bailee must exercise, corresponds with the degree of negligence for which he is responsible, and there would be the same difficulty in defining the extent of the positive duty in each case as the degree of neglect of it which incurs responsibility. In truth, this difficulty is inherent in the nature of the subject, and, though degrees of care are not definable, they are with some approach to certainty distinguishable; and in every case of this description in which the evidence is left to the jury, they must be led by a cautious and discriminating direction of the judge to distinguish, as well as they can, degrees of things which run more or less into each other. It is clear, according to the authorities, that the bank in this case were not bound to more than ordinary care of the deposit intrusted to them, and that the negligence for which alone they could be made liable would have been the want of that ordinary diligence which men of common prudence generally exercise about their own affairs. The case resembles very closely one that was mentioned by the counsel for the respondent, which was decided in the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, the case of Foster, et al (Executors), v. The Essex Bank, 17 Mass. Rep. 478. The plaintiff in that case deposited with the bank for safe custody, a cask containing a quantity of gold doubloons. This was placed with other deposits in a vault in the bank, and the agent of the plaintiff was in the habit of coming to the bank to see that his deposit was safe. There was no evidence how the vault was secured. Whenever the plaintiff gave orders to the bank (which he frequently did) to deliver some of the gold doubloons deposited, the cask was opened by the cashier or chief clerk, who delivered the doubloons pursuant to the orders. The cashier and chief clerk, both of whom had previously sustained a fair reputation, fraudulently took from the cask doubloons to the amount of 32,000 dollars, with which they absconded. The action was tried upon the general issue, and the jury found a special verdict. The court, after argument, gave judgment for the defendants. The Chief Justice, who delivered the opinion of the court, entered fully into the law of bailments applicable to the case holding that, "as far as the bank was concerned, the deposit of the gold was a mere naked bailment for the accommodation of the depositor, and without any advantage to the bank which could tend to increase its liability beyond the effect of such a contract." "That the bank was answerable only for gross negligence or for fraud, which will make a bailee of any character answerable, and that gross negligence certainly could not be inferred from anything found by the verdict, as the same care was taken of the plaintiff's property as of other deposits, and of the property belonging to the bank itself." And the court held that the bank was not responsible for the fraud or felony of the cashier and clerk, as when they abstracted the plaintiff's gold from the cask they were not acting within the scope of their employment; "and the bank was no more answerable for their act than it would have been if they had stolen the pocket-book of any person who might have laid it upon the desk while he was transacting some business at the bank." Their Lordships entertain no doubt that it was the duty of the judge at the close of the plaintiff's case, upon the application of the counsel for the defendant, to have ordered a nonsuit, or if the plaintiff refused to be nonsuited, to have directed the jury to find a verdict for the defendant, as there was an entire failure of evidence of the want of that ordinary care which the bank was bound to bestow upon the plaintiff's deposit. But the judge having refused to nonsuit, the defendant thereupon went into his case and called witnesses, and having done so the counsel for the appellants contend that there being evidence on both sides the question could not be withdrawn from the jury, and that as the judge could not have nonsuited at that stage of the trial it was not competent to the Supreme Court to give a judgment of nonsuit. It is not, however, correct to say that the judge could not have nonsuited the plaintiff after the defendant had entered upon his case, as it was decided in the case of Davis v. Hardy (6 B. & C. 225), that the evidence given by a defendant may be used for the purpose of a nonsuit. The defendant's evidence added to the plaintiff's case the important fact that in the strong room in which the plaintiff's debentures were kept there were, besides the boxes of other customers, bills, securities, and specie, the property of the bank, to a very considerable amount. It may be admitted not to be sufficient to exempt a gratuitous bailee from liability that he keeps goods deposited with him in the same manner as he keeps his own, though this degree of care will ordinarily repel the presumption of gross negligence. But there is no case which puts the duty of a bailee of this kind higher than this, that he is bound to take the same care of the property entrusted to him as a reasonably prudent and careful man may fairly be expected to take of his own property of the like description. This was, in effect the question left to the jury in Doorman v. Jenkins (2 A. & E. 256), where Lord Denman told them that "it did not follow from the defendant's having lost his own money at the same time as the plaintiff's, that he had taken such care of the plaintiff's money as a reasonable man would ordinarily take of his own, and that the fact relied upon was no answer to the action if they believed that the loss occurred from gross negligence." No one can fairly say that the means employed for the protection of the property of the bank and of the plaintiff were not such as any reasonable man might properly have considered amply sufficient. But the appellant's counsel insisted that the fact appearing for the first time in the defendant's case, that the bank, after Fletcher had abused the confidence reposed in him, had introduced additional precautions to prevent the recurrence of a similar act of dishonesty, amounted to an admission that their former safeguards were not such as prudent men ought to have been satisfied with. This argument goes the length of contending that if a gratuitous depository does not multiply his precautions, so as not to omit anything which can make the loss of property entrusted to him next to impossible, he is guilty of gross negligence. Their Lordships are clearly of opinion that the plaintiff failed upon his own evidence to prove a case of negligence against the bank, and that the evidence produced by the defendant showed more strongly the absence of any such negligence for which they would have been liable. They will, therefore, recommend to Her Majesty that the judgment appealed from be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors for the appellants, Davidson, Carr, and Banister.

Solicitors for the respondent, Murray and Hutchins.

Equity Courts.

COURT OF APPEAL IN CHANCERY.

Reported by THOMAS BROOKBANK and E. STEWART ROCHE, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

June 1 and 3.

(Before the LORDS JUSTICES.)

Re THE SOUTH-EASTERN OF PORTUGAL RAILWAY COMPANY (LIMITED).

Company—Winding-up—Companies Act 1862, ss. 95, 96, 159, 160—Powers of official liquidator—Where exercisable without sanction of court.

The 95*th section of the Companies Act* 1862 defines the powers of the official liquidator to be exercised with the sanction of the court; the 96*th enacts that the court may authorise the exercise of those powers without its sanction or intervention; the* 160*th provides for compromises by the official liquidator with the sanction of the court:*

Held, that to support an order conferring these powers upon the official liquidator exclusively, there must be a constat justifying the exercise of a judicial discretion on the part of the judge; and where the evidence failed to satisfy the Court of Appeal, an order of Malins, V.C. to that effect was discharged.

This was an appeal by Mr. Brandeis and Mr. Rodocanachi, who were creditors of the company, against an order of Malins, V.C., made on the 8th May, confirming an order which his Honour had made in chambers on the 30th April, ordering that the official liquidator of the company, Mr. John Ball, should be at liberty to exercise all the powers of the 95th section of the Companies Act 1862 without the sanction or intervention of the court, except that of distributing the assets of the company.

The case is reported in 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 800, where all necessary facts are stated.

Cotton, Q. C. and Rowcliffe for Mr. Brandeis; and Glasse, Q. C. and Higgins, for Mr. Rodocanachi supported the appeal.

Pearson, Q. C. and Charles Hall, for the official liquidator, opposed it.

The authorities referred to were:

Re The Northumberland and Durham District Banking Company, 1 Dr. & Sm. 273;
Turquand v. Kirby, L. Rep. 4 Eq. 123; 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 260;
The Companies Act 1862, ss. 95, 96, 159, and 160;
General Order, 11th Nov. 1862, rule 49.

Cotton, Q. C. having been heard in reply,

Lord Justice SELWYN said:—The 95th section of the Act of Parliament confers a great variety of powers on the official liquidators, but it does not, amongst those powers, distinctly enumerate the power of entering into compromises. That is the subject of the 160th section. Then the 96th section says, "that the court may provide by any order that the official liquidator may exercise any of the above powers without the sanction or intervention of the court, and, where an official liquidator is provisionally appointed, may limit and restrict his powers by the order appointing him." That is giving to the court a very wide and extensive jurisdiction, and this court has been careful, and I hope always will be extremely careful, not in any degree to interfere with the discretion of the judges who are authorised to wind-up the affairs of these companies, feeling, as this court must necessarily do, that the judge, who has all the parties before him in chambers, and who has an intimate acquaintance with the affairs of the company, such as the appellate court cannot by possibility have, is in a better position to exercise discretion on matters of this sort than the Court of Appeal. At the same time the powers given by the 95th section are so wide and extensive, that it requires a constat in order to justify the exercise of the judge's discretion in granting them. It is a judicial discretion. In the present case the court has made an order by which, with the single exception of distributing the assets of the company, the official liquidator is authorised to perform all the duties comprised in the 95th section, and it is also intended that he should exercise the powers given by the 160th section. It is admitted that the principal, if not the only ground on which this order can be sustained, is the idea that a compromise of all the claims of this company on the Portuguese Government, that is to say, all the questions arising in the winding-up of this company, is to be made by Mr. Ball, the liquidator. Accordingly the order is in these terms, that he is to be at liberty to exercise all the powers of the 95th section of the Companies Act 1862, without the sanction or intervention of the court, except that of distributing the assets of the said company. It is intended to comprise in that, not merely those things which are nominally and expressly referred to in the 95th section, but, also the power to compromise which is conferred by the 160th section.

Now it appears to me to be unnecessary to decide many of the questions which have been argued before us, or at least several of them, because the evidence in this case appears wholly insufficient to justify an order framed as the order now before us is framed. I think, therefore, that that order must be discharged, on the simple ground that the evidence which is before us does not justify the judicial exercise of such a power as is given by the section to which I have referred. That being so, I think we are not in any degree preventing the accomplishment of the object which the Vice-Chancellor appears to have had in view, because it seems to me that, if the parties would have the good sense to meet together and discuss this matter, without reference to their extreme rights on either side, and, if, upon that discussion taking place, it is deemed desirable to enter into a compromise, that compromise can be effected in the manner I suggested during the argument; that is, that some person should be nominated to represent the interests of the creditors. Some other person would represent, if the official liquidator does not sufficiently represent, the interests of the shareholders, and therefore by means of two or three persons so selected the matter might be discussed in a manner which would not render it public at all, and then, in the presence of the judge, and with the sanction of the judge, certain limits might be defined within which one particular person might be authorised to enter into a compromise. It seems to be a simple mode of accomplishing the object which the parties have in view; but I think we should be going beyond the powers conferred on us by this Act of Parliament if, upon such evidence as is now before the court, we were to say that this order can be supported. I think that the result is, that the order of the 8th May, which is the order ordering the applicant to pay certain costs, should be discharged, and so much of the order of the 30th April should be discharged as orders that "the said John Ball be at liberty to exercise all the powers of the 95th section of the Companies Act 1862 without the sanction or intervention of the court, except that of distributing the assets of the said company." I think, with reference to the question of costs, the official liquidator should have his costs both here and below, and that the other parties should bear their costs, both here and below.

Digitized by Google

GIFFARD, L. J. said.—I am of opinion that this order cannot stand, and on the simple ground that there is not sufficient constat on which to found it. Whether the order is made under the 96th or the 160th section, I am of opinion that there must be, in order to support an order of this description, a constat showing that there has been that on which the court could exercise judicial discretion, and it is obvious that there is no evidence here to support the order, which has, I think, been erroneously made.

Then with respect to the course that can be adopted, this is no doubt both a difficult and a delicate matter, and a matter which may be so conducted as to be very injurious to the interests of the parties if they are determined to stand out for their extreme rights; and I cannot see why a representative of the creditors should not be appointed, and when that has been done I can see no reason why, in the presence of the judge and of the official liquidator, some proposition should not be made authorising the official liquidator to compromise within certain limits. That being so, I think that the proper order here is that suggested by my learned brother, and the reason why I think the parties below ought not to have any costs is this, that they have been standing out for their extreme rights, and asking for nothing but that. If they had come forward with some reasonable proposition I might, for one, have acted differently as regards the costs. I am certain that standing out for extreme rights in a case of this sort will only lead to the injury of all parties concerned, and will very materially affect, and prejudicially affect, their interests.

Solicitors for the official liquidator, Mackenzie and Trinder;

Solicitors for the parties appealing, Brandon and Co.; Gregory, Rowcliffe, and Rawle.

Saturday, July 24.

(Before Lord Justice GIFFARD.)

Re THE MASONS' HALL TAVERN COMPANY (LIMITED).

ORGILL'S CASE.

Company—Winding-up—The Companies Act 1862, s. 165—Money received by a director from a promoter of the company out of a profit made by him from the company—Whether the director can be ordered to repay it as being money of the company.

O., being asked by K., a promoter of a company, to become a director of the company, the qualification for which was the holding of fifty shares of 10*l. each, declined to do so, and then K. offered to provide the qualification for him. O., under these circumstances, consented, and N., another of the promoters, out of the profit which he made by the sale of certain property to the company, paid up fifty shares in full for O. There was no completed agreement for sale of the property by N. to the company before O. became a director. The company having been ordered to be wound-up, an application was made by the official liquidator, under sect.* 165 of the Companies Act 1862, for an order that O. should repay the 500*l. paid-up for him by N. as being money of the company retained by O.:*

Held (affirming the M. R.), that the sale by N. to the company not being repudiated, no such order could be made.

This was an appeal from the Master of the Rolls. The company was incorporated on the 12th Oct. 1865 for the purpose of purchasing the Masons' Hall Tavern, situate in Masons' Avenue, in the City of London, and some adjoining houses, Nos. 13 and 14, Basinghall-street. The company was to carry on the business of the tavern, and to erect on the premises in Basinghall-street an auction mart for the accommodation of auctioneers connected with the licensed victuallers' trade, and also for general sales and public meetings. Some arrangement was entered into for the purchase of the property in fee simple for 42,000*l.* of Mr. W. F. Nokes, who held a lease of the ground from the Masons' Company, it being intended that he should arrange with the Masons' Company for the purchase of the reversion.

The memorandum of association was signed by seven persons, one of whom was Mr. John James Orgill, an auctioneer, who signed for fifty shares. The articles of association provided that the first directors of the company should be appointed by the subscribers of the memorandum of association, and that until such appointment should be made the subscribers of the memorandum should be the directors of the company. The future qualification of a director was fixed at fifty shares. The articles did not refer to any contract for the purchase of any property as having been actually entered into, but they gave the directors power to purchase, take on lease, or otherwise acquire, any lands, buildings, hereditaments, and premises. The first meeting of directors which Mr. Orgill attended was held on the 17th Oct. 1865, and he attended many other meetings subsequently. The shares were allotted on the 19th Jan. 1866, and 100 shares were allotted to Mr. Orgill, who had applied for that number.

It appeared that Mr. Orgill was induced to become a director of the company in this way. Early in Oct. 1865 Mr. Arthur Kelday, another of the persons who subscribed the memorandum, called on Mr. Orgill, and urged him to join the then intended company. Mr. Orgill was at first unwilling to do so, but Mr. Kelday promised that his qualification as a director, viz., fifty shares of 10*l.* each, should be paid for by the promoters, and told him that the promoters expected to make some profit from the company, out of which profit they would pay his qualification as a director, and he thereupon consented to be a director. The whole of the 500*l.* due upon fifty of the shares allotted to Orgill was in fact afterwards paid to the company by Nokes. The other fifty shares Orgill paid for himself.

Digitized by Google

It appeared that after the company was incorporated, Nokes entered into a contract with the Masons' Company for the purchase of the reversion of the tavern for 9000*l.* The tavern was afterwards sold by the company to a Mr. Marsden for 19,000*l.*, out of which sum the 9000*l.* was paid to the Masons' Company, and the balance of 10,000*l.* was paid to Nokes for his leasehold interest, which he had previously purchased for 7500*l.*

Under the circumstances, the company having been ordered to be wound-up, a summons was taken out before the Master of the Rolls by the official liquidator, with the view of compelling Mr. Orgill to repay the 500*l.* so paid for him by Nokes, on the ground that it was money belonging to the company, which Orgill as a director could not retain.

The Master of the Rolls refused the application. His Lordship gave the following judgment: "I am of opinion that no case whatever has been made out for the court to compel Mr. Orgill to repay or to pay the 500*l.* This application is made under the 165th section of the Winding-up Act, which says, 'where in the course of the winding-up of any company it appears that any director has misapplied or retained in his own hands, or become liable or accountable for moneys of the company.' In this case Mr. Orgill has had no moneys of the company; they are moneys of a purchaser, who has paid money for the property which has been sold by the company, to be paid to the persons who sell, nor has he 'been guilty of any misfeasance or breach of trust in relation to the company,' so that the court may examine into his conduct, and so on. I think Mr. Orgill has not been guilty of any misfeasance or breach of his trust. The case is a very simple one. Either the contract which was entered into between the company and Mr. Nokes for the purpose of allowing the property to be sold to Mr. Marsden the purchaser for 19,000*l.* was at a preposterously large value, or it was not. If it was sold at a preposterously large value the application should be made against Nokes, because there is no suggestion that Mr. Orgill was instrumental in carrying the contract into effect, or that Mr Nokes got more than a reasonable price for the property sold. He was the owner of the leasehold of the Masons' Hall Tavern, and he entered into a contract to buy the reversion for 9000*l.* The company sold it to Mr. Marsden for 19,000*l.*, and they divided the 19,000*l.* in this way; 9000*l.* was paid to the Masons' Company, and 10,000*l.* to Mr. Nokes as the price of the leasehold. If that was the fair value of the leasehold, no person has a right to complain. If they gave him more than he ought to have received for it, and that was done by means of bribing one of the directors, unquestionably a very bad case would be made. But there is no evidence of the sort even suggested, and far less is it suggested that Mr. Orgill was liable in respect of it. If it was the act of all the directors, they would be just as liable as Mr. Orgill. Mr. Nokes could do what he pleased with the money he obtained, and he was at perfect liberty to pay for paid up shares for a person whom he wished to become a director of the company, if he thought it beneficial for the company to do so. Accordingly he induces Mr. Orgill, who it appears is an auctioneer, and therefore would be useful to the company, to become a director, on the promise of paying for the fifty paid up shares, which would be the qualification. If that had not been done the only effect would be that Mr. Orgill would have taken fifty shares only instead of one hundred, because he has paid upon fifty shares out of his own money, and has had fifty shares paid up with Mr. Nokes's money, but he would have been qualified as a director just as much if he had only had fifty. The whole transaction appears perfectly bonâ fide and regular. If there had been an express contract, "If you enable me to get a profit, I will give you something out of it," that would be a separate and distinct matter, and then you would be entitled to take the shares if you could not take the money. But all that is done is that the money is laid out in paid up shares, and 500*l.* is paid to the company, so that the company have got the money which they are now seeking to get over again on this occasion. I am of opinion that they cannot do that. I think Mr. Orgill's conduct has been perfectly straightforward, and also the conduct of Mr. Nokes. I do not perceive that there has been any concealment or anything of that kind in the matter. That Mr. Nokes made a very large profit out of the transaction is very probable; but that is a matter to be tried in a suit against him if it can be shown that he was a trustee for the company in the sense of being the agent of the company. But that would not apply to Mr. Orgill. I am of opinion therefore, that the summons must be dismissed, and that the costs of all parties should come out of the estate.

From this decision the official liquidator appealed.

Jessel, Q. C. and Eddis, Q. C., in support of the appeal, contended that even though the company affirmed the sale as far as Nokes was concerned, still Orgill, who was a trustee for the company, could not be allowed to retain any part of the profit made on the transaction. He became a trustee for the company with a view to the carrying out of a certain purchase, and then he received a douceur out of the purchase money. The money so received he could not be allowed to retain. The duty of Orgill as a director was to make the best bargain he could for the company, and therefore he ought to have insisted on the company paying to Nokes the 10,000*l.* less the 500*l.*, which he was to receive out of it. They referred to the following authorities:

The Madrid Bank v. Pelly, L. Rep. 7 Eq. 442;
Re The London and Provincial Starch Company, W. N. 1869, 98; 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 390;
Tyrrell v. The Bank of London, 6 L. T. Rep. N. S. 1.

Without calling upon

Southgate, Q. C. and Begg, who appeared for Mr. Orgill,

Lord Justice GIFFARD said.—This is an application made under the 165th section of the Winding-up Act. It is an application against Mr. Orgill alone. Mr. Nokes is not here. The arguments that have been addressed to me, particularly by Mr. Eddis, would undoubtedly be very cogent arguments indeed if we were now considering what would be the result of a suit instituted by the company against Mr. Orgill and against Mr. Nokes for the purpose of setting aside this sale. That is not the matter now before me at all. It has been admitted very properly that in this proceeding I must take it that the company affirmed the sale. That being so, it seems to me to follow that Mr. Orgill cannot be called upon to refund this money. I can well understand that, if there was a transaction of a character which was a mere cloak for the purpose of getting a douceur, then, under the 165th section, the court would order that to be returned. That is really not the transaction. The transaction is this. Mr. Orgill was an auctioneer. The promoters of the company were desirous that he should be a director, and they agreed with him that he should become a director, he declining to become a director unless they qualified him. That was the substantial agreement in respect of which he became a director, and, becoming a director, he could have maintained an action or proceeding for an indemnity against the parties so agreeing with him. That was the antecedent obligation on the part of those persons, and among others on the part of Mr. Nokes. True it is he says he understood that he was to be paid out of the profits which the promoters might make, and that would be a most sufficient reason for setting aside the contract; but, when you get the contract affirmed, of course, the contract being affirmed, I must assume it was a fair contract, and for a fair price, and I think it would be going far beyond any decided case if I held otherwise. I am not at all inclined to restrict the case of Tyrrell v. Bank of London, or any cases of that class. On the contrary, I think they lay down a most wholesome doctrine, that a trustee or agent shall not make profit at the expense of the cestui que trust. But where the transaction on the part of Nokes is an antecedent obligation to Orgill, Nokes selling to the company, and the company affirming that sale, it must be taken that that is a sale which cannot now be disputed. Then Nokes out of that money, not giving a douceur to Orgill, but paying to Orgill a sum of money which he (Nokes) is bound in law to pay him, I do not think under those circumstances Mr. Orgill can be called upon to refund this money. I agree therefore in opinion with the Master of the Rolls, and this application must be refused with costs.

Digitized by Google

I wish it to be distinctly understood that I by no means say that it may not be a proper case for the company to institute a suit to set aside the whole transaction. In a suit of that description the considerations would be wholly different from what they are now. As to the costs, the rule we now adopt is this. We make a direct order on the official liquidator for payment of costs, and leave him to apply to the judge of the court below to give him such an indemnity as the judge thinks fit.

Solicitors for the official liquidator, Mercer and Mercer.

Solicitors for Mr. Orgill, Mackeson and Goldring.

V. C. MALINS' COURT.

Reported by G. T. EDWARDS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Friday, June 4.

Re KEMPTNER'S MORTGAGE.

Partner—Bills drawn for share in partnership—Subsequent failure—Insolvency at date of bills—General and separate creditors.

K., a member of a Japan firm of merchants, being about to go to England, drew bills in three sets, as representing his share, took one set to New York, and died there. The bills so taken by K. were lost, and another set were indorsed to abide the decision of the court on a question raised in consequence of the subsequent failure of the firm, as between the general and separate creditors of K.:

Held, that it being clear on the evidence that the firm was insolvent at the date of the bills, they belonged to the estate of the firm.

This was a petition for payment out of court of a sum of 4000*l.*, represented by certain bills of exchange, endorsed for the purpose of abiding the decision of the court, and paid in under the provisions of the Trustee Relief Act.

In this case, L. Kemptner being a member of a mercantile firm carrying on business in Japan, being about to come to England, in Feb. 1867, and there being at that time a sum of 4000*l.* standing to his account in the partnership books, procured bills from the firm, in three sets, to that amount. The first set being duly indorsed, were taken possession of by Kemptner himself; he took them to New York with him, and there died, and they were not forthcoming, and the second set were not indorsed until the May following. The firm failed in the end of 1867, and the question arose as between private creditors of Kemptner and his executors, whether his estate could be credited with the amount of the bills. Evidence was adduced to show that a firm of Smith and Co., connected with Kemptner's firm in business, was, at the time the bills were given, liable to half the amount of a loss of 30,000*l.* accrued upon certain silk shipments, and that, therefore, the Japan firm were then sufficiently solvent to meet the bills on Kemptner's account. On the other hand it was also alleged that Smith and Co. were unable to meet the 15,000*l.* to which they were liable, and that, therefore, the loss falling on Kemptner's firm, that firm was, in fact, at the time the bills were given, unable to meet the amount. The firm failed at the end of 1867 for 100,000*l.* and upwards. A petition was presented by creditors of Kemptner's firm, claiming payment of the bills to them.

C. Locock Webb appeared in support of the petition, and insisted that the firm of which Kemptner was a member being in fact insolvent at the time the bills were given, they belonged to the general creditors, and not to Kemptner's estate.

Lindley, for the representatives of Kemptner, contended that if at the date of the bills the assets of the firm were sufficient to meet them, it mattered nothing what subsequently took place. It appeared in evidence that 15,000*l.* was the only liability, and that on the balance of account there was sufficient to meet the bills.

Ex parte Kleck, 1 Mad. 346.

Stirling for the trustees.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR (without hearing a reply).—These bills were drawn on the assumption that Kemptner was entitled to sufficient to meet them. No doubt the first set were not forthcoming, and the second set not indorsed; but it was ascertained in the latter end of 1867 that in 1866 Kemptner's firm was insolvent, and Kemptner being no longer a free agent, the giving the bills, if that was so, was a fraud on the firm of which he was a member. The bills were subsequently endorsed by arrangement, in order that the money might be brought into account to abide the decision of the court, and I have to decide whether Kemptner by this transaction became entitled to the 4000*l.*, because his executors, of course, have no greater right than he himself had. It is admitted by Mr. Lindley that if the transaction was fraudulent, the right to receive the money by the representatives of Kemptner cannot exist. Now was it a fraud or not? I should be slow to come to the conclusion that Kemptner intended to commit a fraud, but I must look at the transaction, and the position of the parties when it took place. Now, at that time, the firm was insolvent, because, although there was 50,000dols. available capital, it is admitted that three or four months after there was a loss of 30,000*l.*, although under an arrangement with Messrs. Smith and Co., they were to bear half the loss, but in case they could not meet it, the whole would fall on Kemptner's firm. Now Smith and Co. were unable to meet it, and the whole loss, therefore, fell on the Japan firm. That took place in Aug. 1866, and it was well known in Feb. 1867, when the bills were drawn, that there was a great improbability of there being assets to meet them, and whether that was intended as a fraud or not made no difference. But besides that there is the clear breach of trust on this transaction, because, as it could only proceed upon the supposition of the solvency of the firm, at the end of the same year, it was insolvent for 101,100*l.*, the only assets being 7000*l.*, and that on no new undertaking or unforeseen contingency, for it is admitted that the transaction on which the loss occurred was entered into before the bills were given. Upon what principle, then, a partner who was joined with the others in a mercantile dealing, which may end in a ruinous loss, can be held entitled as against the general creditors under such circumstances as these, I cannot imagine. In order to defeat the right of Kemptner's representatives, the money not having been received, there must be a stoppage in transitu, the non-receipt being merely an accident. Under these circumstances, the court will be bound to prevent such a grossly improper thing being done. Whether knowledge can be imputed to Kemptner and his partners or not, it is an attempt to take money which belongs to the creditors, when the representatives of Kemptner can only resort to what remains after satisfying them. The bills not having been paid, the creditors had a right to follow them. It frequently happens that the court has possession of such securities; and whenever it has, it is its duty to say that the proceeds shall go, not to a separate creditor like Kemptner, but to remain part of the assets of the firm of which he was a member.

Digitized by Google

July 20 and 21.

COUTTS v. ACKWORTH.

Voluntary appointment—Power of revocation.

M. H. having a general power of appointment by deed or will under her father's will over 3000l. to be raised out of real estate, and being separated from her husband, and lodging with her brother-in-law A., and being threatened with a suit by her son-in-law B., whose wife (her only child) was dead, wished to put the 3000l. out of B.'s power. A. employed his cousin, a solicitor, who prepared, and M. H. executed, a deed which was an absolute appointment of the 3000l. (subject to her life interest) to A. M. H.'s husband died, and she married again, and, as it appeared by evidence, considering that she had appointed the 3000l. by will, A. was applied to for such will, but he said that his wife had it, and it was never produced until after M. H.'s death, which took place little more than a year after, she having by will under a power of revocation contained in the settlement, revoked part of the trusts, and given the bulk of the 3000l. to C., and the rest to her second husband. A. applied for and kept the settlement for some weeks, and it appeared in a bill of costs of his solicitor that he was advised to keep quiet about the appointment. On bill filed to set aside the appointment in favour of A., decree with costs.

This bill was filed to set aside a deed of appointment dated the 1st Aug. 1853, and for the delivery up of the same to be cancelled. The facts were these:—William Edmunds, by his will, dated the 18th June 1842, gave to Joseph Ackworth (deceased), the defendant, John Thurstain, and the Rev. William Pope (deceased) certain leaseholds, whereof Joseph Ackworth was tenant from year to year, and all his real and personal estates upon trust to pay his debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, and interest on a certain mortgage on the property in the occupation of Joseph Ackworth, and an annuity of 400*l.* a year to his wife. And after her decease upon trust to raise 3000*l.*, and stand possessed of the same upon trust to allow it to remain, on the security of the leaseholds, at 4*l.* per cent., or invest it in the public funds, or upon Government or real securities, with power to vary securities. And to stand possessed thereof upon trust to pay or permit his (the testator's) daughter, Mercy Harvey, to receive the dividends for her life, for her separate use, upon trust as to such sum of 3000*l.*, or the stocks, funds, and securities, in or upon which the same should be invested, and the interest, dividends, and annual proceeds thereof, for such persons upon and for such trusts, intents, and purposes, and with, under, and subject to such powers, provisions, and declarations as the said Mercy Harvey, whether covert or sole, should by any deed or deeds, with or without power of revocation and new appointment, to be sealed and delivered by her in the presence of two or more credible witnesses, or by her last will and testament or by codicil thereto, from time to time, appoint. And in default of appointment upon trust for all such children of his said daughter, as, being sons, should attain twenty-one, or, being daughters, should attain that age, or marry before such age, with power to his said daughter Mercy Harvey, at any time after his decease, to appoint any part of the income of the said 3000*l.* unto any after-taken husband, for his life. And in case his said daughter had no child who should live to attain a vested interest in the said sum of 3000*l.*, then to his (the testator's) next of kin, according to the statute. The testator died on the 23rd Oct. 1852, and his widow was also dead, but the 3000*l.* had never been raised. Mercy Harvey had a daughter who attained twenty-one and married John Benstead, with whom she lived on very bad terms, and died in 1853 without children, and Mercy Harvey never had any other child. Mercy Harvey lived separate from her husband, and with her daughter till her death, when she lodged with Joseph Ackworth, her brother-in-law, a tallow chandler, at Chatham; but disputes arising, she left after a short time, but still lived at Chatham. During the time that Mercy Harvey lived at Joseph Ackworth's, John Benstead (her son-in-law), threatened a suit for the administration of the trust-fund, and she expressed her determination that he should never have anything that she could dispose of. The bill then alleged that Joseph Ackworth advised her to make a will, and she expressed her intention to do so, either in his favour, or that of his children, Joseph William Ackworth, John Ackworth, and Sarah Elizabeth Plummer, and remained under the impression that she had executed a will. That Joseph Ackworth undertook to get a will prepared, and applied to his cousin, George Ackworth, a solicitor at Rochester, who prepared a deed absolutely and irrevocably appointing the 3000*l.* after her decease to Joseph Ackworth, and the deed now sought to be set aside was executed on the 1st Aug. 1853, it being prepared by George Ackworth, and he and his son witnessed it. The bill alleged that this instrument was never explained to Mercy Harvey, and she never knew that it was an irrevocable appointment, but thought it was a will, and never had any other professional advice. All she knew was that she was preventing her son-in-law from getting any of the money.

This deed recited the will of Wiliam Edmunds, and his death, and it was witnessed that in execution of the power and all other powers enabling her in that behalf, she did, by that writing, in the presence of the two credible persons whose names appeared as witnesses to the execution thereof, absolutely and irrevocably direct and appoint that Joseph Ackworth, John Thurstain, and William Pope, or the survivors or survivor of them, his or their executors, administrators, and assigns, or other the trustees or trustee for the time being of the will of the said William Edmunds, should from time to time, and at all times thereafter, stand possessed of and be interested in the said sum of 3000*l.*, directed to be raised by the said will after the decease of his said wife, and the stock, funds, and securities upon which the same should be invested, and the dividends, interest, and annual produce thereof, subject to the life interest of the said Mercy Harvey therein, in trust for the said Joseph Ackworth, his executors, administrators, and assigns and for no other trust, interest, or purpose whatsoever.

Digitized by Google

This deed was taken possession of by Joseph Ackworth, and he kept it until after Mercy Harvey's death, and she never afterwards saw or had a copy of it, the costs of preparing it being paid by Joseph Ackworth. In 1858 William Harvey died and William Pope in 1861, no new trustee being appointed. In the latter part of 1860 Mercy Harvey became engaged to the defendant James Russell Brenchley, and on the 8th April 1861 a deed-poll was prepared, reciting the will, intended marriage, &c., and that Mercy Harvey was desirous of exercising her power over the 3000*l.*, and without referring to the deed of 1st Aug. 1853; it was witnessed that, in execution of the power and of every other power enabling her in that behalf, she, the said Mercy Harvey, absolutely revoked all deeds executed by her with respect to the 3000*l.*, and by virtue of the said power she, the said Mercy Harvey, did (in the usual form of words) absolutely and irrevocably appoint that in case the said marriage took effect, the trustees of the said will should, after the decease of the said Mercy Harvey, stand possessed of the income of the 3000*l.* upon trust to pay such income to James Russell Brenchley for life, and after the decease of the survivor to pay and divide the said sum of 3000*l.* equally between Joseph William Ackworth and John Ackworth and Sarah Elizabeth Plummer, their executors, administrators, and assigns, as tenants in common. Then followed a general power of revocation.

The marriage took place in April 1861, and before the deed was prepared James Ward, the solicitor employed, asked whether she had executed any other deed, and she said she had made a will in favour of Joseph Ackworth's three children, and she asked if it was necessary to get it, to which he replied no, because the deed overrode it. Joseph Ackworth was then applied to, and without stating that it was not a will, he replied that his wife had it, and she refused to give it up; and Mercy Brenchley having told her husband no further steps were taken, and Joseph Ackworth and John Thurstain were served with notice of the deed poll or settlement, and Joseph Ackworth asking to see it, it was sent to him, and he kept it for three or four weeks, and did not return it until applied to several times, but never mentioned the irrevocable nature of the deed. In Feb. 1862, Mercy Brenchley made a will, and, reciting the power, revoked the trusts of the deed poll, and appointed 1000*l.* to her husband, and 2000*l.* to the plaintiff, and in the event of his predeceasing her, to his executors and administrators. Mercy Brenchley died on the 22nd July 1862, and the plaintiff proved her will, of which Joseph Ackworth complained, but never produced the irrevocable deed, although he procured Thurstain to concur in the surrender of the lease, and a new one was granted to him alone.

On the death of Mary Brenchley, the plaintiff's solicitors applied to Messrs. Ackworth, and for the first time heard of the deed of Aug. 1851, and the plaintiff becoming bankrupt in 1863, that was superseded in 1867; Joseph Ackworth having died in Dec. 1866, made his will and appointed Charles Buyat executor, and gave all his property to his children equally. A correspondence took place, resulting in this bill being filed in Feb. 1868, praying that the deed of Aug. 1853 might be set aside, and a declaration that the trust fund was well appointed by the deed poll of 1861, and that James Russell Brenchley was put to his election between the life estate under the deed, and the 1000*l.* under the will; and that the executors of Joseph Ackworth might make good the trust fund out of his assets, with interest from the decease of Mercy Brehchley, or for the administration of his estate, and if necessary for the administration of the estate of William Edmunds. Answers were put in, and there was a great deal of evidence, and amongst the documents a bill of costs of Messrs. Ackworth, in which was an item, advising Joseph Ackworth to keep quiet about the deed of Aug. 1853.

Glasse, Q. C., and Bagshawe, for the plaintiff, contended that the conduct of Joseph Ackworth in concealing the deed, not disclosing its existence or true nature, under advice, as appeared by the bill of costs, although he had notice of the settlement, was alone sufficient to render it void. Moreover, Mrs Harvey was deceived as to its effect, it was never explained to her, she thought it a will, and that the settlement overrode it; and she had no professional assistance, but from a relative of the appointee paid by him. The transaction was not fair or understood properly by the appointor:

Cooke v. Lamotte, 15 Beav. 240;
Toker v. Toker, 31 Ibid. 629;
Phillipson v. Kerry, 32 Ibid. 628;
Huguenin v. Baseley, 14 Ves. 273.

Fooks, Q. C., and Bevir, for Mr. Brenchley, in the same interest as the plaintiff, took the same line of argument.

Cotton, Q. C. and A. E. Miller, for the defendant, Joseph Ackworth, insisted that the object of the appointor being plain, viz., to divest herself of all power over the fund, for the purpose of disappointing her husband and son-in-law, and being a person of full age, it would take very strong proof of being imposed upon to entitle the plaintiff to relief. She had the amplest opportunity of knowing what she was doing. She must have known the nature of the deed, being a middle-aged woman and deliberately doing the act. Joseph Ackworth was not bound to disclose what she had done; for she made the settlement knowing that she had before put the property out of her power, and there was no proof of unfair advantage. The mere fact of no power of revocation being reserved was quite insufficient to make the deed void; no case went to that:

Hunter v. Atkins, 3 M. & K. 113.

Cole, Q. C. and Dixon, for the trustee, took no part.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR (after stating the facts).—I assume that Joseph Ackworth was a man of irreproachable character, and the evident object of this deed was to put the 3000*l.* out of the lady's own control, that she might not be subject to the importunities of her husband and son-in-law. She does not appear even to have employed a solicitor; and being a resident in Joseph Ackworth's house for six weeks, no doubt she was under some degree of influence; but the case does not depend upon that, although that circumstance is not entirely to be disregarded. However, George Ackworth, a cousin of Joseph Ackworth, and practising at Rochester, took instructions for this deed, and on the evidence I come to the conclusion that those instructions were given substantially by Joseph

Ackworth; at all events, if they were given by her, she had only an imperfect apprehension of her rights and position. I consider that, under such circumstances, George Ackworth was bound to regard himself as acting for her, although no doubt he acted for Joseph Ackworth, who paid his bill; and it was his imperative duty to see that she was duly protected, and retained a proper control over the capital of that which was all the property she had, and of which she was the absolute mistress, being tenant for life, with power of appointment over the capital, having only to call on the trustees to hand it over to her bodily, whenever she thought fit. It produced her 120*l.* a year. She had an infirm husband, who was probably troublesome to her; and events might arise with respect to herself and other relations in life might render it necessary to use some portion of the capital to meet the exigency; and it did arise when she was afflicted by that most dreadful disease cancer. It is obvious that she ought to have been left in possession of the capital to dispose of for her own purposes; she was only fifty-three, not living with her husband, whether from her own fault is not material. In all probability if she survived the husband, as her first marriage was unfortunate, she would try a second, and for that reason alone she should have been allowed to retain the control over this property. It was said that a gift to Joseph Ackworth was in fact a gift to his wife and children, I cannot accede to that proposition, for he had the absolute control, and could sell the reversion, and cut down Mrs. Harvey to a life estate, and if he became bankrupt it would pass to his assignees, and all this was in favour of a man who I must consider as a stranger in blood. It was the duty of George Ackworth to put before her the fact that in case of illness or other exigency she could not deal with this money without applying to Joseph Ackworth, and there is not an iota of evidence to show that any such thing was said. There is, indeed, evidence of Mrs. Plommel that she was told that the instrument was irrevocable, and that the property would be Joseph Ackworth's afterwards; but I do not believe that she understood what that meant, and I think she ought to have been informed. I bring this within that class of cases with respect to which Lord Eldon observed that a person ought not to be allowed to execute such a deed. In Toker v. Toker (sup.), the solicitor asked whether there ought not to be a power of revocation reserved, when the lady refused to have it inserted. In that case she was seventy-four years old, here fifty-three; there there was a deliberate intention, and moreover the person employed was the family solicitor, and yet the deed was set aside. This poor woman had only the solicitor of the man who was to benefit by the deed to advise, and her position was none the better for his advice, for applying the principle of the authorities, he should have left the capital under her own control, her only object being to be protected against her husband and son-in-law. I consider that I am bound to come to the conclusion that the insertion of a power of revocation was deliberately abstained from, because it was the object of the solicitor and appointee, finally and for ever to secure possession of the 3000*l.* to Joseph Ackworth after her death, whereas she ought never to have been permitted to execute such a deed which was short sighted and improvident. What happened? Her husband died, which entirely altered her position, and she was open to contract a new relation, and three years after she married again and said she believed she had made a will. It is difficult now to say whether she knew that a will could not be upon parchment, but she was convinced that whether a will or not, she had the control during her life. Mr. Ward's evidence was that she considered she had made a will, and that she wished to provide for Joseph Ackworth's children; and that Ward told her it was unnecessary to consider what she had done by the will, because the deed overrode it. Then came the settlement on her second marriage; and during all this time Joseph Ackworth was alive, and died in 1866. He was in possession of a deed which it is obvious she did not know the effect of, but he did; and that on her second marriage she would make some provision for her husband; and was it decent or proper for him to stand by and allow her to make a settlement which, under the circumstances, was not worth the parchment it was written on. There is all but proof that he had got a deed which he dare not produce, and which was not in conformity with the intention of the appointor; she was deprived of the dominion and that was the reason why it never was produced till after her death. There was an attempt to show that her habits were intemperate, but it entirely failed, and there is evidence that she lived in domestic happiness till her death; and then this deed was brought forward, and the entries in the bills of costs of the firm who advised Joseph Ackworth show that he was advised to keep quiet in possession of a deed which gave him absolute dominion, and he did keep quiet until October; and I am satisfied that he knew he had taken improper advantage of this lady by getting all the property she had in the world. The plaintiff was her spiritual pastor, and claims under a will admitted to probate, and under a solemn disposition, the probate being conclusive on this court. The settlement contained a power of revocation, and Mr. Ward properly discharging his duty, and by the will she revoked the appointment in favour of her nephews and nieces. The second husband was abominably treated, and, I suppose, had not the means of asserting his rights, nor was the plaintiff of a class of men abounding in wealth, and Joseph Ackworth having lent him 100*l.* sued him for it; he was made bankrupt, but that was superseded on payment of the only creditor, and must be regarded as if it never existed, and he as the lady's legal personal representative, asks that this deed may be set aside and delivered up. I am clearly of opinion that he is entitled to what he asks. As to the concise statement, it contains matter proved to be untrue, of the most gross and unwarrantable description, and moreover has been fully answered, and could not advance the defendant's case in the least; and as clearly appears by the counsel's note at the foot, was only for the purpose of intimidation, and to force the plaintiff to abandon the suit. Those filing it must pay all the costs occasioned by it. With regard to the authorities, they all proceed on the principle laid down in Huguenin v. Bazeley (sup.), which is this, that where there is a voluntary provision made of a fund in favour of a donee, whether by appointment, settlement, or in any other form, the burden is thrown on such donee to show that the transaction was fair, proper, and well understood by the donor. Here it was unfair, it deprived her of the control of all her property; it never was explained, for if it had been the donee would have been discharged; and upon that it is hardly necessary to refer to the authorities. Huguenin v. Bazeley (sup.) laid down the rule, and Cook v. Lamotte, Andrews v. Emsworth, and Forshaw v. Welsby, carried it much further, because they show that when on the execution of a voluntary deed the circumstances are such that the donor ought to have been advised to retain a power of revocation, and it was not done, that is fatal to the deed. Lord Eldon considered that, although there might be particular circumstances rendering it invalid, he did not rest his decision on that ground alone: (See White and Tudor's Leading Cas. 425, referring to 14 Ves. 296.) All these observations are applicable here where a woman in middle life was surprised into the execution of a deed whereby she was deprived of her property, which would have been obviated by simply inserting a power of revocation. If I had the power I would lay it down that wherever there is a voluntary gift of a material part of a person's property, unless as in Toker v. Toker the donor refuses to have a power of revocation inserted, it is the duty of the solicitor to insert it, and to refuse to prepare such an instrument unless a reasonable protection is afforded to the donor by a power of altering what he has done. An omission of such a power is almost conclusive for setting it aside. I consider that I need not go further than the cases warrant me; but, if it were necessary, I should have no hesitation in doing so in this case, because it is impossible for any case more clearly to illustrate the principle that, unless it is distinctly proved that there was a decided intention not to allow the insertion of such a clause, it was the duty of the solicitor to insist either that there should be a general power of appointment or a power of revocation. This deed, therefore, is open to all the objections that ought to have been provided against; it is therefore invalid, and must be set aside, as an unfair attempt to gain absolute possession of this property, and delivered up to be cancelled. I see no ground on which I can relieve those who are in the wrong and attempted to sustain the claim, from the consequences, for, instead of coming to some reasonable terms, they insisted on their extreme rights, and resisted a very proper demand, and must pay the costs of the suit. There must be a declaration of charge on the property for 3000*l.*, with interest at 4*l.* per cent. from the death of Mrs. Brenchley, within six months.

Digitized by Google

Solicitors for the plaintiffs, Learoyd and Bleby.

Solicitor for the husband, Scott Lawson.

Solicitor for the defendants, Steinberg.

V. C. JAMES'S COURT.

Reported by W. H. BENNET and R. T. BOULT, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Tuesday, June 29.

BARNES v. WOOD.

Vendor and purchaser—Acknowledgment by married woman—Specific performance.

B. contracted to purchase from S. a freehold property for which an agreement was entered into between them, and a deposit paid. It turned out that S. was not entitled in fee, but only to an estate pur auter vie, with remainder to the use of him and his wife. The wife's acknowledgment to the conveyance being necessary, this formality could not be completed, the sale was therefore considered as abandoned, and the deposit returned.

The property was subsequently sold to W., and the conveyance duly acknowledged by the wife.

On bill filed by S. for a specific performance of this agreement, and a declaration that W. was a trustee for B.

Held that he was so, and decree for specific performance made as to such interest as S. had in the property, and reference as to the amount of compensation to plaintiff for the interest not conveyed to him.

This was a bill filed by Benjamin Barnes against John Wood and John Stringer for the specific performance of an agreement of the 6th Feb. 1868, whereby Barnes agreed to purchase, and Stringer to sell, a freehold piece of land for 700*l.*, and a deposit of 50*l.* was paid by Barnes to Stringer in part payment of the purchase money. It was assumed that the vendor was the owner in fee. It turned out, however, that he was only entitled to an estate pur auter vie with remainder to the use of himself and Betty his wife in her right in fee simple. It was necessary therefore that Mrs. Stringer should be a party to the conveyance by acknowledging it as a feme covert. For some reason which did not sufficiently appear this could not be obtained, and on the 20th April the deposit money was left at the plaintiff's house. The property was subsequently sold to the defendant. The conveyance to him was duly executed and acknowledged in due form by Mrs. Stringer.

The bill stated these circumstances, and it prayed a declaration that the land was purchased by and conveyed to the defendant subject in equity to the plaintiff's contract of Feb. 1868 for the purchase of it, and that the defendant Wood held the same bound by that contract to the extent of the fee simple, or if not, then to the extent of such estate and interest therein as Stringer was able to sell, and for an adequate compensation to be made to the plaintiff for such estate and interest therein as Stringer could not convey.

Amphlett, Q.C. and W. H. G. Bagshawe, for the plaintiff, urged that it was proved that the defendant Wood had knowledge of the contemplated sale to the plaintiff, and the agreement to that effect. That he therefore had obtained the land collusively and with notice, and held it in equity as a trustee for the plaintiff. That he was clearly entitled to such interest in the property as Stringer was enabled to convey.

E. E. Kay, Q.C. and G. Williamson, for the defendant Wood, contended that there was no binding agreement between the plaintiff and Stringer, and that specific performance of such an agreement as had been entered into could not have been enforced against Stringer and wife. That he (Wood) was therefore entitled under his conveyance to the property in question.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said that although Mrs. Stringer was not bound as to her remainder in fee. John Stringer was bound to convey to the plaintiff all the interest he possessed in the premises in question, and there would therefore be a decree against the defendant Wood for a conveyance of that interest with costs. There must also be a reference to chambers to ascertain the amount of compensation to be paid to plaintiff for the interest not conveyed to him.

Solicitors: Few and Co.; Williamson and Co.

Common Law Courts.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

Reported by H. LEIGH and E. LUMLEY, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Saturday, May 29.

HARVEY AND OTHERS v. THE MAYOR AND CORPORATION OF LYME REGIS.

Harbour dues—Local Harbour Act (1 & 2 Geo. 4, c. 99)—Construction of—Goods "landed within harbour"—What amounts to a "landing"—Tolls payable thereon.

By their local Harbour Act (1 & 2 Geo. 4, c. 99) the defendants are entitled to levy tolls on goods, &c., "landed," or "shipped within the cobb or harbour" of Lyme Regis. Cargoes of limestone, which were dug at the plaintiffs' quarries, situate on the shore to the westward of the harbour, were brought thence coastwise in boats into the harbour, and, by leave of the defendants, were shot out from the boats into the water at a spot within the harbour between high and low water mark, there to remain until they should be re-shipped for exportation; and it was Held (dissentiente Channell, B.) by the majority of the Court of Exchequer (Kelly, C.B. and Bramwell and Cleasby, BB.) that the depositing the limestone at the spot in question, in the manner above-mentioned was not a "landing" of the same, within the meaning of the Local Harbour Act, so as to entitle the defendants to levy a toll thereupon as upon goods "landed" within the cobb or harbour.

Digitized by Google

Leak and another (qui tam) v. Howel and another, Cro. Eliz. 533, cited and distinguished.

This was an action of replevin brought to recover damages for an alleged distress for nonpayment of harbour dues, alleged to be due to the defendants. And the declaration charged that the defendants, in or near a certain harbour or cobb called the harbour or cobb of Lyme Regis, took the goods of the plaintiffs; that is to say, a boat containing three tons of stone or thereabouts, and unjustly detained the same against sureties and pledger until, &c., with an allegation of damage thereby to the plaintiffs.

The defendants pleaded: 1. Not guilty. 2. To so much of the declaration as charged the taking and detaining the boat of the plaintiffs, and the causes of action in respect thereof, they said that by a certain Act of Parliament (1 & 2 Geo. 4, c. 99) for improving and maintaining the harbour, pier, or cobb, at the port or borough of Lyme Regis, after reciting (amongst other things) that certain ancient cobb duties therein referred to were insufficient for maintaining the said pier or cobb in good repair, and that it was expedient that more effectual provision should be made for maintaining the same, it was enacted that from and after the passing of the said Act it should and might be lawful to and for the mayor and burgesses of the said borough of Lyme Regis, and their successors for the time being, or such person or persons as he should appoint; and they were thereby authorised, from time to time and at all times, to ask and demand, take, receive, collect, recover and levy upon all and every of the ships, vessels, and boats, of whatsoever description, which should come into the said cobb or harbour, and for all goods, wares, or merchandise, and other things landed or shipped within the said cobb or harbour as aforesaid, the several rates and duties set forth in the schedules to the said Act, marked A. and B. respectively. And it was further enacted by the 5th section of the said Act, that it should and might be lawful for the said mayor and burgesses, at the times and in manner provided by the said section to appoint two sufficient persons, inhabitants of the said borough, collectors or receivers of the duties aforesaid, and such other officers as might be required for carrying into effect the purposes and provisions of the said Act. And it was further enacted, by sect. 9 of the said Act, that it should and might be lawful for the said mayor and burgesses and their successors, for the time being, by any one of themselves, or for the said collector or collectors, or any other of their officers for the time being, to go on board any ship, hoy, barque, or other vessel that should come into the said cobb or harbour, to demand, collect, and receive the said duties which by the aforesaid Act should be due and payable, and upon non-payment thereof to take and distrain every such ship or vessel and all her tackle, apparel, or furniture thereunto belonging, or any part thereof, and also all or any part of the goods, wares, and merchandise chargeable with the said duties, and the same to detain and keep until he or they should be satisfied and paid the said duties, sum and sums of money, and every one of them. And the defendants avow the taking of the said boat in the said place, for that at the time of the taking of the said boat of the plaintiffs, the same was within the said cobb or harbour, and the plaintiffs had just before the taking of the said boat unloaded and landed therefrom, being within the cobb or harbour, and from and off of the said barque certain goods, &c., to wit, three tons of limestone, whereby the plaintiffs became and were chargeable with the rates and duties in respect of the same provided by the said Act and specified in the schedule (B) thereto annexed —to wit, certain duties at the rate of 6*d.* per ton in respect of the said limestone, and thereupon the defendants, by their officers, duly and in pursuance of the said Act appointed in that behalf, in pursuance of the aforesaid powers in that behalf, demanded payment of the said duties from the plaintiffs, and upon non-payment thereof took and detained the said boat, as they lawfully might, &c., as a distress for and in respect of the said rates and duties, &c.

The plaintiffs pleaded in bar: 1. Joining issue on the defendants' plea. 2. As to the defendants' avowing that at the time of the taking of the boat, the same was not within the cobb or harbour as alleged. 3. For a second plea to the said avowry, denying the unloading and landing from the said boat within the said cobb or harbour goods, wares, and merchandise as alleged. 4. For a third plea to the said avowry, denying the plaintiffs' chargeability with the rates and duties provided by the said Act of Parliament. 5. And for a fourth plea to the said avowry, denial of any demand by the defendants of payment of the said duties from the plaintiffs before the taking and detaining of the said boat.

The defendants replied taking and joining issue on each of the plaintiffs' pleas respectively.

At the trial before Byles, J. and a special jury, at the last Spring Assizes at Dorchester, the following appeared to be the facts of the case.

The plaintiffs are cement merchants residing at Weymouth, and are tenants of certain quarries or beds of blue lias or limestone, situate on the foreshore, and in the adjoining cliffs, about half a mile westward of the Lyme Cobb or harbour. It appeared that the plaintiffs, as well as prior tenants of these quarries, had permission from the corporation to deposit the limestone, when dug out of the quarries, at a certain spot within the harbour, the stone being conveyed from the quarries by boats belonging to the plaintiffs into the harbour, and there shot from the boats into the water at the spot appointed as the depôt for it. The spot in question is between high and low water mark, so that at certain times of the day the heaps of stone were covered by the tide, and at other times they were left quite dry, or partially so; and the spot in question was found by the jury to be within the Cobb or harbour. The stone was deposited there in order and preparatory to its being reshipped on board vessels and exported to different parts of the Kingdom, on which exportation an export duty, as provided by the Cobb Act mentioned in the declaration, would be payable and paid.

Some disputes having arisen last year between the plaintiffs and defendants as to the payment of certain harbour dues with respect to limestone shipped direct from the quarries, to which it is not necessary now further to refer, the defendants gave notice to the plaintiffs of their intention to claim payment of a duty at the rate of 6*d.* a ton on every ton of limestone brought by boats from the plaintiffs quarries, and deposited at the depot within the cobb, as upon goods "landed" at the said cobb or harbour. Accordingly the defendants demanded payment of the said duties upon the occasion in question, and upon the refusal of the plaintiffs to pay the same, they distrained the boat of the plaintiffs in the declaration mentioned; and thence arose the present action; the question now in issue being (the jury having found that the depôt where the stone was placed was within the cobb or harbour), whether or not the placing of the stones at such depôt in the way and for the purpose abovementioned is or not a "landing" of the same within the Harbour Act (1 & 2 Geo. 4, c. 99), so as to render the plaintiffs liable to pay the duties imposed by such Act upon goods "landed." At the trial, upon the above finding of the jury, a verdict was entered for the defendants upon all the issues, leave being reserved to the plaintiffs to move to set the same aside, and to enter it for themselves on points of law.

Digitized by Google

A rule nisi was accordingly afterwards moved for and obtained by Kingdon, Q. C. for the plaintiffs in Easter Term last to set aside the defendants' verdict, and to enter the verdict for the plaintiffs for 4*l.* 4*s.*, pursuant to leave reserved, on the ground that the goods, in respect of which the seizure mentioned in the section was made, were not landed within the meaning of the Act of Parliament (1 & 2 Geo. 4, c. 99), so as to render them liable to the duties imposed by the said Act.

H. T. Cole, Q. C., Archibald, and Bullen, for the defendants, now showed cause.—The question, and the only question in the case is, whether the depôts at which the limestones, in respect of which the seizure and replevin took place, were landed, was "within the cobb or harbour," and that question the jury have found in favour of the defendants. It is contended contra, that it was not a "landing" within the meaning of the Act, because the stones were brought to the "depôts" for a temporary purpose only, namely, to await reshipment to some place outside the port. But the defendants do not and are not bound to know anything of such purpose; it being enough in order to make the tolls payable, that the goods were landed. [KELLY, C. B.—If the stones had been brought in the boat at high water and transferred to a vessel, without either the boat or the stones touching the ground, would that have been a "landing" within the Act?] It is contended that it clearly would have been. Here the stone was brought and thrown out at this spot within the harbour, between high and low water-mark, by leave of the corporation. In the case of Leak and another (qui tam) v. Howel and another, Cro. Eliz. 533, which was an action for penalties under the statute of 1 Eliz. c. 11, s. 2, forbidding, for the protection of the revenue, persons to take up, discharge, and lay on land goods, except between seven a.m. and four p.m. under the penalty of forfeiture, it was held that the forfeiture was not incurred where goods were discharged into lighters at noon, brought to the seashore, "aquâ ab inde refluxâ" (and so below high water mark), at two p.m., and the greater part put on land before four p.m., showing that all the goods were "laid on land" before four, although partly unladen after that hour. And in Hale, De Portibus Maris, "concerning customs" Hargreave's Tracts, 224—228, that case is considered by Sir M. Hale to have so decided. [KELLY, C. B.—Is that case in Cro. Eliz. in the defendants' favour when it comes to be looked at?] To this extent, that there is no difference between "laying on land" and "landed." The term "landed" in the Act must be construed according to the nature of the particular goods or cargo. It has not one absolutely unbending meaning; for example, if grain, or other perishable goods were left on the shore, or thrown into the sea, that might not be a "landing" of them within the Act; but those stones were as much "landed" for all practical purposes, as if they had been placed on the wall of the cobb or pier, and neither the spot nor the manner of discharging them was unusual or improper. If goods are placed so that the owner is enabled to get at them and dispose of them, then they are "landed." [BRAMWELL, B.—Is this a landing at a wharf or pier? Have the stones got to land? May not the corporation prevent their being brought to land, and say "You may throw them overboard if you like, but you shall not land them?"] Here they are placed within the power of the owner, to use them as he pleases, either to take them inland or to export them. These stones at once came into contact with the land, and were placed to remain there, and were within the very words of the Act, and indeed it may be reasonably argued that if transshipped from the boat within the harbour, without touching the ground at all, they would have been "landed" within the meaning of the Act; but it is unnecessary to go so far here, where the words of the Act are satisfied, and its intention complied with.

Kingdon, Q. C. and Lopes, for the plaintiffs, contra, in support of their rule.—The Act points to two classes of dues, one to be levied on vessels bringing or importing goods from without, and unlading them within the harbour, the other on goods exported or shipped from the port. It is impossible to say, according to the ordinary construction and use of language, that these stones were "landed" by being placed in the water, at a spot inaccessible from the shore and where at high water they were entirely submerged, and were liable to be washed away by the ebbing tide. The Act never contemplated the payment of tolls under such circumstances. These depôts were mere places for the temporary deposit of goods in transit on board vessels, to be exported, on which exportation an export toll would be paid, and if the defendants are right in their present demand both import and export tolls would have to be paid on these stones, which would be manifestly unjust. Fish are said to be "landed" when fairly within the grasp of the fisherman, and the goods of a merchant are landed when they are placed so that he can take them to his warehouse or otherwise deal with them at his will and pleasure. These stones were by no means in that position. The Act contemplates a landing for importing or exporting purposes, and not this temporary deposit. Goods "landed" are in the Act opposed to goods "shipped," which shows the intention and meaning. The case from Cro. Eliz. was a decision against a penalty in which the intention of the Act substantially had been complied with. The words of the two Acts are different, and the case does not apply in the present instance.

KELLY, C. B.—I am of opinion that we must make this rule absolute. What we have to determine is, whether the defendants are, under the circumstances which appear in this case, entitled to levy tolls on these stones, as on a "landing" of them within their harbour, within the meaning of their Act of Parliament. By that Act the defendants are entitled to levy tolls on all ships, &c. which shall come into or use the said cobb or harbour, or shall be at anchor within the same cobb or harbour, and for all goods, &c. "landed or shipped within the said cobb or harbour, as aforesaid." The defendants, then are entitled to take these tolls virtually and substantially for the use of the harbour. The tolls are by the Act to be levied and taken in three instances, or under three heads, namely, first for vessels of the burden of ten tons and upwards entering the harbour, as a toll for the use of the harbour, without any reference to the purpose for which they enter it, or the length of time they may remain there; secondly, on goods "landed" or imported into the harbour; and, thirdly, on goods shipped or exported from the harbour. Now, the question is, were these stones, under the circumstances above mentioned, "landed," so as to bring them under the second head of toll above mentioned? Unless we can see that it was a landing, not only within the bare letter, but also within the spirit and meaning of the Act, I think we ought not to hold the plaintiffs liable to the toll. Reading the Act according to the ordinary meaning and purport of the language used, it would seem clear that tolls are imposed by it on all goods which are substantially and really—I do not say technically—brought or introduced into the harbour or port, for the use and purposes of the inhabitants of Lyme and the neighbouring district. The stones in question were brought into the harbour (no matter whence they came, or how they were brought), from the quarries where they were dug, and were deposited at these depôts not for the purpose of importation, but for that of being presently reshipped, and exported, and to say that they are liable not only to an import toll for the "landing" of them, but also to an export toll on the shipment of them, where the shipment toll can only be due, where there is no landing at all, would be contrary to the plain meaning of the Legislature, and placing a construction upon the word "landed" never intended by them, simply because these stones had just touched and lain upon the ground within the harbour for any purpose whatever. Again, let us take the case, which I put during the argument, of a lighter bringing stone into the harbour, and not taking the ground at all, but transferring the stones direct from itself on board a vessel in the harbour for exportation. Is it possible to say that the stones in such a case would be "landed" within the meaning of the Act of Parliament, and that toll was payable on stone which had never in any sense come in contact with the land at all? Surely not. It would, indeed, be straining the language of a taxing Act beyond the contemplation of the Legislature. If of the requisite tonnage, the lighter would pay for the use of the harbour on entering it, and that would be all the toll to which, under the circumstances, the defendants would be entitled. Then comes the question, can this user of the soil of the harbour by permission of the corporation for a small remuneration or acknowledgment from the owners of the stones, make this to be a "landing" within the Act? The intention of the Legislature is obvious from the Act itself, and even if the case came within the words it would, I think, be contrary to the spirit and meaning of the Act to impose a toll in the present case. Reference has been made to the case of Leak and another v. Howel and another, in Cro. Eliz., but in truth that has no application to the present case. There the Crown was being defrauded of its dues by the clandestine landing of goods at unreasonable hours, and the Act of Eliz. (1 Eliz. c. 11), on which the case turned, was passed to put a stop to such frauds. In fact, the question there was not one of toll at all, but whether, under the circumstances of that case, the particular goods there had been "laid on land" within the meaning of that statute. There was there found to be a landing not only literally and substantially, but also within the meaning of the Act. The Acts differ not only in their nature and purpose, but also in their words. In the present case the stones, in my opinion, were never landed with a view to be taken on land at all, and were not, therefore, liable to toll under the defendants' local Act.

Digitized by Google

BRAMWELL, B.—I am of the same opinion. The question is really, were these stones "landed" within the meaning of the Act, so that the defendants are entitled to claim toll upon them? I think the reason of the thing is against our so holding. The statute imposes tolls on vessels coming into the harbour as an acknowledgment or payment for its protection, and the convenience experienced by them in coming in there. It also imposes a toll on goods landed; that is to say, on the owners of the goods in respect of the convenience and benefit experienced and received by them by the landing of their goods, supposing them, that is, to be landed on a quay, or on some part of the shore whence they can be conveniently taken inland. But here the facts of the case show the contrary of all this, for here these stones were not taken on the land at all, nor were they put in a place whence they could, at the will and pleasure of the owner, be taken ashore without his committing an act of trespass in so taking them. It seems to me, therefore, that the reason of the thing is against our holding a toll to be payable on "a landing." But after all it is a matter of words,—were the stones landed? Now what is the meaning of "landing?" Why, it is a putting on the land. Where does the land begin? Why, where the sea ends; and where is that? Why, at high water mark, which is above the spot where these stones were deposited. Where then were these stones placed? Why, in the sea. Could passengers from a steamboat be said to be "landed" if they were made to get out of the vessel into 3ft. or 4ft. of water? I do not say that these stones might not have been said to be landed within the meaning of the Act if they had been placed where the owner would have had the means and the right of getting at them to remove them on land, though even that I think may be doubtful. Take, for example, the case of coal vessels coming into a port and running up as high aground as they are able to do, and then carts and horses coming alongside in 2ft. or 3ft. of water, and the coal being shovelled over the sides of the vessels into the carts. When in such a case would the coal be landed? I should say not until it actually reached the land. Again, take the case of timber thrown overboard from a vessel within the harbour, but below low water mark, and left floating there, but fastened by an anchor or to a buoy, would that be landing? I should say it would not be. Possibly, although goods might not be landed, in the ordinary acceptation of the term, until they had reached the land, yet it might be said to be a landing when they had arrived at the end of their transit. Here, had the stones been so placed that they might be taken thence by the owner inland at any moment at his free will and pleasure, it might have been a "landing" within the spirit of the Act; but, in my judgment, these stones have not been "landed" within either the words or the spirit of the Act, the intention of the Act clearly being to subject goods to toll only when a freight had been derived from the landing of them. With regard to the case which has been cited, it is difficult to make it an authority in the present case for the wording of the Acts differs. In that case, too, it was needful that there should have been a failure in two things, the discharge, and the laying on land, in order to constitute the offence against which the Act of Eliz. was directed. It is, however, I think, very questionable whether the question arises here. As a matter of fact, the corporation have for a long series of years permitted the stones to be placed and to lie at these depôts without the payment of toll, and have so far furnished evidence against themselves. It is no doubt, competent to them to revoke their licence, but we find no evidence of their having done so, and it is competent to the plaintiffs to say, "You have authorised us to lay the stones there, and have practically given us to understand that we might do so without payment of any toll."

Digitized by Google

CLEASBY, B.—I also am of the same opinion, and think that this rule should be made absolute. We need not determine now whether, if liable to a "landing" toll, these stones would be liable again to a toll on exportation; but the defendants must, in order to make good their claim, show us that there was a "landing" within the Act. I think that these stones here were not "landed" within the meaning of the Act, but were merely shot by permission of the corporation into the water to lie there instead of remaining in the boat which brought them during the interval that should elapse between such deposit and their subsequent reshipment and exportation by sea, when an export toll would arise. In order to save all that waste of power the corporation gave leave for their being shot into the water. Had they been taken on land, as they might have been, an import toll would have accrued; but it was not intended that they should be so taken, but that they should be put on board vessels and carried to sea. They were not landed in the ordinary meaning of the word; but were put under water, and on the receding of the tide the consequence was that they were seen on the shore. The schedule levies tolls on goods, "shipped or landed." These stones were not "landed" in a sense corresponding with that in which goods are "shipped" when put on board ship, for they were placed here temporarily only in the course of their transit on board ship. The case cited is not applicable.

CHANNELL, B.—I do not propose formally and distinctly to dissent from the judgments of my Lord and my brothers Bramwell and Cleasby in this case; but I own that I have very great doubts in the matter; and but that the defendant will have a right of appeal without the expression of my dissent, I should have desired time to consider. I am not influenced by the case which has been cited from Cro. Eliz., for I agree with the rest of the court in thinking that it is not applicable to the present case, the words of the Act on which it was decided being neither the same nor equivalent to those of the Act in question here. It is clear, if Mr. Cole be correct in his argument, that he must contend for a right to take tolls in both cases, namely, one in "landing," and the other in "shipping" these stones, and as I understand him he does not shrink from that contention. I agree that we are to determine the meaning of the term "landing," and whether these stones were or not "landed" within the Act. In one sense at least they were "landed." It is not disputed that they were taken out of the boat in which they were brought from the plaintiffs' quarries into the harbour, and were thrown into the water and came in contact with the land, at a spot which was found by the jury to be "within the cobb or harbour." They were no longer on board the barque; they had been unshipped or unladen, and were in contact with the land. Why then were they not "landed" within the Act? I cannot find that the Act requires anything more than that the goods should be "landed within the cobb or harbour." The Act says nothing about wharves, or quays, or stores, or storehouses, or going into the country. They were on land within the harbour, and I think the letter, and also the spirit, of the Act, was then fulfilled, notwithstanding that this Act is one imposing a toll, and should therefore receive a strict construction. The jury have found that the place was within the cobb or harbour, and I see nothing to lead me to any conclusion one way or the other, as to the purpose for which the stones were placed there, or how long they were to remain there. I think they were "landed" within the meaning of the Act. I do not find anything in the Act calling for the construction that this was not a "landing" within the Act, because the stones had not touched the inland country, or some spot whence they could be taken away by the owner, and I do not wish to be wise above what is written.

Rule absolute.

Attorneys for the plaintiffs, Dangerfield and Fraser, 26, Craven-street, Strand, W.C., agents for G. Symonds, Dorchester.

Attorneys for the defendants, Hopwood and Sons, 47, Chancery-lane, W.C., agents for R. Hillman, Town Clerk, Lyme Regis.

COURT FOR DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES.

Reported by W. LEYCESTER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

June 11 and 29.

(Before Lord PENZANCE, J. O.)

BUCKMASTER v. BUCKMASTER.

Dissolution—Desertion—Covenant by wife not to insist on cohabitation—Subsequent petition for restitution of conjugal rights.

Where a wife had agreed, on condition of the payment of a sum of money, not to insist on cohabitation, though she had afterwards presented a petition for restitution of conjugal rights which she did not prosecute:

The court held, that as the wife had agreed to live separate from her husband, and cohabitation had never been actually resumed, the husband had not been guilty of desertion.

This was a wife's petition for dissolution of marriage, on the ground of adultery and desertion. The husband appeared, but did not answer. The case was heard before the Judge Ordinary, and the adultery was fully proved, but on the question of desertion the court took time to consider.

The parties were married clandestinely in June 1861, and separated on the day of the marriage, the husband returning to his father's house, near Barnstaple, and the wife to her own home, which was with her sister at Houghton Regis. The husband promised that he would endeavour to prevail on his parents to provide them with a home, and a few days after the marriage the wife went to his father's house, but his parents would not allow them to cohabit. After some negotiation the wife signed an agreement, by which, in consideration of the payment of a sum of 100*l.*, she covenanted not to molest her husband. In the following March, however, she applied for further assistance, and that being refused, she filed a petition for restitution of conjugal rights. The husband having sailed to Australia, she was unable to serve the petition upon him, and she did not proceed with it. On his return in 1866, she again applied to him to provide her with a home, and on his continued refusal, she filed this petition.

June 29.—Lord PENZANCE, J. O.—In this case the court took time to consider whether the petitioner was entitled to a dissolution of marriage on the ground of adultery and desertion. The adultery was proved, and the question was as to the desertion. It appears that the parties were married unknown to the family of the husband, and that after the marriage they returned to their homes—he to his father's, she to her sister's house. Her account of the matter is this. She says: "We returned the same day to our own homes. He was to endeavour to get his parents to consent to find a home for me. Receiving his letter, I went to the 'Mill' (his father's place), and he still said he would find a house in a day or two. I had to sleep away from him because his parents would not allow me to sleep in the house—he was much under the influence of his parents. I saw Mr. Chambers and asked his advice. He saw my husband's parents, and the result was that I should take 100*l.* not to molest him any more." The receipt on the undertaking is not forthcoming, but the solicitor was called, and he says it was an agreement that, in consideration of 100*l.*, the petitioner should abstain from molesting her husband by insisting upon her right to live with him. The upshot of the matter then is this, that the wife consented shortly after the marriage not to insist upon her rights—that, in short, she resigned them for the sum of 100*l.*, and that they have never lived together since. According to the principle that I have endeavoured to lay down in one or two previous cases that, I think does not constitute desertion on the husband's part. The wife chose to bargain with him that they should not live together, and unless cohabitation was afterwards resumed it seems to me that there could be no desertion. All that the wife is entitled to is a decree of judicial separation on the ground of adultery.

Attorneys for petitioner, Tathams, Curling, and Walls.

COURT OF ADMIRALTY (IRELAND).

Reported by OLIVER J. BURKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

May 18, 19, and 20.

THE BURNS.

Salvage—Derelict—Written acknowledgment of abandonment of vessel by her captain—Question of sufficiency of remuneration for services rendered.

A large value of a derelict saved may authorise a large reward, even in the absence of any great amount of damage incurred by the salvors. Where, therefore, a derelict vessel of value 13,000*l. was rescued from being wrecked, a tender of* 500*l. by the defendant was held insufficient, and a sum of* 1100*l. and costs were awarded to the salvors.*

The petition stated that this was a cause of salvage instituted on behalf of Isaac Notter, of Crookhaven, in the county of Cork, owner of the pilot schooner Meteor, and the master and crew thereof, against the barque called the Burns (H. Harris, master), her cargo, &c., that the Meteor, a pilot schooner of about 60 tons register, value 700*l.*, belonging to Crookhaven, about eight o'clock in the morning of the 1st Feb. 1869 fell in with a boat with six men in her S.S.E. off Crookhaven, who proved to be the master and part of the crew of the Burns, about 385 tons registered tonnage, on a voyage from Bristol to the Coast of Africa, with a general cargo; the men, who were exhausted and in need of assistance, were taken on board the Meteor, when the master stated that he and his crew had abandoned their vessel at midnight on the preceding night, and that the remainder of the crew had left the Burns in another boat, and he requested the pilot master John Mahony, to go in search of the other boat. The Meteor did go, and after an hour's sailing discovered it about three miles to the S.S.E. of where the first boat was picked up, when the chief mate and eight hands were rescued then in an exhausted condition.

The petition then stated that the wind was blowing fresh from about N.W., and a very heavy sea rolling, and considerable danger to the lives of the men in the said boats, who were heading towards the N.E., and would in all probability have been lost if not rescued, that four of the most exhausted the barque's crew, together with the effects of said crew, were sent ashore with one of the Meteor's crew, but the said Harris, the master of the Burns and the remnant of her crew, at the request of Mr. John Mahony, proceeded in the said pilot schooner in search of the said barque, the said Harris stating that he believed his vessel had gone down; that at about one p.m. on the same day, the said barque was discovered between Mizen Head and Three Castle Head, and about a mile from the shore, and near the place where the said Harris had stated he abandoned her, that she then had both her anchors down with thirty-five fathoms of chain to each, heading about S.E., her head canvas all clewed up but not furled, her head sails gone, jib-boom carried away, bulwarks injured and partly carried away, and drifting rapidly towards the shore on which she would have been driven within half an hour or thereabouts. That the said pilot-master Mahony, informed the said Harris that he and some of his crew would attempt to board the said barque, but that if Harris went with them, Mahony should have charge of the barque, and Harris's presence should not prejudice the right to derelict salvage; that after boarding said barque, the said Mahony took charge of her and gave orders to slip her said anchors, which was done, and sail set on said barque, when she was barely able to weather the Mizen Head, and was taken to the eastward of Mizen Head into smooth water, during all which time the Meteor and the rest of the crew remained alongside. That on arriving off Crookhaven harbour, it was found impossible for said barque to be brought in there, not having sufficient anchors and chains, and said barque set sail for Queenstown by the direction of Mr. Isaac Notter, who came off in a whale-boat, and at the Bell Buoy she was taken in tow by a tug sent out to her by the said I. Notter, and moored in safety alongside Wheeler's Jetty, about nine o'clock on the 2nd Feb.; that during the voyage from Crookhaven to Queenstown the said Mahony was in command and charge of the said barque, and he and most of the crew of the Meteor worked the said vessel the entire way; that the master of the said barque while the Meteor was in search of her made an acknowledgment in writing of the abandonment of said barque, and of the nature of the services of said salvors, that during the aforesaid services, there was great risk and danger to the lives of all concerned, and that the Meteor was prevented from following her usual business as a pilot cutter for eleven days, and plaintiffs submitted that a tender of 500*l.* lodged in court to the credit of this cause was far too small remuneration.

The defendants' answer alleged that the two boats belonging to the Burns were proceeding to Crookhaven in search of assistance; that when the Meteor arrived at the Burns the latter was farther off the land than when she had been left the night before; that the master of the Burns took command of her, and slipped the cables of the barque, and that when boarded she was tight, staunch, and in perfect order, and in no distress; that I. Notter having come off to the Burns off Crookhaven, and having consulted with her master, the master determined to proceed to Queenstown; and that previous to Notter's arrival the rest of her crew, who were on board the Meteor, came on board the Burns, and there were then ten hands belonging to the said barque on board of said barque; that while the Meteor was proceeding to the Burns, the master of the Burns was required by those on board the Meteor to sign a document, and it was intimated to the master that if he did not, those on board the Meteor had it in their power not to take the said master back to his vessel.

The answer denied that the master of the Burns requested Mahony to go in search of the second boat in order to rescue the men, or that the men were rescued, or that any lives were saved by the Meteor, or that there was any danger to the lives of the men in either of the boats, or that any of them were in an exhausted or fatigued condition, or that the said barque was discovered in a different place from where his master said she had been left, or that the said barque was drifting rapidly towards the shore, or that the race of the Mizen was causing a strong set towards the shore, or that the head sails of the barque were gone, or that the master agreed that his presence should not prejudice the right of the Meteor's crew to derelict salvage, or that the barque was in contemplation of law a derelict, or that said Mahony was in command of the said barque any of the way to Queenstown, or that the Meteor was prevented from following her ordinary avocations for more than two days, or that the allegations as to heavy sea, strength of wind, danger to life and property, had foundation in fact.

The "conclusion" by the plaintiffs denied the averments in the defendants' answer.

Dr. Battersly, Q. C., Dr. Elrington, Q. C., and Dr. Boyd for the plaintiffs.

Kernan, Q. C., Exham, Q. C., and Dr. Correyne for the defendants.

The following cases were cited:
The Lisbon, Ir. Rep. 1 Eq. 144;
The United Kingdom v. The Syrian, 14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 833;
The True Blue, L. Rep. 1 P. C. 206;
Taylor on Ev., s. 163;
The Barefoot, 14 Jur. 141;
The Coromandel, Swab. 205;
The Cleopatra, Swab. 135.

The facts of the case and the evidence are fully gone into by the learned judge in the following judgment:

TOWNSEND, J.—This is a cause of salvage promoted by Mr. Isaac Notter, as owner, and the master and crew of the pilot schooner Meteor, of Crookhaven, against the barque Burns and her cargo. The defendants have made a tender of 500*l.*, which the petitioners have refused. The question therefore is, is the tender sufficient? I shall not pause to consider whether the tender has been made by the respondents as fairly sufficient in their opinion to remunerate the services of the petitioners, or whether, as was suggested by the respondents' counsel, the amount was calculated on a very liberal scale to avoid litigation, I have to consider the case on its merits irrespectively of the tender. Capt. Harris and his second mate were examined de bene esse. From their evidence it appeared that the Burns, manned with a crew of fifteen hands and two Kroomen left Bristol for the West Coast of Africa with a general cargo. When off the coast of Ireland she encountered very severe weather with strong gales of wind, lost her jib-boom and a portion of her bulwarks. It was on the 31st Jan. she was off the Irish coast, and at eight o'clock on the evening of that day the wind had fallen to a calm; the sea continued very heavy, and as the vessel was drifting it became a question whether she could be kept off the land. About midnight her anchors were let go in thirty-five fathoms somewhere between Three Cable Head and the Mizen off a wild and dangerous coast, and near the well-known race of the Mizen. The anchors did not hold, and the master and crew left their vessel in two boats soon after midnight. It is said by the respondents that the boats were just going to Crookhaven for assistance, and that the barque was not derelict in law. If the master and crew left for a temporary purpose such as getting assistance and with the intention of returning, this is not such an abandonment as amounts to a dereliction, but if they quitted the vessel to save their lives, no vague general intention of getting assistance or of returning would take away the character of derelict of the vessel so abandoned. The question of dereliction must be considered, although the old rule of a proportion in such cases has become obsolete. I think the master and crew did not intend to return to that vessel again. Nothing was said about returning according to the second mate's evidence, and after they had left the vessel many hours, and saw the Crookhaven light. The master says he did not know the coast, although it has been easy for him to learn the names of the coast lands since he landed, and the not unnatural mistake of taking the Fastness light for the funnel of a steamer shows that he did not know his position. There was some discrepancy in the evidence as to when the Meteor picked up the boats of the Burns. I think, however, that the pilot's version is correct, and that they first suggested that they should go in search of the barque. It is difficult to suppose that the mate suggested a return at once to the vessel which he had left, as this would have been nothing less than an admission that he left her unnecessarily. The petitioners allege that there was danger to the crew of the boats; that they were exhausted and helpless. This is not borne out. They were not in immediate danger. They were not unable to work, and though they had been exposed to the weather and a very rough sea there was nothing in their condition to involve them in immediate peril of life. The conduct of Mahony has been much commented upon by the respondents, and it certainly requires the closest investigation. There is no doubt that Mahony was under the impression that he as salvor was entitled to ignore the master's authority on board his own vessel, and that if he as salvor got on board the vessel he was master of her. It appears also that he obtained the master's signature to a document in which the master acknowledged that he had abandoned the vessel, and that he had been picked up by the Meteor, and that its owner and its crew were entitled to salvage reward. It has been suggested that this document has been obtained under duress, but the evidence shows that the master signed the document willingly, that there was no resistance to his authority, that he made no complaint of the conduct of any of the salvors, and never objected to the document which he signed. I do not think that anything which Mahony has done could take away or diminish the amount of salvage to be awarded. Some danger there undoubtedly was in boarding the vessel, the boat was stove in when alongside, and there is no ground for the suggestion on the part of the respondents that the boat was brought alongside for any sinister purpose of enabling any particular member of the crew to get on board first, or in any manner other than good seamanship would suggest. It is stated that the salvors were to blame for refusing the assistance of a whaleboat which came alongside when they were slipping the anchors, and that they might have saved the anchors and chains; but to this it is answered that there was no objection to the slipping of the anchors, and the master himself assisted at the operation. Much ingenious argument has been addressed to the court as to the position of the vessel and her drift. This does not appear to me to be a question of much importance. The evidence of the coastguard is of great weight, they are skilled and disinterested witnesses, and they put the vessel three quarters of a mile off shore, and say that if she were drifting she would drift ashore. There was no difficulty or danger in getting the vessel under weigh, nor in taking her to Cork, but Mr. Notter is entitled to be paid for sending the hands round to Cork, but not for the loss of time of the Meteor in taking them, as they need not have been sent in so expensive a manner. There is then an admitted value of 13,000*l.* rescued from a position of great danger, arising from her being helpless and abandoned, subject to all the incidents of the change of weather, and on a dangerous coast. On the other hand there was no risk of life or limb to the salvors, and no unusual skill or labour in their services. I have no wish to discourage tenders; but each case of salvage must rest on its own merits, and a very large value may authorise a large reward in the absence of any large amount of danger, labour or skill, in the service, which danger, labour, or skill may also receive a large reward, when the value is not large. Looking to the principles which guide Courts of Admiralty in rewarding salvage services with a liberal hand, I overrule the tender of 500*l.*, and award the salvors 1100*l.* and their costs.

Digitized by Google

Attorneys for plaintiffs, Doran and O'Brien.

Attorney for defendants, The Queen's Proctor.

Election Petitions.

Reported by F. O. CRUMP, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

THE BOROUGH OF HASTINGS.

April 14, 15, 16, and 17.

(Before BLACKBURN, J.)

Barrister's court money—Agency of registration association—When payment corrupt—Question of fact—Lavish expenditure by candidate to acquire influence—Municipal and Parliamentary elections—Evidence to connect—Treating—Agency—Employment of voters.

It is not illegal to assist persons in getting their names on the electoral register.

But where under colour of so assisting persons, payments are made with the intention of influencing the votes of such persons, it is bribery; and for the purpose of discovering the intention, the important elements for consideration are, first, whether the payments were made contemporaneously with the registration; and, secondly, whether they were remuneration for payments out of pocket so that the voter should not be a loser, or whether it was intended to give him a profit.

An association, admittedly the agents of the respondents, made certain payments to voters for attending the barrister's court. These payments were made contemporaneously with the registration, and amounted to no more than loss out of pocket. No evidence, however, of particular precaution being taken to ascertain the bonâ fide nature of the claims to payments, was given beyond the statement of the members of the association making the payments that they were intended for payment of loss out of pocket to persons who had actually attended the court:

Held, that these payments did not amount to bribery.

Such payments, when the registration occurs close before a Parliamentary election, must be suspicious, and with a very little added, must justify the conclusion that they were intended to influence the election.

At the time when the revising barrister was sitting many persons who attended his court were treated to meat and drink by the association, but there was no evidence that the treating continued beyond the day of registration:

Held, that although foolish and unwise, the treating was not corrupt; but that had the object been to procure popularity or votes at the Parliamentary election, it would have been corrupt.

The municipal contest occurred a fortnight before the Parliamentary. At the former the customary amount of treating at public-houses went on, in a great measure under the superintendence of the agents of the association, who were also active partizans of the respondent at the Parliamentary election:

Held, that although this treating might have influenced the Parliamentary election, yet, inasmuch as it was not in excess of treating at other municipal elections, and there was no evidence to show a corrupt intention, it did not affect the Parliamentary election.

Lavish personal expenditure in a neighbourhood for the purpose of gaining influence is not illegal. To render it corrupt it must be made with a view of influencing particular votes.

Where a small isolated act of treating is proved to have been done, more evidence of agency is necessary to fix the member than where the treating is more extensive.

It is not necessarily bribery to give a job to a voter of opposite politics just before an election. Where this was done, and the intention to influence the vote was denied, the act was held to be innocent.

These were two petitions against the return of Mr. North and Mr. Brassey, the Liberal members, but they were heard together, and all the evidence bore upon both.

Giffard, Q. C. appeared for the petitioners.

Ballantine, Serjt., Powell, Q. C. and Holland, for the respondents.

It was admitted by the respondent's agent for election expenses that at the municipal election, early in November, refreshment was provided gratuitously at the Jolly Fisherman, the Dolphin, the George, and the Fortune of War public-houses. The orders for the supply of refreshments were given by the candidates and other persons conducting the election. The municipal election was on the 2nd Nov.; the Parliamentary election was on the 17th of the same month. For twenty years past it had been the practice of candidates at the municipal election to treat people.

Evidence was also given of the payment of barrister's court money by the Liberal Registration Association, and it was not shown that any particular precautions were taken that none but those bonâ fide entitled were paid.

Ballantine, Serjt. contended that there was nothing illegal in the payment of the barrister's court money; and that the treating at the municipal election was not intended to influence, and could not void, the Parliamentary election.

Giffard, Q. C. in reply.

BLACKBURN, J.—Each of the members against whom these petitions are presented has been returned by a majority of the electors, and in this particular case a large majority having voted for him. But, nevertheless, if that return was shown to have been obtained by corrupt practices of any kind, either by the members themselves or by their agents, that return would be void, and there would require to be a fresh election. [His Lordship acquitted the respondents of personal corruption, and disposed of the alleged bribery on the part of Mrs. Brassey, and proceeded:] One thing further was glanced at, which Mr. Giffard did not rely upon in his reply, namely, that it was shown that Mrs. and Mr. Brassey had bills with the tradesmen, and spent a very considerable sum of money in the town; and it was said, as part of the petitioners' case, that that expenditure had been increased, and was the more lavish, because the election was coming on; in short, that there was lavish household expenditure, with a view of influencing the election, with the same intention and in the same way as would, if it had been an expenditure of meat and drink to influence the election, have come within the definition of treating. But there is no law yet which says that any lavish expenditure in a neighbourhood, with a view of gaining influence in the neighbourhood and influencing an election, is illegal at all. In order to constitute anything which would be a corrupt practice in respect of expenditure of that sort, it must be made with a view of influencing a particular vote. If such an expenditure is made at a place with a tacit understanding of this kind, "I will incur bills, and spend my money with you if you will vote for me, that being not the side on which you intended to vote," if it is intended to produce that effect upon the vote, it amounts to bribery. In the present case there is nothing to show that in either of the cases there was such an understanding, or such an arrangement made. In fact, the first tradesman who was called, whose bill was one of the largest, refused to vote at all, on what was very probably a very judicious opinion of his that he had better keep friends with both sides. The expenditure there, certainly had no influence upon him. I think in none of the other cases was there any attempt made to show that there was such an arrangement, or such a holding forth, that the custom was given for the purpose of procuring the vote of the man as would make it a case of bribery. Whether or not the expenditure was more lavish than it would otherwise have been is no matter for me to inquire into, because that would not affect the election if it was made out. I now must pass from these, which I have mentioned first, and which really do not in any way, as the evidence has turned out, occasion any difficulty in deciding the case, and come to what are much more difficult questions to determine, to which Mr. Giffard has almost entirely confined his very able reply. Mr. Giffard himself has gone, and therefore I may speak more freely in saying that he urged upon me the points which had previously occurred to my own mind, and occasioned me most doubt. I must say that he produced some effect upon my mind by what he was saying, and made me hesitate a little with regard to the views which I took upon some of the points as to whether he had not shown that there was more force in the view that he took on his side than I had otherwise thought. But still I must state the conclusion I have come to, and the best opinion I can form upon what I find the facts to be. I think, as far as regards the law, every one would agree with all that Mr. Giffard stated as being the law. The inference of fact is that which occasions the difficulty. Now, first of all, I must take the cases of treating. What are the cases of treating? I will consider, first, the cases of treating and the registration taken together. There is no doubt, as the law now stands, the Corrupt Practices Act has made it perfectly clear that wherever any money or valuable consideration is given to influence a vote, that is bribery; and that if it be done by the candidate, or the candidate's agent, it would, when shown, avoid the election. It appears here (I do not think the facts are now in dispute at all in this matter) that there was a registration association or committee who had subscriptions given to them for attending to the registration. There is no doubt whatever that the intention was to get upon the register such persons as should vote for their party. The very object of what the registration association was to do, was to get upon the register people who would vote for the Liberals afterwards; and, no doubt, what they did was with the motive of increasing the strength of the Liberal party, and of course with the expectation that those Liberal voters whom they got upon the register would vote at the forthcoming election upon the Liberal side. That was, no doubt their view. Immediately after this the candidate came into the field, and the first resolution was that the Liberal Registration Association committee should be their committee. It would not have mattered even without that when it appeared that the same individuals who formed the registration committee were acting as their agents. Even without that resolution it would follow that they were their agents, and inasmuch as the Parliamentary law has long established that where an agent is guilty of corruption it is not necessary to show that it was with the knowledge and consent of the candidate, nor to show that the money was produced by the candidate, but that corruption by an agent, though done with his own money, or with anybody else's money, would avoid the election, it follows at once, as it seems to me, and I wish to state that clearly, that their calling themselves the registration committee, and applying the money that was subscribed by people for the registration to a corrupt act, would not prevent that corrupt act unseating the member, if it were proved. The question, therefore, I take it, as regards what the registration committee did, is this: is what they did a corrupt practice within the Act? If so, it would unseat the members, for they were agents for the members. Now, there is not much dispute as to the fact of what was done at the time of the registration by the registration committee. The persons who attended at the revising barrister's court, not necessarily as witnesses, but either to support their votes or to support their claims, would probably lose their day's work by attending at the court. Those who had work very close to where the revising barrister held his court might perhaps be able to attend there without leaving their work, but a great number of persons who made claims would lose a day's work by attending at the court, and if they had to attend more than one day they would lose more than one day's work. What the registration committee say they did was this; part of the expense of the registration committee was caused by their paying those who so lost their work upon an estimate of what they would otherwise have made; so that they should be no losers by coming to put themselves upon the register. They assert that they did only that, and that they did not give anything which would enable a man to make a gain. Now, I wish to point out distinctly how in my mind that question comes to be a question of fact. I take it that the law has never yet said that to pay a person any money, or to assist him in any way in being put on the register, should be an offence at all. To give any money or any valuable consideration for the purpose of inducing a person to vote is a corrupt practice, and is made an offence; consequently, wherever it appears that under colour of paying people to get put upon the register, or assisting them to get put upon the register, a payment is made which is fully intended to influence a vote at the ensuing election, that would be a corrupt practice, and the question in each case for those who have to determine the question must be, whether or not those payments that were made, were made with the intention to influence the vote at the election or not, because, if they were they were bribes. It is clear that, as the law is framed, and as the statute is worded, to pay a person for coming to vote, giving him his day's wages, or making up to him his loss of time, for the purpose of voting at the time of the election, would be a bribe. The words of the Act are clear, beyond all question, upon that point. But no such enactment says that paying a man for coming to the registration for the purpose of supporting his claim to vote is to be in itself considered as a bribe. Consequently one must see whether it is in effect a payment for the sake of the vote. That must be always, more or less, a question of evidence, upon which the person who has to decide it must draw his inference, and what, it seemed to me, are the important elements for consideration in drawing the inference, are, first, whether the payments were really and truly made contemporaneously with the registration; that is one great thing. Another great thing is, whether they were really intended to be merely a remuneration for what the man who was paid was out of pocket, so that he should be no loser; or, whether the intention was to give him a profit. I had occasion, in the election inquiry at Taunton, to consider a matter of this kind, the evidence being that some time after the registration, when the election was coming very near, a general notice was given that everybody who had been at the registration court might have a payment of 5*s.* for the day's loss of time, and that was carried out by giving 5*s.* to all who came to ask for it without any further inquiry than whether he was upon that side. I came to the conclusion that that payment was intended to influence the election, and was therefore bribery, and accordingly unseated the member. But where the case turns out to be, as it is at present, upon the evidence that the money was paid contemporaneously with the registration; that no more was paid than the voters were out of pocket; and that precautions were taken to see that no more than that was paid, I do not think that that inference would be proper to be drawn. Now, in the present case, Mr. Giffard urged in his reply that it was not proved that precautions were taken to see that the payment was confined to what the voters were out of pocket. No doubt it was not proved in this sense; there was not a minute inquiry upon it, and there was no attempt made to show in each individual case where men were paid that they were persons who had attended the registration court. But each of the persons connected with the registration who were called who knew anything about it, Mr. Langridge and Mr. Poole; and I think there was another called whose name I forget; all swore positively, in general terms, that they did intend it to be confined to them, and that the desire of the people who supplied the money was that it should be confined to them, and they believed that it was confined to them. Certainly no evidence has been given to show the contrary. The consequence is that, as far as regards these payments for attending at the registration court, I cannot see that I am to draw the conclusion that they were bribes, and consequently I cannot see that this would upset the election. I wish to guard myself in case of other times from being misunderstood in any way to say that payments made in that way for a registration, especially when the registration is coming so closely before the election, are not in themselves very suspicious things, and that such payments, with very little added, a very little more than there is now, might not justify the conclusion that they were intended to influence the election. All I say is, that in the present case I do not think they were so intended; consequently, as regards those payments, I do not think the petitioners have made out a case of bribery. The next thing we have to consider is, that at the same time that these payments were made there were refreshments given. Meat and drink were given at Gallop's house. We have distinct evidence that at the same time that the men were paid refreshments were given to the voters. I think that the probability is, that there might be similar things in other places, though we have not distinct evidence of it. Now comes the question, Is that treating? The definition of treating given by the Corrupt Practices Act is this, that where a candidate (and where a candidate acts by agents, his agents are the same thing for this purpose as the candidate himself) gives meat or drink with the intention to influence the election or to influence a vote at the election, that is to be considered as corrupt treating. Here meat and drink undoubtedly were given at the time of the registration. As I have already said, I consider the registration committee who were the same individuals as formed the committee of the sitting members, as being the sitting members' committee. The question comes to be, was that meat and drink given with the intention to influence the election. There, again, in considering the question whether there was the intention which makes treating corrupt treating, which makes the giving of meat, drink, and refreshments gratis corrupt, if it be done with that intent, which would make it a corrupt practice, it always comes to be a matter of very great importance, though not conclusive, to see the time when it was done, the extent to which it was done, and the manner in which it was done. I think, as far as the evidence goes here, the giving of those refreshments, which were shown to have been paid for by the registration committee, is distinguished from any other case, as far as I can perceive, in that it was confined to the time when the revising barrister was actually sitting. In Gallop' case, where we had the most distinct evidence about it, it appears that they were entirely given at that time. I think it amounts to this; that on each occasion when the men who were to be paid (they were paid in two batches at Gallop's house, Langridge paying for some) came to be paid, there was some refreshment and beer given also at the same time, Mr. Langridge paying for his portion at the time, but Mr. Poole afterwards dividing Gallop's bill, as to which several remarks were made, and to which I will allude presently. It appears that those refreshments were given exclusively at that time. Taking that view of the matter, although I think it was a very foolish and unwise thing to do, it seems to me to come nearly in the same category as the payment of the men for coming to support their claims. If there was any reason to believe that it was done not merely for that purpose, but to procure popularity, or to influence a vote at the election, it would be treating. But if it was merely meant and intended to be part of their coming to support their claims, and not at all to influence the election itself, it would not be corrupt treating. I think being of no very great extent, for extent and quantity are very material elements in the consideration, and being confined, as far as I can perceive in the evidence, to the time of the registration, I should draw the inference that it was not intended to influence the votes. Now we come to one more head upon which the facts are scarcely in dispute at all. During the time when the contest was raging, it happened this year that the municipal elections fell but a very little while before the Parliamentary elections came on, and as might naturally be expected, there being a contest for the Parliamentary representation of the borough, those who stood in the municipal elections on the Liberal side, were active partisans of Mr. North and Mr. Brassey, and at least one of them, Mr. Poole, and probably others also, were agents for the sitting members in conducting the election. It is not disputed or denied at all, in point of fact, that when they stood as candidates for the municipal election, they had given refreshments to the municipal electors, who would be the same class, and indeed the same individuals, as the Parliamentary electors; but they say they did it with the intention of influencing the municipal election, and that only. Now, on the same reasoning as I used before with regard to the registration, if the object and intention in their minds, when they gave those refreshments was to influence the Parliamentary election also, that would be treating, although it might be done with the object at the same time of influencing the municipal election.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

Here again it comes to be a question of fact. In trying to draw a conclusion as to what the intention was, it becomes very important to see what was the quantity, and the scale upon which this was done, and what was the time when it was done, in order to see whether it really was intended for more than the wrong and improper practice which generally prevails at municipal elections; and whether or not it was intended to go further, and influence the Parliamentary election, which was just about to come on. There are cases undoubtedly. Beverley was mentioned as one, and I believe the facts proved it, in which large payments are made to voters at the municipal elections that they may become members of the Yellow or the Blue party, as it may be called, the intention being that the Yellow or the Blue party shall stick together at the Parliamentary election; they will be paid nothing there; but they are generally paid largely at the municipal elections, that they may be in the party and vote at the Parliamentary election. In such cases the real motive and intention of the persons who supply the money is to win the Parliamentary election. Wherever that is proved, of course there can be no doubt that it would be bribery, and perhaps it could scarcely ever be carried out in such a case without its being bribery, to such an extent as to make it a very proper question for Parliament to inquire whether the borough should be disfranchised or not. But without coming to that, it may very well happen that the municipal electors, being of the same class as the Parliamentary electors, advantage is taken of the opportunity of the municipal election, and under the colour of that, under the pretence of treating for the municipal election, there is money advanced for refreshments, in order to produce an effect upon the minds of the parties when they come to vote at the Parliamentary election. Now, in looking at that, and seeing whether or not there is that intention, it becomes a most important element to see when it was done. In the present case, the municipal elections having come so very nearly at the same time as the Parliamentary elections, of course anything that was done at the municipal elections must have been near enough to the Parliamentary elections to produce an effect upon it. But there is a great importance in the time and place at which it was done, as evidence tending to make one think that it was done with the intention to influence the Parliamentary election. I had a similar thing in a case which was before me, where an active agent having been elected an alderman at a contested municipal election, afterwards gave refreshments in gratitude, as he said, to his supporters, but unluckily chose, as the place to give them, a public-house where the candidates had held a meeting, and chose as the time to give them just the time when the candidates came out. It was not necessary to decide that point there, because there were other things which upset the election, and vacated the seat, and I had not to make up my mind upon this question; but I mention the case as an instance of what I mean when I say that the time and place are very important. The time and place there made me very much think that I should be obliged to come to the conclusion, if it should be really necessary to decide it, that there was an intention in that case to produce an effect upon the Parliamentary election. Here I have to see what were the time, the place, and the extent to which the treating, which has been proved at the municipal election, took place, in order to see whether it would really be intended to affect the Parliamentary election or not. As far as I make out, I think the principal evidence obtained of that was from Mr. Poole, who did not seem to me upon that point at all to wish to keep back anything. When he was asked about it he mentioned several things which had not been proved, and named several public-houses at which during the municipal election refreshments had been given (punch, I think he said), as it was customary to do upon the occasion of their being elected. Now all this took place exactly on the day of the municipal election. As far as the evidence went, none seems to have been given afterwards; and although there is no doubt of this refreshment being given to some persons who would ultimately be Parliamentary electors, and it would be likely enough that the popularity acquired might continue for a fortnight, so that a portion of it would influence the Parliamentary election afterwards, yet, looking to the question, nor whether or no it may have produced that effect, but whether or no it was the intention to do so, it seems to me that there was no intention at the time which would make it corrupt; but I cannot come to that conclusion in the present case. If I found that it was continued after the municipal elections were over, if I found that the quantity of refreshment given was in excess of what it seems to have been at other times, or if I found that the place where it was done was such as to show that it was intended to produce an influence upon the election of members of Parliament, all those things would be material to show me the intention. But in this present case I cannot find that there was anything done beyond what had been done in ordinary municipal elections, when no Parliamentary election was coming. It was done on the day of the municipal election, and only on that day; and therefore although it was certainly a matter to be inquired into and considered, I do not think that a corrupt intention has been made out. Then comes a matter in connection with this, on which Mr. Giffard made a very strong point in his reply; and I may fairly say that Mr. Giffard did make me feel that there was a great deal to be said there; he did make me pause and hesitate on this part of the case.

It was sworn by a man called Foster that when one Thomas Tutt was bringing him to the poll, Foster asked for allowances for drink, and Tutt made answer to him, "I could not do that; it would be bribery." But, at the same time, said to him, "You may drink, and afterwards, when it is all over, you shall be paid." This was not denied.

His Lordship said as to this: Then comes the question whether, that being so, upon that alone there is not made out a case of treating by Tutt, who was an agent of the sitting members, to such an extent, that although it was only 10*s.* that was paid, and although it was only in one instance, that is or is not a corrupt practice which ought to upset the election. There I have felt a great deal of force in what Mr. Giffard said, and I have paused and hesitated upon it a good deal. It is established by Parliamentary law that a member is responsible for his agents in these cases; and, although what constitutes an agent is very ill defined, yet still it is a question which it is important to consider, and one must see what an agent is. I have frequently had it in my mind that there is a great difficulty, in strict logic, in making the agency of a person dependant upon the extent of the corrupt practices committed by him. It does seem that, in strict logic, if a man would be an agent if he was shown to have corrupted 100 people by paying them 5*l.* apiece, then if he corrupts only a single man by giving him a single glass of beer, he ought to be regarded as an agent equally. There is no doubt that in strict logical language you will find a difficulty in making the distinction, yet I cannot but feel that in administering justice and in administering the law in such a way that it would be tolerable, one must make some distinction of that sort. There is the same thing that constitutes the man an agent in the one case present also in the other case; but I cannot but feel that where the case is a small, isolated, solitary case, it requires much more evidence to satisfy one of agency than would otherwise be necessary. If a small thing is done by a person who is the head agent; for instance, in this case, if a very trifling thing had been done by Mr. Poole, who is the agent for the election expenses, I think that would have upset the election; and if small things to a considerable extent were done by a subordinate person, comparatively slight evidence of agency would probably have induced one to find that he was an agent; but when you come to a case of this sort, where there is the single case of Thomas Tutt having told a man, when he was inducing him to go to the poll, that he would be paid afterwards for what he might spend in drink, to make that single case upset the election would require considerable evidence of agency; and I do not find that there would be strong enough evidence of agency here to make one act upon that one single case. Mr. Giffard argued, with great force, that if treating were proved in this particular case, it is a fair and reasonable inference that that would account for a great many others of a similar kind, and that, consequently, I ought to act upon it. I accede to that; and if I felt at all that there was any ground for believing, upon the whole of the evidence taken together, that there was a mode of procuring treating at the Pelham Arms and elsewhere by sending in a variety of people, each of whom was to treat upon a small scale, I should probably say that I thought that was an instance of it, and that this would be evidence to prove it; but if such a thing existed, I cannot but feel that there would be some more evidence of it. What Mr. Giffard said is very true, that there is this great difficulty in these cases, that the parties who are guilty of being bribed and those who are guilty of bribing, are together, and therefore there is great difficulty in getting evidence in cases of bribery; but that does not apply so much to cases of treating. Treating from its very nature must be done openly, and in such a way that a great number of people may see it. It is almost impossible to have treating so carried on that the opposite side may not see it, and there are generally a considerable number of neutral persons who attend where treating is going on from the mere love of drink and beer, without regard very much to what politics they are of, and who are willing to tell about it afterwards. Consequently if there had been any regular system, of which this case with regard to what Tutt said was a single instance that cropped out, I cannot but think that we should have had more evidence of it. Taking that view of it, I think I cannot act upon the evidence of the agency of Tutt, though it is evidence of agency which might have induced me to act if there had been anything tending to show a general system, rather than, as it is, an individual case.

Digitized by Google

On a question whether the giving a job to a voter was bribery, where the intention was denied by the persons giving it, his Lordship said: I have always considered it a very wrong thing on the part of anyone, on the ground of politics, to dismiss his men whom he had already in his employment because they were going to vote against him; that is made undue influence. It would also be very wrong to employ men in order to influence them to vote for you; and to lay down the rule that whenever a person really having a job in hand offers it to a man who is going to vote on the other side, although he says it was not intended to influence the man's vote, we are to draw the inference that it was, would be laying down the rule that during an election there must be exclusive dealing. I do not see how one possibly can act upon such a principle as that. I come to the conclusion that the case brought forward on the part of the petitioners has failed as against both the sitting members. As in this case the petitioners have failed, and I see no reason to deviate from the ordinary rule, I must order that the costs be borne by the petitioners.

Agents: Durrant Cooper; Wyatt and Hoskins; Baxter, Rose, and Norton.

House of Lords.

Reported by DOUGLAS KINGSFORD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

July 3, 6, 1868; July 13, 1869.

THE HAMMERSMITH AND CITY RAILWAY COMPANY (plaintiffs in error) v. GEORGE HORATIO BRAND AND MARY CHRISTIANA LOUISA, his wife (defendants in error).

Damage from use of Railway—Vibration—Action—Compensation—Railway Clauses Act (8 & 9 Vict. c 20), ss. 6, 16—"Construction" and "use" of Railway—Headings to groups of sections in statutes—Lands Clauses Act (8 & 9 Vict. c. 18), s. 68.

An action was brought against a railway company to recover an amount assessed by a jury, as compensation "for vibration from the use of the railway after construction." The damage did not arise from negligence, but was the inevitable consequence of the proper and ordinary use of the railway:

Held (reversing the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber), that, first, no action would lie for the damage sustained; for the Legislature having given power to the company to employ locomotive engines, if such locomotives cannot possibly be used without occasioning vibration and consequent injury to neighbouring houses, upon the principle of law that "cuicunque aliquis quid concedit, concedere videtur et id sine quo res ipsa esse non potuit," it must be taken that power is given to cause that vibration without liability to an action. The cases of Rex. v. Pease (4 B. & Ad. 30), and Vaughan v. Taff Vale Railway Company (5 H. & N. 679), approved. Secondly (Lord Cairns dissentients), that there was no title to compensation for the damage sustained; for the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 20), by ss. 6 and 16, provides compensation only for damage caused by the "construction" and not by the "use" of the railway.

The headings to the groups of sections in the above Act indicate the general object of the provisions immediately following, and may be usefully referred to to determine the sense of any doubtful expression in a section ranged under a particular heading.

The Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845 (8 & 9 Vict.) c. 68, has no direct bearing on the above question.

This was a suggestion of error upon a judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber, by which that court reversed the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench in favour of the plaintiffs in error. The action was brought by the defendants in error against the plaintiffs in error, to recover the sum of 272*l.* which had been assessed by a jury under the provisions of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 18), as compensation to the defendant in error, Mary Christiana Louisa, before her marriage with the other defendant in error, for injury occasioned to a house and land, to which she was entitled, by vibration from the use of the railway of the plaintiffs in error, together with interest on the said sum. The claim in respect of which this sum of 272*l.* was assessed, was one of three heads of claim made in respect of the injury mentioned. The plaintiffs in error admitted the other two heads of claim, and paid the amounts awarded in respect of them, but they contended that the damage in respect of which the said sum of 272*l.* was assessed could not be the subject of compensation, and that no claim was maintainable against them in respect thereof.

Digitized by Google

By consent of the parties the question was stated for the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench in the form of a special case, which is sufficiently stated at 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 101.

The Court of Queen's Bench on Nov. 27, 1865 (Mellor and Lush, JJ.), gave judgment for the plaintiffs in error. (see 13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 501; 35 L. J. 53, Q. B.; L. Rep. 1 Q. B. 130.) The defendants in error then brought error in the Court of Exchequer Chamber, which, on Feb. 1, 1867, gave judgment by a majority of three to one (Bramwell, B., Keating, and Smith, JJ.; Channell, B. dissentiente), reversing the judgment of the Queen's Bench (see 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 101; 36 L. J. 139, Q. B.; L. Rep. 2 Q.B. 230). Against this judgment error was then brought in the House of Lords, and the case was there argued on July 3 and 6, 1868, in the presence of the following judges:—Willes, Blackburn, Keating, and Lush, JJ., Bramwell, and Pigott, BB.

Sir J. B. Karslake, Q. C. (Attorney-General), Russell, Q. C., and Digby, for the plaintiffs in error.—The plaintiffs in this action are not entitled to recover the damages claimed, either by action or as compensation under the statute. No action will lie, for the vibration complained of was the necessary and inevitable consequence of the use of the railway. No negligence or improper conduct has been imputed to the plaintiffs in any way. The Legislature authorised the use of the railway, and, though damage to private individuals occur from the ordinary running of the trains without negligence on the part of the company, no action can on that account be brought:

Vaughan v. Taff Vale Railway Company, 5 H. & N. 679;
Rex v. Pease, 4 B. & Ad. 30.

Nor can compensation be had, for the provisions of the Lands and Railways Clauses Acts, as to compensation, refer exclusively to cases where land has been taken by the company, or has been injuriously affected by the execution of works, or by the exercise of other powers for the construction of the railway. This is shown by the heading preceding sect. 6 of the latter Act, which must govern and limit the application of the sections that follow:

Bryan v. Child, 5 Ex. 368;
Eastern Counties Railway Company v. Marriage, 9 H. of L. Cas. 32.

Here no land of the plaintiffs was taken, compensation for damage from the construction of the railway has already been paid, and the present claim is on account of damage, not from the construction, but from the use of the railway: (The Caledonian Railway Company v. Ogilvie, 2 Macq. 229.) At any rate the defendants are not liable to compensation in the present case, where no structural injury has occurred or is alleged. The damage is, indeed, not to the land or property at all, but is in the nature of a mere personal inconvenience or discomfort to the occupier of the house and premises. For such damage no compensation can be had:

Mumford v. The Oxford, &c., Railway Company, 1 H. & N. 34.

Other cases cited were:

Broadbent v. Imperial Gas Company, 7 H. of L. Cas. 600;
Leigh v. Stockport, &c., Railway Company, 10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 426; 33 L. J. 251, Q. B.;
Jones v. Festiniog Railway Company, 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 902; 37 L. J. 198, Q. B.; L. Rep. 3 Q. B. 567.

Sir Roundell Palmer, Q. C., Mellish, Q. C., and Dixon for the defendants in error.—The damage complained of would have constituted a nuisance, for which an action could have been brought had not the Legislature authorised the use of the railway from which the damage resulted:

Soltau v. De Held, 2 Sim. N. S. 133;
Walter v. Selfe, 15 Jur. 419;
Bainford v. Furnley, 6 L. T. Rep. N. S. 721; 3 B. & S. 62;
Elliotson v. Teetham, 2 Bing. N. C. 183.

The damage may be said to be caused by the construction of the railway, for it was the reasonable and probable consequence of the construction:

Rev. v. Moore, 3 B. & Ad. 184, 188;
Crowder v. Tinkler, 19 Ves. 622.

The land here was specially and injuriously affected (Glover v. North Staffordshire Railway Company, 16 Q. B. 913) by the construction of the railway, and compensation is therefore due. The fact that none of the plaintiffs' land was taken does not bar them from claiming compensation. As observed by Lord St. Leonards in the Caledonian Railway Company v. Ogilvy, 2 Macq. 247, "It is quite settled that there may be a damage and compensation may be required from a party from whom no land is taken." If an action would have lain for nuisance as regards the land, but for the powers conferred on the company by the Act of Parliament, there is a right to compensation:

Re Penny, 7 Ell. & Bl. 668;
Ricket v. The Directors, &c., of the Metropolitan Railway Company, L. Rep. 2 App. 175, 198, 203; 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 542, 545, 547.

An actual damage has been actually suffered here, and it is just that compensation should be paid to the party sustaining it. The intention of the statutes was to give compensation in such a case, and "every fair intendment ought to be given to effectuate that intention": (per Lord Denman, in Reg. v. The Eastern Counties Railway Company, 2 Q. B. 359, 362.) An injury, which is the subject of compensation, when temporary, under sect. 16, must be also, when permanent, under sect. 6: (Ricket v. Directors, &c., of Metropolitan Railway Company, ubi sup, per Lord Cranworth.) The fact that the damage here is recurring and continuing is no argument against its being had:

Broadbent v. The Imperial Gas Company, 7 De G. M. & G., 448;
Lee v. Milner, 2 M. & W. 840;
Lawrence v. The Great Northern Railway Company, 16 Q. B. 643, 653.

There is no conclusive authority against a right to claim compensation for injury by vibration. Re Penny (ubi sup.) was decided chiefly on another point, though Lord Campbell and the other judges thought that vibration would be a subject for compensation, the qualification that "the damage arising from vibration after the construction and during the use of the railway is not a ground for compensation:" (7 Ell. & Bl. 672), being doubtingly added by his Lordship after his judgment had been given. The following cases and statutory provisions were also referred to:

Mumford v. Oxford, &c., Railway Company, 1 H. & N. 34;
Chamberlain v. The West-End and Crystal Palace Railway Company, 2 B. & S. 605; 6 L. T. Rep. N. S. 318;
The North Western Railway Company v. Bradley, 3 M. & G. 836;
The East and West India Docks, &c., Railway Company v. Gattke, Ib. 1555, 164;
Gardiner v. London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Company, L. Rep. 2 Ch. App. 201; 15 L. T. Rep. N. S. 552;
The Lands Clauses Act 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 18), ss. 22, 48, 49, 68, 69, 73.

After the arguments of counsel the following

Digitized by Google

question was referred to the judges:—Were the defendants in error entitled to have compensation made to them by the plaintiffs in error for the vibration in respect of which damages were assessed by the jury as mentioned in the special case?

There was a difference of opinion among the judges, who therefore gave their opinions seriatim, as follows:—

WILLES, J.—My Lords, I am of opinion that the defendants in error were entitled to have compensation made to them by the plaintiffs in error for the vibration in respect of which damages were assessed by the jury as mentioned in the special case. The admitted relevant facts are as follows:—The claimant, Mary, was seised in fee simple in possession of a house, called Cumberland House, and its outbuildings; the railway was made so near the house that although no part of the site was taken, and although it did not appear that any structural injury was or would be caused to Cumberland House or any of its outbuildings by the construction of the railway, "yet it appeared, and is admitted for the purposes of this case, that by reason of the working of the railway after it had been opened for traffic, the house and buildings were and would be subjected to vibration, noise, and smoke from passing trains, and were and always would be affected, and depreciated and lessened in value thereby." No compensation was assessed in respect of the noise and smoke. Compensation was assessed at 272*l.* "for vibration from the use of the railway after construction as beforementioned," which it must be assumed from the terms of the admission, and in the absence of objection as to the extent of the vibration, would have been actionable but for the statutory powers of the company. The result is, that the 272*l.* represents the price estimated by a jury of a perpetual right acquired by the company to shake the house and its outbuildings by traffic upon the railway, or, as it was well put in argument, the depreciation of the value of the property by a servitude of vibration imposed in respect of the railway constructed by the company. Such a servitude, if granted by an ordinary conveyance without being limited in respect of the use of a specified dominant property, would probably have amounted to a licence only, and not have affected the land in the hands of a purchaser; but as limited to vibration by traffic carried on upon a specified railway, it was properly the subject of grant by way of interest in the servient land: (Rowbotham v. Wilson, 8 H. of L. Cas. 848.) Therefore, as soon as the railway was completed and fit for use, there was, by the conjoint operation of the company's Act and the execution of the company's works thereunder, statutorily taken away from whoever had or should in future have Cumberland House, and transferred to the company as appurtenant to their railway, part of the use and value of the house, and the house was therefore injuriously affected by the construction of the railway or execution of the authorised works within the words or within the substantial intention of the compensation provided by sect. 68. No analogy to the use of a road dedicated by a private individual can assist. A private individual could dedicate a road to a limited use, but a private individual could not of his own power dedicate a highway with tolls, nor a railway with the statutory restrictions and privileges. The cases which furnish the test "no right of action, no compensation," are satisfied, because the right of action, which would have existed but for the statute, is taken away by the statute in respect of the works executed and railway constructed, and to which the law annexes the dominion. As against the company it must be presumed, and indeed it is involved in the admission, that the railway when made was sure to be used, and the probable extent of that use must have been a subject of proof and consideration in committee, and could in like manner be proved before and considered by the jury in assessing the amount. The uncertainty of the amount is what made most difficulty to my mind; but I think that it must be taken that the depreciation was capable of being calculated, without mere guessing, near enough for practical purposes, quite as near as surveyors calculate work to be paid for by measure and value either done or to be done, in fulfilment of a covenant to repair for instance, upon which there are often wide differences of opinion which a jury must reconcile. The case of the Imperial Gas Company, 7 H. of L. Cas. 700, involved peculiar elements of uncertainty defying calculation. In the result I adopt the reasoning of Bramwell, B. (with whom Keating and Smith, JJ. agreed) in the Exchequer Chamber, being satisfied that there must be either compensation or liability to repeated actions, which latter would defeat the general intention of the Legislature as well as contradict a series of authorities too convenient and reasonable to bear overruling. I therefore answer in the affirmative, and in this opinion my brothers Keating and Pigott, as also my brother Lush, concur.

LUSH, J.—My Lords, a careful consideration of the arguments of my learned brethren in the Exchequer Chamber, and of the able arguments addressed to your Lordships on the hearing of this appeal, has induced me to change the opinion which I expressed in the Court of Queen's Bench, and to come to the conclusion that the defendants in error were entitled to have compensation made to them by the plaintiffs in error for the vibration in respect of which damages were assessed by the jury, as mentioned in the special case. The complaint of the defendants in error was, that "by reason of the working of the railway after it had been opened for traffic, their house and buildings were and would be subjected to vibration from passing trains, and were, and always would be, affected and depreciated and lessened in value thereby." And I take the jury to have found by their verdict that the premises had, as a consequence of this working of the railway, become less comfortable for occupation, and their value substantially diminished. It is clear that if, without the sanction of Parliament, a private individual had caused this damage, by making the railway upon his own land, and running the trains upon it, he would have been liable to an action from time to time so long as the nuisance continued, at the suit of the party injured. This proposition was not disputed on the argument, but it was contended on behalf of the plaintiffs in error, that this being a public highway, the company are in the same position as if they had made the railway on their own land and dedicated it to the public, and in that case they would not have been liable for the nuisance caused by the public in using it. The answer to this is, that this is not a highway by dedication; if it were it would not be, as it is, the property of the company, nor could they receive the tolls or any other profit from the public for the use of it, as they now do. The case assumes that this damage results, not from any improper or extraordinary use that is made of the railway, or any negligence or misconduct in the management of the traffic, but from the ordinary use of the line as a passenger line, that being the purpose for which it was authorised to be made. It is therefore, to my mind, equally clear that the defendants in error cannot maintain an action for the damage they have sustained, because the plaintiffs in error have only done what their Act of Parliament authorised them to do. But that authority was given to them subject to certain conditions, and the question is, whether it is one of those conditions that they should pay to persons situated like the defendants in error compensation in gross for the damage to their property, which is the direct and necessary consequence of such use of the railway. This depends upon the construction to be put upon sects. 18, 22, 49, and 68, of the Lands Clauses Act, and of sects. 6 and 16 of the Railway Clauses Act. These sections were so fully commented on in the course of the argument, that I do not think it necessary to recite them. It is in your Lordships' recollection that their phraseology differs. In some of them the damage for which compensation is to be made is spoken of as damage sustained by reason of "the execution of the works," in another, "by reason of the execution of the undertaking," in others, "by the exercise of the powers of the Act;" and sect. 6 of the Railway Clauses Act contains both the latter expression and the phrase "by the construction of the railway." I cannot assent to the argument that the Legislature, in adopting in that section of the Railway Clauses Act the expression, "by the exercise of the powers of the Act," had any reference to sect. 86, which empowers the company to carry on the business of carriers upon their line, and for that purpose to use locomotives. The same phrase occurs in sect. 49 of the Lands Clauses Act, and is there evidently used as synonymous with "the execution of the works" in sect. 69 and other sections, and I cannot doubt that if a special Act were to incorporate all the provisions of the Railways Clauses Act, except those which enable the company to become carriers, the liability of the company in a case like the present would be the same. I think that the variances were undesigned, and that the same idea is meant to be conveyed by each form of expression. The question, then, is narrowed to this: Did the Legislature intend to compensate for damage occasioned by the "making and using" the railway, or the damage occasioned by the "making" only, apart from its use? As the intention to give the larger measure cannot be collected from the words themselves, we are in the first place to look to the contract, and see if we can collect from the general scope and object of the Act as expressed in its other provisions, what the intention of the Legislature upon this point was, and if we see that it was their intention to give the larger measure, then to determine whether the words in question are sufficient to give effect to that intention. The Lands Clauses Act is designed not for railways only, but for all undertakings for which compulsory powers of taking lands are given. And every special Act, which incorporates its provisions, designates and fixes the purposes for which the land is to be taken, and the use to which it is to be permanently appropriated; and the company who are empowered to take it are bound to apply it to that purpose, and to that purpose only. So much of the general Act as is incorporated becomes part of the special Act, and its language as part of that Act becomes pointed to the particular work or undertaking specified, whatever it may be, whether a railway, a dock, a canal, or any other undertaking. It there authorises the taking of the land for the purpose of, and its conversion into, the particular railway, dock, or canal in order that it may be used as such. The undertaking is regarded as a working concern, and the idea of its use as a railway, dock, or canal is in the mind of the Legislature inseparable from that of its construction. In professing to give compensation for all damage sustained by the owner of the adjacent land by the "execution of the works," or "the exercise of the powers of the Act as regards such lands," (s. 6 of Railway Clauses Act) the Legislature must, as it appears to me, have had in view the ultimate object arrived at; the works were complete and in operation, the dock, railway, or canal, not abstractedly as a mere excavation, embankment or reservoir, but in connection with its appropriate traffic, and with the ordinary incidents of a business undertaking. These considerations lead me to the opinion that the view I took of the Act in the court below is too narrow a view, and that it is apparent from the context that the Legislature intended to compensate for the use as well as for the making of the railway, and thus to make the new remedy which it gave co-extensive with that which it took away. Taking this to have been the intention of the Legislature in framing the compensation clauses, we are to see whether the words in question are capable, upon a fair and reasonable interpretation, of giving effect to such intention. It cannot be said, I think, that they are so clear as to exclude this meaning, but only that they are ambiguous. Taken in their literal and primary sense they would, no doubt, be read as denoting the mere work of construction; and if they occurred in a contract between the company and a person who thereby undertook to make the line, this would be their undoubted meaning. But as applied to the subject matter of the special Act, which regards the user of the railway as the end and object of all its provisions, and looks at the adjacent land as it will be affected by that user, I think they may, without undue straining, be read as embracing both the construction and the user, as if the expression had been "injuriously affected by the railway," instead of "by the execution of the works," i.e., the making of the railway. It seems to me that no violence is done to the language, nor any forced or unnatural sense put upon the words, by holding the latter expressions to be equivalent to the former. For these reasons I answer your Lordships' question in the affirmative.

Digitized by Google

BRAMWELL B.—My Lords, in this case it must be taken that the jury have found that by the ordinary working of a railway line, by the passing of trains, without negligence or design, by what, in short is practically necessary (as we are told) for the using of the line by the defendants, and those who pay them for its use, a nuisance will be caused to the occupiers of the plaintiffs' premises by vibration to such an amount, that the occupiers, if without remedy, will pay the plaintiffs for the occupation from time to time a less sum than they otherwise would, the fee-simple or capitalised value of which is 272*l*. For this nuisance the occupiers would from time to time be entitled to maintain actions (Jones v. Festiniog Railway Company, L. Rep. 3 Q. B. 733; 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 902), unless some statute has legalised the nuisance with or without compensation, by which I mean the statutory compensation they have claimed. If the nuisance is so legalised, no action is maintainable, whether or no there is a right to such compensation. On the other hand, if it is not legalised, an action is maintainable; and it is agreed on all hands, that if an action is maintainable, the defendants in error are not entitled to have compensation made to them by the plaintiffs in error for the vibration in respect of which damages were assessed by the jury, as mentioned in the special case. But for the cases I shall refer to, I should be of opinion that such nuisance was not legalised, that the occupiers would be entitled from time to time to maintain actions for the nuisance, that consequently the plaintiffs would not be entitled to compensation, and that your Lordships' question would be answered in the negative. It is for those who say that this nuisance is legalised, and the right of action taken away, to show it. For this purpose reliance is placed on the clauses of the Railway Clauses Act, and especially on s. 86, authorising the use of locomotives and carriages, which will cause the vibration in question. It is said that these clauses show that locomotives and carriages may be used, and consequently that no action nor indictment lies for that use; and no doubt this has been so held in Rex v. Pease, 4 B. & Ad. 30, and in Vaughan v. Taff Vale Railway Company, 5 H. & N. 679. My Lords, with great respect, I think those cases clearly wrong, and that they have proceeded on an inadvertent misapprehension of the object and effect of the clauses in question. What that object and effect are I will proceed to point out. The private Act of a railway company, whereby it is constituted, is its deed of settlement, declaring what are the purposes and objects of the company. It always begins by creating a corporation for the purpose of making a certain railway. If it stopped there the company could not act as carriers, nor furnish locomotive power, nor do more than make their railway and receive tolls for its use. Anything else would be ultra vires, as would now be their keeping an hotel or having steamboats without special powers for that purpose. Moreover, the courts of common law have held that the powers of these statutory corporations are limited to the purposes for which they are created, and that an agreement for anything else entered into by them is not merely ultra vires and void, but illegal: (See East Anglian v. The Eastern Counties Railway Company, 11 C. B. 775; Gage v. The Newmarket Railway Company, 18 Q. B. 457, and many other cases.) Your Lordships are aware that, for the same reasons, canal companies could not act as carriers on their own canals till an Act of Parliament enabled them to do so. This would have been the situation of the railways but for the clauses in question. Those clauses have no other object or effect, as I submit, than to obviate the objection I have referred to. Your Lordships will find that they begin with a general heading, "With respect to the carrying of passengers and goods upon the railway, and the tolls to be taken thereon." All that follows that heading is to be construed with reference to it: (Marriage v. The Eastern Counties Railway Company, 9 H. of L. Cas. 32.) There is not a word in this heading as to the legalising or allowing of nuisances. The first of the following clauses, sect. 86, allows the company to be carriers on their own line, and limits the charges they may make. The "company" wanted no law to enable them to use a locomotive, any more than it did to use "other moving power and carriages and waggons," except to avoid the objection of ultra vires. A man may use a locomotive on his soil and freehold, and so may a corporation. They do want—that is to say, unless given, they do not possess—the power to use it so as to be a nuisance to their neighbours. But if this were intended to be given, where are the words? The words are sufficient, if meant to give vires ultra those of a company to make a railway, but insufficient if meant to authorise the doing of damage. Besides, the use of other moving power, and of carriages and waggons is authorised. In what sense? That a nuisance may be committed by their use without remedy? Impossible, for it was never contemplated that they would be a nuisance. Sect. 87 clearly also gives power of contracting with other companies, and has no thought of authorising nuisances. So sects. 88, 89, 90, and 91. Sect. 92 gives other companies and persons a right to use the railway with engines and carriages "properly constructed as by this and the special Act directed." The object of this was to define the rights of the public over the line as against the company, and not to authorise nuisances. All these sections, down to and including sect. 113, have the same object, namely, regulating the use of the railway by the company and others. But it is said that sect. 114 shows that the interests of others were in view of the Legislature, and that they made thereby what they thought was sufficient provision for that object. The argument is, with all submission, bad. They provided for this matter certainly. They said, we will not let it be discussed whether this is a nuisance. Did they, therefore, say nothing shall be, or if it is it shall be, remediless? Certainly not. Further, the statutes, the Land and Railway Clauses Acts, themselves recite that such clauses, as are contained in them, usually appear in Acts of Parliament authorising the taking of land and the construction of railways, and that it is desirable to avoid the necessity of repeating them. They ought to have, therefore, no greater or other effect in the general and public Acts than they had in the particular and private. Now it is not supposable that in a private Act for a particular company an anomaly so great was to be introduced, as that an actionable suit be committed with no common law remedy, and for the benefit of the company, that their profits might be larger, if without compensation. If it is said that compensation is given, then it is most surprising that in such private Act there is no provision for it in express words. And the same remark may be made on those general Acts. Why, if the common law remedy was to be taken away, are there not express words to that effect? Why, if there is to be a remedy by compensation, are there not express words to that effect? Why, if there is to be no action and no compensation, is so gross and anomalous an injustice inflicted, when such pains are taken to give compensation for the slightest injury occasioned by the very fabric of the railway? It seems to me impossible that it can have been intended that this damage can be done without any compensation. One reason only for such a state of things is given. It is said that the railway and the working of it are for the public benefit, and therefore the damage must be done, and be uncompensated. Admitting that the damage must be done for the public benefit, that is no reason why it should be uncompensated. It is to be remembered that that compensation comes from the public which gets the benefit. It comes directly from those who do the damage, but ultimately from the public in the fares they pay. If the fares will not pay for this damage and a fair profit on the company's capital, the speculation is a losing one, as all the gain does not pay all the loss and a fair profit. Either, therefore, the railway ought not to be made, or the damage may well be paid for. But further, though if it were the law and practice to do individuals a damage for the benefit of the public without compensation, no one in particular could complain when it happened to him, as every one would know that he held his property subject to being deprived of it or having it injured, when it suited the public, still such a law and practice would be highly inconvenient and mischievous. It is, however, however, idle to discuss such a question, as the Legislature has acted under no such considerations. For if the public benefit is a good reason for damaging a man's property without compensation, so would it be for taking it without compensation. The Legislature has made the most careful and minute provisions for the payment of compensation for everything taken, and indeed for everything injuriously affected. And it is absurd to suppose that it was intended that if a house was damaged to the extent of 1*l.* a year by its light and air being diminished, compensation should be given, and that it should not be given when the damage was ten times as great, but was caused by the noise and vibration of passing trains. Surely when a reasonable meaning can be given to the clauses relied on, it should be adopted rather than one so unreasonable. It is said that a man might dedicate land as a highway, and no action would lie for the nuisance occasioned by its user. In addition to the other answers given to this, I may add that the ordinary use of a highway is not a nuisance, affecting either the building or its occupants to such an extent and in such a way, as to be actionable. But if anyone continually used the highway with a very heavy vehicle, so as to cause such a vibration as is experienced in this case, I apprehend an action would lie against him. If there is to be a remedy, and it is to be by compensation and not by action, how is the compensation to be calculated? The line may not be used; its traffic may double; branch lines may be made. Further, it is not contended by those who say that the common law remedy is gone, that there is an unlimited right to damage, but only a right to do reasonable mischief, or a reasonable right to do mischief. That is to say, if by going a little slower, or being at a little more expense, or some other inconvenience, mischief can be avoided, it must be. But on what principle is this to be settled? Ten trains a day at twenty miles an hour might be no nuisance. This might accommodate the public, and pay a dividend. But fifty trains a day at thirty miles an hour might be a grievous nuisance, though much better for the public and the company. Where is the line to be drawn? Take the case of the plaintiff in Vaughan v. Taff Vale Railway Company. There the defendants declared that they went as slowly as they could, and with every contrivance for safety. But they might have had one servant, or ten, or 1000 at the spot in question, to prevent the grass catching fire and burning the plaintiff's wood. This would have cost them money, and it was cheaper to burn the wood, or, at all events, on a calculation of chances, better to risk doing so, than to have a sufficient number of servants. But how is compensation to be calculated for such a matter? Moreover, if these plaintiffs are entitled to compensation, so is the owner of every piece of land near the railway. For though there may be no house on it now, it is possible there would have been; but that is now prevented by the railway, at least to the same advantage as before. Therefore such land is injuriously affected, if this is. In the result, then, the right of action is not taken away in terms, the right to compensation is not given in terms; the principle on which compensation should be given would be most difficult to settle. Though given, the companies would still be liable to actions of excess, which it would be difficult to define, leaving scope for continual litigation. It is impossible that all remedy and redress are taken away; and the only clauses supposed to indicate this are shewn to have another and different object and effect. For these reasons I think the right of action not taken away, and the remedy by compensation not given, and that the two cases I have referred to were erroneously decided. I may observe, however, as to Rex v. Pease, that it was not one of private wrong, but of public nuisance. In the latter case if what was done was for the public benefit, the public is at once the gainer and loser, and the one may in some sense be set against the other, and so it might have been that, without an Act of Parliament, the matter complained of there would have been no public nuisance. But the present is not the case of a public but of a private nuisance, when the loser and the gainer are not the same to the same extent. In that case also the point I present to your Lordships was not mooted. It was not noticed that the clause was necessary to avoid the objection of ultra vires. Nor was it used by the counsel for the plaintiffs in error before your Lordships, because, though it would relieve them from the present claim, it would do so at the expense of leaving them subject to actions from time to time. It is said that Rex v. Pease has been so long decided, and so many railways have been made on the supposition that it was law, that it must be set right, if wrong, by legislation only. That it gives rise to great difficulties I think I have shown. I believe it has not been acted on; compensation under the compensation clause has not been given as it ought to have been if Rex v. Pease is law. This is the first time the question comes before your Lordships, and it cannot be said that railway companies have allowed such compensation to be awarded against them without appeal. So, also, juries in actions have found negligence in railway companies as they ought not to have done, if that case is not law; and compensation ought not to be given. As to railway traffic being stopped by injunction, I apprehend injunctions would not be granted in such cases. I have deemed it my duty to bring these cases before your Lordships. If your Lordships hold them to have been rightly decided, or think they are so far settled law, they must be acted on; then it seems to me they show that the judgment below was right, and that your Lordships' question should be answered in the affirmative. Because, for the reasons I have given, I am sure the Legislature did not mean to leave persons whose property will be injured, as in this case, without remedy by action or by claim for compensation; and I think it right to hold that any words that are capable of it, to mean to give a remedy by implication. Of course we must not put a meaning on words which they cannot bear, merely in order to remedy an injustice, however gross. But I think the words "injuriously affected by the construction thereof," and "full damage sustained by reason of the exercise as regards such land, of the powers," &c., may, and, where it is established there is no right of action, must, have the effect of giving compensation for the damage. For according to the case of Vaughan v. The Taff Vale Railway Company, immediately on the construction of the railway, and "by the construction thereof" a right accrued to do this damage. How then can it be said that the lands are not injuriously affected "by the construction thereof," if they thereby became subject to this? They immediately come under a servitude, as Mr. Mellish put it in the court below. Suppose it had been enacted expressly that, on the construction of the railway, there should be a right to use it so as to create a nuisance actionable at common law, would not that have been matter for compensation as much as if it had been enacted that the owner should make a grant of such a servitude? But it makes no difference whether it is expressly or otherwise enacted, if it is enacted, as Vaughan v. The Taff Vale Railway Company, shows it is. As to the argument that the premises are none the worse, but only the occupiers, it is enough to say that the same thing might be said in a claim for compensation for diminished light. It is to be observed that the word is not "in" or "during," but "by" the construction of the railway. Besides, this is a damage sustained by occupiers, by an exercise, as regards these lands, of the powers of the Act. The opinions I have expressed here, I entertained and expressed in the court below. But feeling there that I was bound by the case of Vaughan v. The Taff Vale Railway Company, I thought the then plaintiffs entitled to judgment in their favour. Should your Lordships hold those cases to have been well decided, or too settled to be overruled, then, for the reasons I have given, I think the then plaintiffs entitled to judgment in their favour; otherwise not. I have necessarily repeated what I said there, because I am unable to offer anything better to your Lordships, and because I desired to save your Lordships the trouble of referring to what I then said, had your Lordships been minded so far to honour me.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

BLACKBURN, J.—My Lords, I have come to the conclusion that the plaintiffs below have no right to compensation for the vibration mentioned in the special case. I need not say that finding that I stand alone amongst the judges consulted by your Lordships, I give this opinion with diffidence. My reasons are as follows: I think it is agreed on all hands that if a person, not authorised by Act of Parliament so to do, erected a railway or any other private road on his own land, and then worked it by running locomotives and trains, or any other species of carriages, upon it, so that the vibration and noise were to such an extent as really to be annoying to a neighbour, that injury would be a nuisance, and that neighbour would have a fresh cause of action against the maintainer of the way every time that the way was so worked as to give rise to the nuisance, and he might, I apprehend, obtain an injunction to prevent the continuance of the nuisance. But if, instead of making and maintaining a private way of his own, the owner of the land dedicated it as a public highway, and the public brought traffic on it to such an extent that the noise and vibration seriously affected the neighbours, I apprehend they would be without remedy. The common law would have them suffering a private hardship for the public benefit. This distinction may have some bearing on the construction of the statutes (8 Vict. cc. 18 and 20), on the true meaning of which I think the present case depends. And I think that it is agreed on all hands that if the Legislature authorises the doing of an act (which if unauthorised would be a wrong and a cause of action) no action can be maintained for that act, on the plain ground that no court can treat that as a wrong which the Legislature has authorised, and consequently the person who has sustained a loss by the doing of that act is without remedy, unless in so far as the Legislature has thought it proper to provide for compensation to him. He is, in fact, in the same position as the person supposed to have suffered from the noisy traffic on a new highway is at common law, and subject to the same hardship. He suffers a private loss for the public benefit. Now, the Legislature has thought fit to authorise the defendants to make a railway, and by 8 Vict. c. 20, s. 86, "to use and employ locomotive engines and other moving power, and carriages and waggons to be drawn or propelled thereby." And the question is, whether this is such a legislative authorisation of the use of such power as to render all such consequences, as inevitably attend it, no longer wrongful. If this were a new matter, I should think there was a great deal in what is thrown out by Bramwell, B. in his judgment in the Exchequer Chamber, in this case; but the contrary was held in Rex v. Pease, so long ago as 1832, and acted on in Vaughan v. The Taff Vale Railway Company. And if your Lordships were to reverse those decisions, the consequence would follow that any owner of a house or field so adjacent to a railway that the inevitable disturbance from the working of the line amounted to a nuisance, might (at least where the railway has not been opened for twenty years) stop the working of the line. So large an amount has been invested in the belief that the trains might be run, even though some mischief to others was inevitable, that I think your Lordships will hold that even if the principle of Rex v. Pease was originally an error, it has long become communis error, and ought to be held to have made the law. I come, therefore, to the conclusion that, but for the statutes, the plaintiffs would have had a right of action for the vibration arising from the working of the defendants' line, and that the statutes have taken away that right of action. The question then arises, whether the Legislature has given the plaintiffs any compensation? and that must be a question depending on the construction of the statutes. It has been argued, with great force, that it is so unjust to take away private rights without compensation that it should be supposed that the Legislature at least wished to give compensation in every case where there was a private injury. But I think it is clear that the Legislature has not adopted the principle. In such a case as that of the London and North Western Railway Company v. Bradley, where the beer in the vaults adjoining the railway turned sour in consequence of the vibration, the owner of the vaults may or may not have had a right to compensation for the injury to his vaults; but the owner of the beer, if a different person from the occupier of the vaults, could have none, for the right to compensation is strictly confined to interest in lands injuriously affected: Caledonian Railway Company v. Ogilvy; Ricket v. The Metropolitan Railway Company.) The reason why the Legislature so narrowed the claim to compensation is probably that stated by Lord Cranworth in Ricket v. The Metropolitan Railway Company, "That any other construction of the clause would open the door to claims of so wide and indefinite a nature." But whatever be the reason, I think it clear that no compensation is given to those whose personal interests are injuriously affected, except where it can in some way be annexed to compensation for an injury to land. No doubt it is often very difficult to say whether an interest in land is or is not injuriously affected. In the present case, however, I assent to the argument so neatly expressed in the reasons of the appellants' case, that the plaintiff's house has "become subject to a perpetual servitude," and so her interest in it is injuriously affected. In my mind, therefore, the question is narrowed to this:—Do the compensation clauses in the statutes extend to the consequences of working the railway, and using the statutable powers for that purpose? Or, are they confined to the making and maintaining of the railway and the works, and using the statutable powers for that purpose? I can see many plausible reasons why the Legislature might think fit to adopt the narrower construction. There is the analogy to the hardship which, for the public good, is imposed by the common law by the owner of a quiet villa, if his neighbour dedicates the land close under his windows to the public as a highway; it might be leading to Smithfield market. Or they might have thought, as Lord Cranworth expresses it, that claims in respect of such damage would be of "a very wide and indefinite character." But I must own that, on reading the statutes, I do not think that the Legislature deliberately excluded such claims. I think they were not in the contemplation of those who framed the statutes at all; and that if there are words used sufficiently large to embrace such a case it is by an unintended accident. My opinion is based on what may be called the narrow ground, that no right to compensation exists unless given by the Legislature, and that I can find no sufficient expression of an intention on the part of the Legislature to give compensation for the consequences of exercising the powers given by 8 Vict. c. 20, s. 86. I am relieved from the necessity of going through the different sections of the Acts, because Channell. B., in his judgment in the Court of Exchequer Chamber, has said everything I could wish to say on that head. I will only add, in reference to the argument used in the Exchequer Chamber by M. Smith, J., derived from the general words, "they may do all other acts necessary for making, maintaining, altering, or repairing, and using the railway," which occur in the middle of the 16th section of 8 Vict. c. 20, that in Jones v. The Festiniog Railway, the court of Queen's Bench (then consisting only of my brother Lush and myself) thought that similar general words in a Railway Act which did not contain any express authority to use locomotive powers left the company at liberty, no doubt, to use locomotives, but on the common law terms, that they must keep in the fire at their own peril. So far as it goes, this confirms the reasoning of Channell, B. on this part of the 16th section. I regret that I am obliged to come to such an unsatisfactory determination; but I think the whole depends on the construction of enactments not sufficiently considered when perused. Opinions will differ on such a point, and it is not capable of much illustration from argument. I can only repeat that, in my opinion, the onus lies on the plaintiff to show that the Legislature has given compensation, and I cannot find in the statutes any language which, in my mind, expresses an intention to give compensation for such an injury.

Digitized by Google

Judgment was given by their Lordships on July 13, as follows:—

Lord CHELMSFORD.—My Lords, this is a proceeding in error upon a judgment in the Court of Exchequer Chamber, reversing a judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench, in favour of the plaintiffs in error upon a special case. The question raised for the opinion of the court below was, whether the plaintiffs in the action, who are owners of the house adjacent to the Hammersmith and City Railway, were entitled to compensation from the railway company for injury to their house from the vibration caused by the passage of trains over the lines in the ordinary use of the railway without negligence, whereby the house was depreciated in value to the extent, as found by a jury, of 272*l.* It is necessary in the outset of the consideration of this case to point out that the question is confined to the injury arising from vibration; because Lush, J., in the Court of Queen's Bench stated that the question was whether the owners of the house were entitled to compensation "for vibration, noise, and smoke;" and Sir William Erle, who heard the whole of the argument in the Exchequer Chamber, but retired from the bench before the judgment was delivered in that court (whose opinion is added to the report of the case in L. Rep. 2 Q. B. 246), assumed that the compensation was given for noise and smoke, as well as for vibration, and stated that "there was nothing to indicate what was the degree of noise, smoke, or vibration, or what was the amount assessed for either of these causes separately; and there was no evidence of any damage to the realty, either in structure or otherwise, from these causes, so that the compensation must be taken to have been given for the supposed discomfort of the inmates of the house." The special case, however, expressly states, with reference to this head of claim, that the jury assessed the amount of compensation, "for vibration from the use of the railway after construction," at 272*l.* There has been great difference of opinion amongst the judges of the courts below upon this case and those whose assistance your Lordships had are not unanimous in their answers to the questions put to them. It must therefore be regarded as one of nicety and difficulty. It must be borne in mind that this is not a case in which it was possible to claim compensation before the construction of the railway, nor, indeed, till after its working had commenced, because till then it could not be known whether there would be any vibration injurious to the house occasioned by the passing of the trains. The simple question, therefore, is whether the Legislature has provided compensation for any damage to land or houses not arising from negligence, but the inevitable consequence of the proper and ordinary use of the railway. As an introduction to this question, I must repeat what I said in Ricket v. Directors, &c., of the Metropolitan Railway Company, L. Rep. 2 App. 187; 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 543, "The criterion of a party's right to damages under the clauses of the Railway Companies Acts is correctly stated by Lord Campbell in Penny v. South-Eastern Railway Company, 7 E. & B. 660, that 'unless the particular injury would have been actionable before the company had acquired their statutory power, it is not an injury for which compensation can be claimed.'" To which I must add, as I added there, the observation of my late noble and learned friend Lord Cranworth, in the case of The Caledonian Railway Company v. Ogilvy, 2 Macq. 235, "that it does not follow that a party would have a right to compensation in some cases in which, if the Act of Parliament had not passed there might have been not only an indictment, but a right of action." Assuming that before the passing of their Act the company would have been liable to an action for the injury caused to the plaintiffs' house, it is necessary for the plaintiffs in the first place to establish that the Company's Act has taken away the remedy by action in order to open the way of their claim to compensation. If the cases of Rex v. Pease, 4 B. & Ad. 30, and Vaughan v. Taff Vale Railway Company, 5 H. & N. 679; 2 L. T. Rep. N. S. 394, were rightly decided, this question has been determined. It was established by those cases, "that when the Legislature has sanctioned the use of a locomotive engine there is no liability for any injury caused by using it so long as every precaution is taken consistent with its use." Bramwell, B., in his answer to the question put by your Lordships to the judges, adverting to the above cases, said, "With great respect, I think those cases clearly wrong, and that they have proceeded on an inadvertent misapprehension of the object and effect of the clauses in question." And he then reasoned from the Act of the company in this manner: "The 86th section, which gives the company the right to be carriers on their own line, is preceded by a heading, 'With respect to the carrying of passengers and goods upon the railway, and the tolls to be taken thereon.' There is not a word," said the learned baron, "in this heading as to the legalising or allowing of nuisances. The company wanted no power to enable them to use a locomotive. A man may use a locomotive on his soil and freehold, and so may a corporation. They do not possess the power to use it so as to be a nuisance to their neighbours. If this were intended to be given where are the words? The words are sufficient if meant to give vires ultra those of a company to make a railway, but insufficient if meant to authorise the doing of damage." With great respect to the learned baron, we do not expect to find words in an Act of Parliament expressly authorising an individual or a company to commit a nuisance or to do damage to a neighbour. The 86th section gives power to the company to use and employ locomotive engines, and if such locomotives cannot possibly be used without occasioning vibration and consequent injury to neighbouring houses, upon the principle of law that cuicunque aliquis quid concedit concedere videtur et id, sine quo res ipsa esse non potuit, it must be taken that power is given to cause that vibration without liability to an action. The right given to use the locomotive would otherwise be nugatory, as each time a train passed upon the line and shook the houses in the neighbourhood, actions might be brought by their owners which would soon put a stop to the use of the railway. I therefore think, notwithstanding the respect to which every opinion of Bramwell, B. is entitled, that the cases of Rex v.

Pease and Vaughan v. Taff Vale Railway Company (ubi sup.) were rightly decided. The plaintiffs' remedy by action being taken away, the question remains whether they are entitled to receive compensation from the company for the injury done to their houses, a question which must be decided entirely by the provisions of the Acts of Parliament relating to the subject. It must be taken as an established fact that by the use of the railway the plaintiff's house has been depreciated in value to the extent of 272*l.*, and as they cannot recover the damage they have sustained by action, one naturally feels a wish to find that the Legislature has not left them remediless, but has provided for them the means of redress in the shape of compensation to be paid by the company as the price of the right given to them to injure the plaintiffs' property. It is with this disposition that I entered upon an examination of the clauses of the Acts to which your Lordships' attention was called in the argument, and I may say that it was with regret I was unable to find anything in them upon which, in my opinion, the claim to compensation can be established. It is not that the Legislature has excluded compensation for injury arising as the necessary consequence of using the railway, but that it has not, as far as I can discover, given any right to claim compensation for this species of injury. The sections of the Railway Clauses Act, which appear to me to be alone necessary to be considered are the 6th and the 16th sections. I do not think that the sections of the Lands Clauses Act, which were referred to in the argument, are applicable. The sections of the Railway Clauses Act are, as your Lordships know, arranged in order under different headings, which indicate the general object of the provisions immediately following; and these may be usefully referred to to determine the sense of any doubtful expression in a section ranged under a particular heading. The heading to the 6th and all the subsequent sections down to the 30th, and including, of course, the 16th, is, "And with respect to the construction of the railway, and the works connected therewith, be it enacted as follows." Therefore all the sections, to which this heading applies, must be taken to have been intended by the Legislature to provide for matters relating to "the construction of the railway, and the works connected therewith." The 6th section seems more closely to confine its provisions to these objects, for it begins by enacting that, "In exercising the power given to the company to construct the railway, and to take lands for that purpose, the company shall be subject to the provisions and restrictions contained in this Act, and in the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act," and then it goes on, "and the company shall make to the owners and occupiers of, and all other persons interested in, any lands taken or used for the purposes of the railway, or injuriously affected by the construction thereof, full compensation for the value of the lands so taken or used, and for all damage sustained by such owners, occupiers, and other parties by reason of the exercise, as regards such lands, of the powers by this or the special Act incorporated therewith vested in the company." It was argued by the plaintiffs that the injury occasioned to the house from the vibration caused by the use of the railway came within the words "injuriously affected by the construction thereof," or, at all events, that it was a damage sustained "by reason of the exercise of the powers vested in the company." Now as to the words "by the construction thereof," it seems to me that it would be doing violence to language (even without the limitation which is placed upon these words by the general heading to the 6th and following sections, and the context of the section itself), to extend them to any injury which is not the immediate consequence of the construction of the railway. An instance of damage of this sort occurs in this very case, for the jury gave the plaintiffs compensation to the amount of 836*l.* for obstruction of light, air, and doorway. To argue that, as the injury could not have occurred unless the railway had been previously constructed therefore it was caused "by the construction thereof," is certainly a strong example of the illogical reasoning of post hoc ergo propter hoc, and would extend to every accident or injury occurring upon the railway after its construction, which, of course, could not have happened if it had not been constructed. With respect to the subsequent words in the 6th section, "damage sustained by reason of the exercise of the powers vested in the company," it was argued that they embrace the claim of the plaintiffs, because the powers vested in the company are not merely for the construction of a railway, but also for the use of it after its construction, being the end and object for which it is made. But again we must refer to the heading of this, and the following sections, which limits the provisions they contain, to "the construction of the railway and the works connected therewith." And reading the words of the section with reference to these objects, we find that compensation is to be made to the owners, &c., of lands taken or used for the purposes the railways, or injuriously affected by the construction thereof for damage sustained (not as regards such lands, but) "by reason of the exercise, as regards such lands, of the powers vested in the company." Now the powers vested in the company "as regards such lands," are to take and use the lands for the purposes of the railway, and to say that the use of the railway after its construction is one of the powers vested in the company in regard to the lands conveys to my mind no intelligible meaning. The sixth section of the Railway Clauses Act being inapplicable to the plaintiff's claim, we must turn to the 16th section to see whether it affords any countenance to it. The 16th section, as already observed, is one of the sections ranged under the heading which immediately precedes the 6th section. As the words "using the railway" are found in it, great stress is laid upon it in favour of the plaintiffs' claim to compensation. Now, it must be observed that this section begins with the words "it shall be lawful for the company, for the purpose of constructing the railway, or accommodation works connected therewith, hereinafter mentioned, to execute any of the following works." And then follows a specification of different works in detail empowered to be done for the purposes mentioned, ending with a general power to do "all other acts necessary for making, maintaining, altering, or repairing, and using the railway." The section then provides that, in the exercise of the powers by this or the special Act granted, the company shall do as little damage as can be, and shall make full satisfaction to all parties interested, "for all damage by them sustained by reason of the exercise of such powers." The counsel for the respondents argued that this proviso comprehended every description of damage sustained by reason of the exercise of the powers vested in the company. That power is given to them by the 86th section of the Act to use and employ locomotive engines upon the railway; and that the injury to the plaintiffs arose from the use of such locomotive engines, and therefore was sustained by reason of the exercise of the company's powers. It appears to me that this argument claims for the proviso in the 16th section a wider application than is warranted by the purview of the section. The powers specifically conferred by it are expressly referred and limited to the purpose of "constructing the railway." The general power to do all other acts, &c., must be read with reference to this object. If this mode of construing the section by the context is adopted, there will be no difficulty in understanding the words, "all other Acts necessary for using the railway," to mean, that for the purpose of constructing the railway the company may do all acts necessary to enable them to use the railway. This construction appears to me to be aided by the words which are found in juxtaposition with the word "using," viz., "making, maintaining, altering, and repairing," and it seems to me rather a forced interpretation of language to say that the words the company may do all acts necessary for using the railway, mean they may do all necessary acts in using the railway. I think that the proviso must be limited to the powers conferred by the section, and that it is only if in the exercise of these powers damage is sustained, that satisfaction is to be made. The section itself having empowered the company to perform certain works for the purpose of constructing the railway, the proviso in the Act that "in the exercise of the powers, &c., they shall do as little damage as can be," clearly pointing to the execution of the works to which this section relates, and confining the satisfaction to be made for damage done in exercising those powers. It appears to me that in the reasonable construction of this section it is impossible to hold that it gives any remedy to the plaintiffs for damage occasioned to their house in the course of using the railway. And there being no other legislative provision upon which the plaintiffs claim to compensation can be founded, except the 6th and 16th sections of the Railways Clauses Act, which I have fully considered and shown not to apply to that species of injury of which they complain, I am compelled very reluctantly, in a case where real damage has been sustained though not to a very large amount, to come to the conclusion that the Legislature has not provided for their case, but has left them without remedy, and that the judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber ought therefore to be reversed.

Lord COLONSAY.—My Lords I have, I confess, found this case to be attended with much difficulty, and I think I need not refrain from stating that, when I find that there has been so much difference of opinion in regard to it among the judges who have decided it in the other courts, and that there is even a difference of opinion among your Lordships. The case arises out of a claim made by a party for injury to her property, resulting from vibration caused by the use of the railway belonging to the appellants. The claim is rested on the provisions contained in certain statutes, and depends on the construction to be put on those provisions. Two general Acts have been referred to, and the special Railway Act, but I do not understand that under the special Act there is any particular clause that can affect the judgment to be pronounced in this case. The two general Acts that have been referred to are the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, and the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act both of which are held to be incorporated in the special railway Act. It is, I think, upon the provisions of the two general Acts that the question depends. One of those general Acts, to wit, the Lands Clauses Act has, I humbly venture to think, only an indirect bearing on the question. No land belonging to the respondent, or in which she was interested, was taken or touched by the railway. Her case is not directly within the provisions, as I read them, of that Act. I think it is very clear that, unless it is within the provisions of the 68th section of that Act, it is not within the provisions of the Act at all. Nevertheless, in reading the Railway Clauses Act, on which I think the claim of the respondent must be rested, it is not illegitimate to borrow such light as can be got from the language of the Lands Clauses Act, passed at the same time, and intended to be co-operative with the Railway Clauses Act, repeatedly referred to in, and intended to be incorporated with, the special Act for making the railway. Now when I have said that I do not think that the Lands Clauses Act bears on this claim otherwise than indirectly, I may explain that it appears to me that the object of the Lands Clauses Act is to give a power to parties engaged in this species of public undertakings to acquire lands. The preamble of the Act says that, "Whereas it is expedient to comprise in one general Act sundry provisions usually introduced into the Acts of Parliament relative to the acquisition of lands required for undertakings or works of a public nature, and to the compensation to be made for the same, and that as well for the purpose of avoiding the necessity of repeating such provisions in each of the several Acts relating to such undertakings as for ensuring uniformity in the provisions themselves." Then it goes on to enact, with regard to the purchase of lands for such undertakings. The Act is classed under various such divisions, the first of which is, "with respect to the purchase of lands by agreement." That begins with the 6th section and ends with the 15th section. Then there is another heading: "And with respect to the purchase and taking of lands otherwise than by agreement, be it enacted as follows." Then comes another heading, "With respect to the purchase-money or compensation coming to parties having limited interests, or prevented from treating or making title, be it enacted as follows." Then another heading, "And with respect to the conveyances of land, be it enacted as follows." Then another heading, "And with respect to the entry upon lands by the promoters of the undertaking, be it enacted as follows." And so on with regard to various matters as to lands. I am not speaking at present of the 68th section; but all the other clauses are clauses which are applicable to the promoters of the undertaking, and to the parties from whom lands are to be taken. There is no other class of persons contemplated in that statute. It is not a statute authorising the execution of any particular kind of works. It is a statute only as to the taking of land. It is intended to regulate the interests of the parties who take the lands, and of the parties to whom the lands belong, or who are interested in the lands to be taken. It provides on behalf of the parties whose lands are to be taken, not only that they are to receive the value of the lands so taken from them; but it provides also that they are to be compensated for the injury done to any lands held along with such lands, whether by severance or any other injury done to them, but it is all with reference to the parties, whose lands are to be taken, or who are interested in lands to be taken. The sections which were specially referred to in the argument were the 18th, 21st, 38th, 49th, 63rd, and 68th, and it will be seen that throughout the whole of them the matter to be dealt with is the interests of the parties from whom the lands are taken, or who are interested in those lands, and the interests of the railway company, or of the promoters of the undertaking, whatever it may be. Then I come to the 68th section, which is the only one of wider application. Now that section is one of that class of clauses which are placed under the heading, "With respect to the purchase and taking of lands otherwise than by agreement, be it enacted as follows." That heading covers the sections beginning with the 6th section and ending with the 68th, and then follow the sections, "With respect to the purchase-money or compensation coming to parties having limited interests." Sect. 68 says that, "If any party shall be entitled to any compensation in respect of any lands or of any interest therein, which shall have been taken for or injuriously affected by the execution of their works, and for which the promoters of the undertaking shall not have made satisfaction under the provisions of this or the special Act, or any Act incorporated therewith, and if the compensation claimed in such case shall exceed the sum of 50*l.*, such party may have the same settled by arbitration, or by the verdict of a jury as he shall think fit." The words here certainly are, "If any party shall be entitled to compensation in respect of any lands injuriously affected by the execution of their works." But these expressions, "injuriously affected by the execution of the works," which occur repeatedly throughout the statute are limited to the persons who are to get notice, and from whom lands are taken, or who have other lands which may be affected by such proceedings. And I think that this section of the statute must be read as a part of that class of section which has reference to the subject mentioned under the heading prefixed to that class of sections; and must be limited in its operation to the matters with which it is immediately connected. It should be observed that this is not a statute relative to any particular kind of works, it is a statute relative to the taking of lands. Even if it were to be read otherwise, it will be observed that there is a limitation in the expression here used, "affected by the execution of the works," to which I shall afterwards refer. But it appears to me that this section is one of those which have reference to the taking of lands otherwise than by agreement, it has reference to parties, who, under the other sections of the statute to which I have referred, would be entitled to compensation, but who would have not been omitted or overlooked in dealing with the matter. It may be that parties having certain interests in lands taken, or lands severed by reason of the taking, have not been found out at the time, and may come forward afterwards and make a claim. Notice is required to be given to owners and occupiers, and to all parties known to be interested, who have not had notice, and it is right that those parties, if found, should have an opportunity of coming forward and making a claim. And it seems clear that this was intended, seeing that it will not apply to claims that do not exceed 50*l.* in value. Why should the claims of smaller amount be excluded? There are modes here given of opening up other claims by arbitration; but where they are above 50*l.* they are to have the choice of arbitration or a jury. That also shows that this is connected with the previous sections under this head. But it appears to me that the Railway Clauses Act stands upon a different footing. That Act has reference to the particular species of undertaking. And I think that it is in that Act that we may expect to find the materials for dealing with claims in reference to such undertakings as this. It provides for compensation, not referring to the Lands Clauses Act as the rule for compensation, but referring to that Act as the machinery by which compensation is to be adjudged, without taking the Lands Clauses Act as giving the rule, or as regulating the parties to whom, or the matters for which, compensation is to be given. On the contrary, it contains its own provisions with regard to the matter that we are here dealing with. I think the Railway Clauses Act is of wider application than the Lands Clauses Act as regards the parties entitled to compensation, and also as regards the matter for which compensation may be given. The important sections are the 6th and the 16th. The 6th section appears to me to be, on the whole, the most important and the most general. It says that "in exercising the power given to the company by the special Act to construct the railway, and to take lands for the purpose, the company shall be subject to the provisions and restrictions contained in this Act and in the said Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act; and the company shall make to the owner and occupiers of, and all other parties interested in, any lands taken or used for the purposes of the railway, or injuriously affected by the construction thereof, full compensation for the value of the lands so taken or used, and for all damage sustained by such owners, occupiers, and other parties, by reason of the exercise, as regards such lands, of the powers of this or the special Act, or any Act incorporated therewith vested in the company." Under this clause the company are to make compensation to certain parties for certain things. They are to make compensation to the owners and occupiers, and other parties interested in any lands. What lands? "Lands taken or used for the purposes of the railway." So far it is clear, but it does not stop there. They are to make compensation to the owners and occupiers of lands "injuriously affected by the construction thereof." Now, I think, it is very clear that the occupiers and owners to whom compensation is to be made are to be the occupiers and owners of lands injuriously affected by the construction of the railway. The respondent in this case is the owner and occupier of land injuriously affected by the construction of the railway, and therefore she is a party who is comprehended in the class of persons who are entitled to claim compensation. Then what is the matter for which compensation is to be made? It is to be made for "the value of the lands so taken or used." That does not apply to the respondent's case. But the section goes on, "And for all damage sustained by such owners and occupiers" (of whom the respondent is one), "by reason of the exercise as regards such lands" (which includes the lands of the respondent), "of the powers by this or the special Act or any Act incorporated therewith vested in the company." Now, the claimant of compensation here is an owner and occupier of lands injuriously affected by reason of the exercise of the powers vested in the company. It is very clear that her property has been injuriously affected by the exercise of the powers vested in the company. It has been injuriously affected by the construction of the railway, the very words of the clause being "by the construction thereof." Therefore, she is a person who under this clause is entitled to come forward and make a claim. Her property was in the predicament which this clause contemplates, as property "injuriously affected," and therefore she is a person entitled to compensation. Then, the question arises, how far that compensation is to go? Is it to go beyond the measure in which she is injuriously affected by the construction of the railway? Is it to be extended to any injury which her property has sustained by the use of the railway? Compensation has been awarded to her for the injury done by the construction of the railway as affecting the access to her property, and the lights and so forth. The sum of 800*l.* odd has been assessed for that. But the question remains whether the statute by this enactment provides for compensation to be given for damage sustained not only by reason of the construction of the railway and the works connected therewith, but by reason of the subsequent use of the railway by the running thereon of locomotives causing vibration. Before expressing any opinion on that question, I should like to refer to other terms of the section of the statute, which has been founded upon in support of the claim. It is the 16th section, and it says that, "subject to the provisions and restrictions in this and the special Act, and any Act incorporated therewith, it shall be lawful for the company, for the purpose of constructing the railway, or the accommodation works connected therewith hereinafter mentioned, to execute any of the following works." This is under the heading, "With respect to the construction of the railway and the works connected therewith." Now, the things that are allowed to be done are specially enumerated—to construct inclined planes, to alter course of rivers, &c., to make drains, to erect warehouses, &c., and to make alterations and repairs; and then there is this general clause, that "they may do all other acts necessary for making, maintaining, altering, or repairing, and using the railway." Then there is a clause of compensation, "Provided always that, in the exercise of the powers by this or the special Act granted, the company shall do as little damage as can be, and shall make full satisfaction, in manner herein and in the special Act, and any Act incorporated therewith, to all parties interested, for all damage sustained by reason of the exercise of such powers." Now, it appears to me, that that clause for compensation has reference to the matters comprehended in the 16th section of the Act, and the question, therefore, comes to be whether the general expression, that they may do "all other acts necessary for making, maintaining, altering, repairing, or using the railway," comprehends the claim now made in respect of the use of the railway. I confess it does not appear to me to comprehend this. I think this section has reference altogether to the construction of the railway, and of certain things being done to enable the railway to be constructed and repaired, and made ready for use. I think it has reference to all these acts here mentioned, the making of drains, and inclined planes, altering and repairing the works, and all other acts necessary for making or maintaining, altering or repairing, and using the railway—all the acts necessary for placing the railway in a condition to be used. That is the construction I put on these words. Then when I go back to the 6th section, I think that section points in the same direction, that is, that the claim to compensation is limited to the injury done by the construction of the railway, and that it contains nothing whatever as to the use to be made of it. If compensation had been intended to be given for the using of the railway by locomotives or otherwise, I should have expected something to be said with reference to it. I should not expect to find in the Lands Clauses Act anything specific with reference to any kind of works, because that Act has nothing to do with any particular use that may be made of the works that are to be constructed. But in the other Act, in which we have statutory enactments, with regard to this particular class of public works, namely, railways. I should have expected to find something with regard to claims for compensation, not merely for injury done in the construction, but also for injury arising from the use of such locomotives, if such compensation had been intended to be given. I think there may be reasons seen why such a wide claim should not be given. But however that may be, I can look only at the statute itself, and I have only to state the construction, which I feel myself constrained to put upon the statute, without going beyond that. There is no connection between this question and the limits of deviation, as regards particular lands, under the statute. The claim now made could not have been confined to lands, within the limits of deviation under the statute, because injury by vibration or any other injury might be done to lands more remote, and the claim would be equally well founded. I think that when the Legislature gives special powers under any particular Act, the provision for compensation would be contained in that Act. The Legislature has not made Acts in regard to all kinds of public works. It has made an Act with regard to railways, and I do not find within that Act with regard to railways what I can consider as a right to claim compensation for vibration by reason of the subsequent use of the railway when made. I therefore feel myself under the necessity of concurring in the judgment that has been suggested by my noble and learned friend.

Digitized by Google

Lord CAIRNS.—My Lords, in a case which certainly is not without difficulties, and which has caused much difference of opinion in the courts below and among the learned judges who have assisted your Lordships, it is not, perhaps, surprising that the same difference of opinion should reach your Lordships' House; and I regret very much that I am unable to concur in the views of my noble and learned friends who have just spoken. My Lords, in one part of their view I do entirely concur. It appears to me that the effect of the legislation on this subject is to take away entirely any right of action on the part of the landowner against the railway company for damage that the landowner has sustained. It must be taken, I think, from the statements in this case, that the railway could not be used for the purpose for which it was intended without the consequences of this vibration. It is clear to demonstration that the intention of Parliament was that the railway should be used. If, therefore, it could not be used without vibration, and if vibration necessarily caused damage to the adjacent landowner, and if it was intended to preserve to the adjacent landowner his right of action, the consequence would be that action after action would be maintainable against the railway company for the damage which the landowner sustained, and, after some actions had been brought and had succeeded, the Court of Chancery would interfere by injunction, and would prevent the railway being worked. This, of course, is a reductio ad absurdum, and would defeat the intention of the Legislature. I have, therefore, no hesitation in arriving at the conclusion that no action would be maintainable against the railway company. My Lords, that alone would certainly predispose the mind to find in the enactments upon the subject compensation in some other form for the loss which, beyond all doubt, the landowner in such a case sustains. I do not mean to say that it would be safe to strain the words of an Act of Parliament on account of considerations of that kind; but if there be any doubt or ambiguity in the words, the consideration ought not to be overlooked that, beyond all doubt, the intention of legislation of this kind is that, in some shape or other, compensation should be made to those who sustain loss or harm by the operation of the Parliamentary powers. My Lords, it appears to me that it is not necessary in any way to strain the words of the Acts of Parliament in this case; but it is necessary in the first place to be perfectly clear as to what Acts of Parliament and what clauses apply. In my opinion there are two Acts of Parliament which must be looked at for this purpose, both the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act and the Railways Clauses Act. My Lords, with regard to the Lands Clauses Act, there is no doubt that it mainly relates to the taking and purchase of land, but it would be a great mistake to suppose, and it would be at variance with the well-settled practice upon the subject to hold, that the Act is confined to the taking of lands from landowners. And, in fact, the frame of the Lands Clauses Act shows that it is even dangerous to trust to the headings, which occur at the commencement of these fasciculi of clauses, for the purpose of restraining or confining the natural operation of the words which you find in the various clauses under those headings. I will illustrate what I mean by one fasciculus of clauses in the Lands Clauses Act. The 16th clause is prefaced by these words, "with respect to the purchase and taking of lands otherwise than by agreement, be it enacted as follows." The bundle of clauses which occurs under that heading runs on to the 68th section, and if you were to take the literal meaning of the words of the heading, you might expect to find nothing in the clauses that follow except with regard to the purchase and taking of land, and you might perhaps say that you must interpret every clause that follows as relating to the taking of land, and not to the affecting in any way of land which is not taken. But when we turn to the 22nd clause we find this enactment, "if no agreement is come to between the promoters of the undertaking, and the owners of or parties by this Act enabled to sell or convey or release, any lands taken or required for, or injuriously affected by, the execution of the undertaking, or any interest in such lands, as to the value of such lands, or of any interest therein, or as to the compensation to be made in respect thereof, and if in any such case the compensation claimed shall not exceed 50l., the same shall be settled by two justices." My Lords, it is evident that various classes of land are there spoken of, not merely land which is taken, or land which is required, but also land which is injuriously affected by the execution of the undertaking. And when we come to the 68th clause, the language is still more significant. The enactment is, "If any party shall be entitled to any compensation in respect of any lands, or of any interest therein, which shall have been taken for, or injuriously affected by the execution of, the works, and for which the promoters of the undertaking shall not have made satisfaction, under the provisions of this or the special Act, or any Act incorporated therewith, and if the compensation claimed in such case shall exceed the sum of 50*l*," then it is to be settled by arbitration, or by a jury in the way pointed out. My Lords, I need not remind your Lordships that, under this Act of Parliament, passed as it was many years ago, many hundreds of thousands of pounds, I might perhaps say millions of pounds, have been paid to persons, not one yard or one inch of whose land has been taken by the railway company, but whose land has been (in the words of the section) injuriously affected by the execution of the works (whatever that may mean, that is another point), but "injuriously affected," as a matter entirely distinct from the taking of the land. That shows, I think, that the headings of these clauses are not to be relied upon, and many other instances of the same kind inside the clauses themselves, something showing just in the same way that an Act of Parliament often goes beyond the preamble, and that provisions have been introduced in the progress of the clauses going somewhat beyond the short and summary definition in the headings of the clauses; in fact, one of these Acts of Parliament shows that these short headings were introduced merely to earmark a set of clauses, and to afford a short and summary way by which they might be introduced as enactments into other Acts of Parliament. My Lords, I have gone through the sections in the Lands Clauses Act, which seem to me to be relevant to this matter, and all that I would say more with regard to them is this: As to the 68th section to which I have referred, I agree that that section does not define the conditions under which the person whose land has been injuriously affected is to be entitled to compensation. It rather assumes that the right to compensation has been given in some other enactment, and it contents itself with pointing out the modus in which that compensation shall be obtained. And I may observe that in the present case the whole of the proceedings have been taken under the Lands Clauses Act, and indeed it is only under the Lands Clauses Act that a jury can be summoned, or the aid of arbitration invoked. I therefore commence with the Lands Clauses Act as the mode in which compensation is to be obtained, if the landowner is entitled to compensation under any other provision. I now turn for the purpose of finding the kind of compensation to be given to the Railway Clauses Act. I will only ask your Lordships to bear in mind the words which I mention again, in the 68th section: "If any party shall be entitled to any compensation in respect of any lands which shall have been injuriously affected by the execution of the works." Now, turning to the Railway Clauses Act in the fasiculus of clauses, which I agree commences with these words, "and with respect to the construction of the railway and the works connected therewith be it enacted as follows." The 6th section is in these words: "In exercising the powers given to the company by the special Act to construct the railway, and to take lands for that purpose, the company shall be subject to the provisions and restrictions contained in this Act, and in the said Lands Clauses Consolidation Act" (i. e., in the 68th section among others), "and the company shall make to the owners and occupiers of, and all other parties interested in, any any lands taken or used for the purposes of the railway, or injuriously affected by the construction thereof, full compensation for the value of the lands so taken or used, and for all damage sustained by such owners, occupiers, and other parties by reason of the exercise, as regards such lands, of the powers by this or the special Act, or any Act incorporated therewith, vested in the company. And then it proceeds to say that that compensation shall be ascertained under the Lands Clauses Act. My Lords, I desire in passing to point out to your Lordships that the words are evidently to be read reddendo singula singulis. If the land be taken or used, full compensation is to be made for the value of the land. If the land be not taken or used, but be injuriously affected by the construction of the railway, then compensation is to be made for the damage sustained by the owners and occupiers or other party interested by reason of the exercise as regards such lands of the powers by this or the special Act vested in the company. Then the 16th section I may also refer to, and that will complete the enumeration of the enactments with which we have to deal. It is as follows: "Subject to the provisions and restrictions in this and the special Act and any Act incorporated therewith" (that is to say, subject to the provisions and restrictions in the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act), "it shall be lawful for the company for the purpose of constructing the railway, or the accommodation works connected therewith hereinafter mentioned, to execute any of the following works." Then come a number of what I may term, structural works, such as turning the course of rivers, making railways across streets, and so on, and then comes the final power—"They may do all other acts necessary for making, maintaining, altering, or repairing and using the railway." Then comes what appears to me to be of great importance, the term and condition upon which alone they are authorised and empowered to make these structural works. The condition is, not that in the exercise of those structural powers they are to make certain compensation, but "that in the exercise of the powers" (that is, of all the powers by this or the special Act granted), "the company shall do as little damage as can be, and shall make full satisfaction in manner herein and in the special Act, and any Act incorporated therewith, provided, to all parties interested, for all damage by them sustained by reason of the exercise of such powers" (i.e., of all the powers vested in the company). My Lords, I venture to think that it would be too narrow a construction of these words to say that the powers here

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

mentioned are simply those powers which are immediately before enumerated. If that had been the intention of the Legislature, nothing could be easier than to say, and it would have been much shorter to have said, "provided always that in the exercise of such powers they shall make full compensation to the persons interested." Then we should have known exactly that what was intended was that, if by reason of the exercise of those structural powers any damage was done, they should make compensation. But, on the contrary, the provision is in substance this, "we, the Legislature, will authorise you to make these structural works, but the term and condition upon which we authorise you to make them is that, if by reason of the exercise of any of the powers by this, or the present Act, given to you, you do any damage you shall make compensation for that damage. In other words we will authorise the railway to be made with certain powers appendant and annexed to the making of the railway, one of the main and special ones of which is, that the railway shall be used as a passage for locomotive engines, but if by reason of the exercise of any of the powers we give you, you do damage you shall make full compensation for that damage to the persons injured. Now having taken the liberty of pointing out to your Lordships the sections, with which we have to deal, I shall sum up what appears to me to be the true and proper construction, (even if we were dealing with the 6th section alone of the Railway Clauses Act) of those words which have been referred to already, "injuriously affected by the construction of the railway." Even if we were dealing with that section alone it would appear to me that those words, "by the construction of the railway," are just the same words, and intended to denote the same idea, as the words in the 68th section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, "injuriously affected by the execution of the works," and that even dwelling upon those two sections, and not praying in aid at all the 16th section, the position of things would be this: Parliament authorises construction of the railway, but Parliament does not look upon those words, "the construction of the railway or the execution of the works authorised," as meaning the digging out so much land, the putting so much brick and mortar together, the making of a viaduct, or the making an embankment, or the mere structural aspect of the works, it looks upon the railway as an undertaking, as a going concern, if I may so call it, as a thing which is to be there for a certain purpose, and so fulfil a certain end, which the Legislature has had in its view. And, when it was the term "the execution of the works," and "the construction of the railway," it appears to me to point to a living and active thing which, placed in the spot where Parliament authorises it, may possibly have an injurious effect on some circumjacent land, and then pointing to that Parliamentary power, which is given to construct that railway or to execute that work, Parliament says, "If, by the construction of this railway with these incidents, if, by the execution of these works, there be a consequence in the shape of damage to those who are in the neighbourhood, that damage must be atoned for by compensation. My Lords, this case might be illustrated very easily by putting another case not the instance of a railway. The Lands Clauses Consolidation Act applies to works of all kinds, not merely to a railway; suppose that, under a special Act of Parliament, a company were authorised to take land for the purpose of making in a particular locality a gasworks, or were authorised to make on a particular spot copper-smelting works, either of which, we know, when they came to be worked would most probably produce injury to the circumjacent lands, although the lands around may taken by the company. Supposing Parli authorised the gasworks or the copper-sm works to be conducted, by words of enac which would make it impossible for the ow the adjacent land to maintain an action f injury sustained, and then Parliament said, " the execution of those works, the neighb owners sustain any damage, you shall pay fo damage," I should understand by an enactm that kind, not that the neighbouring owner is posed to be likely to sustain damage b construction of the building, by putting the and the mortar together, but to sustain dama those works as active, going works, which there for the purpose of manufacturing g smelting copper as the case may be, and that Parliament said, "If, by the execution of works, damage is done," Parliament meant t "If, by the execution of these works, qua gas or qua copper-smelting works, continuing to and actively proceeding, any damage is done damage shall be paid for." I may remind Lordships that this question was very near h to be decided once in your Lordships' Hous though, from circumstances, the decision becam necessary. In the case of Broadbent v. The Im Gas Company, 7 De G. M. & G. 436; 7 H. of L 600, the case which I have supposed was very happening, the company was authorised to mak works in a particular place and the Lands Clause was incorporated to a certain extent in the prov of the special Act, but there was a clause in th Clauses Act, also incorporated, which provide in carrying on their works and making gas n sance or injury should be occasioned to any c surrounding land. And it was held by this H as might be expected, that the consequence of section being introduced was that the right of was not taken away, and therefore it was not sary to consider the case I have suggested. I you had a case, where the right of action was away, and where Parliament had provided compensation should be made for injury do the execution of the works, then, in my opini least, it would mean and imply the execution works of the undertaking as an active and concern. That would be the opinion which I s entertain on the 6th section alone, even witho 16th section. As it appears to me that Lu has expressed with great felicity the same idea I have entertained, I cannot do better than re your Lordships of what Lush, J. says:— Lands Clauses Act is designed, not for rai only, but for all undertakings for which comp powers of taking lands are given, and every s Act which incorporates its provisions desig and fixes the purpose for which the land is taken, and the use to which it is to be perma appropriated, and the company, who are empo to take it, are bound to apply it to that pu and to that purpose only. So much of the ge Act as is incorporated becomes part of the s Act, and its language, as part of that Act, be pointed to the particular work or undert specified, whatever it may be, whether a rail dock, a canal, or any other undertaking. It authorises the taking of the land for the purp and its conversion into the particular railway, or canal in order that it may be used as such. undertaking is regarded as a working concer the idea of its use as a railway, dock, or canal the mind of the Legislature inseparable from of its construction. In professing to give co sation for all damages sustained by the own the adjacent land by the 'execution of the worl 'the exercise of the powers of the Act as re such lands,' the Legislature must, as it appears have had in view the ultimate object aimed at, the works when complete and in operation—the dock, railway, or canal, not abstractedly as a mere excavation, embankment or reservoir, but in connection with its appropriate traffic, and with the ordinary incidents of a business undertaking." It appears to me that if it is necessary to go beyond that and make the case still clearer, the case is made clearer by the 16th section, because as I interpret that section it seems to me to give a number of structural powers, I agree, but to make it the term and condition of exercising those structural powers —of interfering with rivers or with roads, and those other violent powers, as they may be termed, given by that Act, or by the special Act—that the company shall make full satisfaction to every person for all damage sustained by reason of the exercise of such powers, that is of all the powers given by the Act to the company. Now, my Lords, that being certainly the view which I should take of the construction of these Acts of Parliament, the only other matter which I have to refer to is what appears to have weighed in the minds of some of the learned judges, who were unable to adopt this view. I observe that some of those learned persons say that there would be very great difficulty in estimating the compensation because the damage could not be ascertained until the undertaking became, what I may call, a going concern, and until by experience you had ascertained exactly what the amount of damage or injury actually was. Now I do not think there is any difficulty at all on that head. In the first place, in the present case which we have here before us, no difficulty seems to have occurred. A sum has been found by the jury, not representing merely the past damage, but representing the whole damage which, in the opinion of the jury, both had been sustained and would be sustained by the exercise of the powers given to the company. In addition to that the problem which has to be solved appears to me not to be at all beyond the powers or the province of a jury. What you have to find is, what is the actual deterioration in value. You have a certain house, and near it a vibrating railway, I mean a railway in the use of which there cannot fail to be vibration. The house was of a certain value before the railway was put there. If the railway causes vibration evidence can be easily obtained to prove what the amount of deterioration in value is and the sum can be awarded accordingly. The subject may be illustrated further by supposing a house used for a particular trade, say that of a watch or clock maker, which requires particular steadiness. Serious injury might be done there, and the house might become useless for the particular purpose for which it was used before. But in addition to that it is said that you ought to know how many trains in a day there will be running, and the weight of them, and the speed at which they will pass. There is a well-known principle which applies to such cases, which is, that if the company against which the claim is made are not willing to bind themselves as to the maximum number of trains or the weight, or the speed, then the sum must be taken most strongly against the company upon the principle enunciated in the well-known old case of Armory v. Delamirié, 1 Strange, 504; 1 Sm. L. Ca. 301. And the largest amount of injury which can be sustained would probably be considered to be the amount to be awarded by the tribunal which has to award compensation. I might mention another case in which everyone would admit that compensation would have to be assessed at the commencement, and where the same difficulty might occur. Your Lordships will recollect cases which have come before this House arising upon questions of which the Caledonian Railway Company v. Sprot, 2 Mac. 449, may be taken as an instance. In those cases it was held that a landowner selling a strip of land to the railway company, is bound to give lateral support to resist the pressure which a heavy train passing over the land might occasion. Now in that case there cannot be compensation assessed and payable for the land taken in the first instance. Yet at the time when that compensation was so assessed, it might not be known what the number of trains passing along the railway, or the weight, or speed of them would be, and therefore it might not be possible to say with mathematical exactitude what would be the precise amount of support which would have to be given to the land on each side. In such a case the landowner would make his claim; he would show that the nature of the ground was such that lateral support would be particularly desirable; he would then show that he might have to support the land against the pressure that would be created by a great number of trains passing every day, and he would claim and probably would recover, compensation for the maximum amount of support which the land would require. I, therefore, cannot accept the suggested difficulty as to ascertaining the amount of compensation as any reason why the Act of Parliament should be taken as having a meaning other than what appears to me to be the plain meaning of the words. My Lords, I regret very much to say that I am afraid that the result will be that although a clear injury and damage has been sustained, and although a substantial sum has been awarded by a jury to the landowner, that sum will not be recovered. But I have been unable to do otherwise than to express to your Lordships the view which I entertain as to the construction of these statutes in a case which, as it appears to me, may be one of great importance.

Digitized by Google

Digby.—My Lords, I am with Sir John Karslake, and I am instructed to ask your Lordships to reverse the judgment, with costs, in the court below.

Lord CHELMSFORD.—The costs will follow.

Digby.—I understand not.

Lord CHELMSFORD.—In the case of a writ of error surely the reversal carries the costs. There can be no doubt about it.

Digby.—I understood there was some doubt.

Lord CHELMSFORD.—We shall take care that the costs will follow the ordinary course.

Digby.—I understand that the costs always follow when the appeal is affirmed; but in this case, when the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber is reversed, I understand the rule is somewhat different.

Lord CHELMSFORD.—Whatever the ordinary rule is, this case will follow it.

Judgment reversed.

Attorneys for the plaintiffs in error, Elsdale and Byrne.

Attorneys for the defendants in error, Aldridge and Thorn.

Digitized by Google

Equity Courts.

COURT OF APPEAL IN CHANCERY.

Reported by THOMAS BROOKSBANK and E. STEWART ROCHE, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

May 4, 5, 6, 7, and 29.

(Before the LORDS JUSTICES.)

THE EARL BEAUCHAMP v. WINN.

*Agreement—Alleged mutual mistake—Suit to rectify—"Warren" — "Warren of conies" — Grant of warren—What passes by—*38 Geo. 3, c. 60—"Tenement."

Although the court has undoubted jurisdiction to set aside an agreement, on the ground of mistake, yet, as a general rule, the mistake must be so plain and palpable as hardly to admit of a difference of opinion, and it must be possible to replace the parties in what was substantially their original position.

There is no ground in law for saying that a person having a right of free warren generally may not grant a limited right by a grant of a "warren of conies," but that phrase is not so extensive as "free warren."

A grant of a "warren of conies" is a grant of the conies, and a grant of a warren in a particular locality does not pass the soil.

A grant of land, or of a manor, according to the authorities, does not pass a right of free warren; for neither the words "warren of conies" nor the word "warren" necessarily or primarily mean an estate in the soil; but "warren" may be so used as to pass such an estate, provided that the context shows that to be the intention of the instrument.

A right of "warren" is a tenement.

The Act 38 Geo. 3, c. 60, conferred on the Duchy of Cornwall the right to sell "land" and "tenements:"

Held, that power to grant a right of warren was conferred by both the words "lands" and "tenements."

This was an appeal by the plaintiff, the present Earl Beauchamp, against the decree of the Master of the Rolls, whereby his Lordship dismissed with costs the bill filed by the last preceding Earl, as well as the supplemental bill of the appellant.

The judgment of the Court of Appeal fully states all necessary facts and documents, as well as the considerations and arguments upon which the decision depended.

Sir Richard Baggallay, Q. C., Jessel, Q. C., and Walford, supported the appeal.

Sir Roundell Palmer, Q. C., Mellish, Q. C. (of the Common Law Bar), Speed, and Jeune were for the defendants.

The authorities referred to were,

The Prince's case, Coke's Reports, vol. 4, part 8, 1 a;
Rice v. Wiseman, Rolls Reports, 259; 3 Bulst. 82;
Leigh v Weald, 1 B. & Ad. 622.
Marshall v. The Ullswater Company, 3 Best & Sm. 732; 8 L. T. Rep. N.S. 416;
Cooper v. Phibbs, L. Rep. 2 Eng. & Ir. App. 149; 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 678;
Feathers v. The Queen, 6 Best & Sm. 257; 12 L. T. Rep. N. S. 114;
Alton Woods case, 1 Co. 46 b., 49 a.;
Davies' case, 3 Mod. 246;
Bingham v. Bingham, 1 Ves. Sen. 126;
Ramsden v. Hylton, 2 Ves. Sen. 304;
Rex v. Piddletrenthide, 3 T. Rep. 772;
Morris v. Dimes, 1 Ad. & Ell. 654;
Cocking v. Pratt, 1 Ves. Sen. 400.

At the conclusion of the reply, judgment was reserved until the 29th May, when

Lord Justice GIFFARD said:—The judgment I am about to deliver is the judgment of the court.

Earl Beauchamp, the present appellant, who is the sixth earl, claims through Henry, the fifth earl. He has appealed from a decree of the Master of the Rolls dismissing, first, the original bill in this suit which was filed by the fifth earl; and, secondly, the supplemental bill which he himself filed; both bills were dismissed with costs. The questions in the suit arise in this way.

In Oct. 1864, the fifth earl and the defendant agreed to exchange certain lands and hereditaments, with the rights and privileges belonging thereto, and these lands were severally specified in two schedules appended to the agreement. The agreement itself consisted of six articles, and the earl was to pay by way of equality of exchange 3400*l.* to the defendant. The provisions of the agreement are set forth in the fifth paragraph of the bill. The first schedule contained a description of the lands and hereditaments to be given in exchange by the earl, they were as follows:—First, 162½ acres in the parishes of Frodingham, Bottesford, and Ashby; secondly, freehold common rights on the East Common of Bromby; thirdly, all the right or stray of rabbits or right of warren in the said East Common with the appurtenances. The second schedule contained a description of the lands and hereditaments, rights and privileges, to be given in exchange by the defendant; they were 55a. 2r. and 29p. lying in Bromby; secondly, all the freehold common rights, or other rights, interests, or property, in or upon the West Common of Bromby; thirdly, all the freehold moorland in Bromby Moors, as set out by boundaries, containing 186 acres, or thereabouts; fourthly, a tithe rentcharge payable out of the estate of the earl to the defendant; fifthly, a fee farm rent of 7*l.* 2*s.* 6*d.* payable out of the estate of the earl to the defendant; sixthly, the right and privilege of the exclusive use for twelve years of the Warping Sluice to the defendant; seventhly; all the right and interest of the defendant as lord of the manor of Bromby, in all that portion of the East Common in Bromby, which lies to the west side of the public carriage road, amounting to 115 acres, or, if less, to be made up to that amount. The agreement was duly executed, and possession given accordingly, since which time acts of ownership have been exercised by the parties over the properties so exchanged. There have been no conveyances.

In 1865 the late earl and the defendant promoted the enclosures of the East and West Common of Bromby; in November of that year the late earl sent in his claim to the Inclosure Commissioners, and in Dec. 1865, with a view to substantiate that and another claim, search was made amongst the earl's deeds and muniments of title at Madresfield, the family seat, when, on considering a deed of grant from the Duchy of Cornwall, it appeared, as the plaintiff alleges and insists, that the East Common of Bromby, and the mines and minerals thereunder, and under certain lands in Frodingham and Scunthorpe, were by a grant of the Duchy of Cornwall, dated the 27th March 1799, conveyed to Thomas Pindar, his heirs and assigns, for ever. It is not disputed that all the property belonging to Thomas Pindar in this district passed from him to the Earls Beauchamp, and were possessed by the late earl, and that they are the property of the present earl. The defendant denies that the soil of the East Common of Bromby, and the mines and minerals thereunder, or under the lands of Frodingham and Scunthorpe, were conveyed by this grant of the 27th March 1799 to Thomas Pindar.

Digitized by Google

On the contrary, he alleges that they were conveyed by a grant of the Manor of Kirton from the Duchy of Cornwall to Mr. Angerstein, on the 9th July 1799, and that Bromby, Frodingham, and Scunthorpe are part of the manor of Kirton. The defendant claims through Mr. Angerstein.

It is plain that all parties acted on the assumption that the soil in the East Common of Bromby, and the mines and minerals under it, and the mines and minerals under th lands in Frodingham and Scunthorpe, belonged to the defendant, and did not pass by the grant of March 1799; this the appellant alleges, as the fifth earl did before him, to have been a common mistake. He avers that the mines and minerals are of very great value; that in substance he gets by the exchange that which was really his without it, and therefore he asks the court either to rectify the agreement, or to nullify the transaction and set it aside.

It needs no argument to prove that the court has jurisdiction to set aside an agreement on the ground of mistake; but, as a general rule, the mistake must be plain and palpable—one as to the existence of which opinions can scarcely differ, and it must be possible to replace the parties in that which was substantially their original position.

In the present case the rights of the parties have been assumed to be such as formed the foundation of the exchange during a period of sixty years preceding the present dispute. In 1801 an Inclosure Act was passed (41 Geo. 3, c. 74), under which an allotment was made to Thomas Pindar for his right of warren, and to Mr. Angerstein for his right of soil, in certain commons of the manor of Kirton. Again, in 1831 another Inclosure Act was passed; no doubts were entertained as to the relative rights and positions of the defendant and the then Earl Beauchamp, the defendant being treated and considered as entitled to the soil, the earl to the right of warren as distinguished from the soil; the several transactions under both Acts are detailed in the 8th, 9th, 10th, 11th, 12th, and 13th paragraphs of the answer to the original bill; they have been frequently read and commented on during the argument, and, having regard to these transactions, as well as to those which are shown to have taken place as mentioned in other paragraphs of the same answer, commencing with the 17th, and going down to and including the 29th, all which have also been read, it is difficult to see any just or sufficient grounds for a suit of this description. It is clear on the plaintiff's evidence that the existence of valuable minerals under the lands in question was known to the fifth Earl and his advisers before the date of the agreement for the exchange; it is as reasonably certain as anything can be that the grant of March 1799 was never supposed, either by grantor or grantee, or by any person whomsoever, until some sixty years after its date, to have had the effect now sought to be attributed to it, and unless that effect is plain almost to demonstration, and the true construction of the instrument so certain, and the rights of the parties under it so indisputable, as not to be open to serious controversy, we should not hesitate in coming to the conclusion that the bill was rightly dismissed.

